

This is a digital copy of a book that was preserved for generations on library shelves before it was carefully scanned by Google as part of a project to make the world's books discoverable online.

It has survived long enough for the copyright to expire and the book to enter the public domain. A public domain book is one that was never subject to copyright or whose legal copyright term has expired. Whether a book is in the public domain may vary country to country. Public domain books are our gateways to the past, representing a wealth of history, culture and knowledge that's often difficult to discover.

Marks, notations and other marginalia present in the original volume will appear in this file - a reminder of this book's long journey from the publisher to a library and finally to you.

Usage guidelines

Google is proud to partner with libraries to digitize public domain materials and make them widely accessible. Public domain books belong to the public and we are merely their custodians. Nevertheless, this work is expensive, so in order to keep providing this resource, we have taken steps to prevent abuse by commercial parties, including placing technical restrictions on automated querying.

We also ask that you:

- + Make non-commercial use of the files We designed Google Book Search for use by individuals, and we request that you use these files for personal, non-commercial purposes.
- + Refrain from automated querying Do not send automated queries of any sort to Google's system: If you are conducting research on machine translation, optical character recognition or other areas where access to a large amount of text is helpful, please contact us. We encourage the use of public domain materials for these purposes and may be able to help.
- + Maintain attribution The Google "watermark" you see on each file is essential for informing people about this project and helping them find additional materials through Google Book Search. Please do not remove it.
- + Keep it legal Whatever your use, remember that you are responsible for ensuring that what you are doing is legal. Do not assume that just because we believe a book is in the public domain for users in the United States, that the work is also in the public domain for users in other countries. Whether a book is still in copyright varies from country to country, and we can't offer guidance on whether any specific use of any specific book is allowed. Please do not assume that a book's appearance in Google Book Search means it can be used in any manner anywhere in the world. Copyright infringement liability can be quite severe.

About Google Book Search

Google's mission is to organize the world's information and to make it universally accessible and useful. Google Book Search helps readers discover the world's books while helping authors and publishers reach new audiences. MEM.—According to the Usage of Parliament, when the House appoints a Select Committee, the Lords appointed to serve upon it are named in the Order of their Rank, beginning with the Highest; and so, when the House sends a Committee to a Conference with the Commons, the Lord highest in Rank is called first, and the rest go forth in like Order: But when the Whole House is called over for any Purpose within the House, or for the Purpose of proceeding forth to Westminster Hall, or upon any public Solemnity, the Call begins invariably with the Junior Baron.

THE UNITED KINGDOM OF GREAT BRITAIN AND IRELAND, APPOINTED TO MEET 20 AUGUST, 1852, AND FROM THENCE
CONTINUED TILL 4 NOVEMBER, 1852, IN THE SIXTEENTH YEAR

HER MAJESTY QUEEN VICTORIA.

HOUSE OF LORDS,

Thursday, November 4, 1852.

THE PARLIAMENT.

THE Fifteenth Parliament of the United Kingdom was dissolved by Proclamation on the 1st July; and, at the same time, writs were ordered to be issued for calling a new Parliament, which writs were made returnable on Friday the 20th August. The Parliament so called was prorogued to the 21st October; and thence to the 4th November; and accordingly met this day for despatch of business.

The Parliament was opened by Commission:—the Lords Commissioners being the Lord Chancellor, the Lord President of the Council (the Earl of Lonsdale), the Lord Privy Seal (the Marquess of Salisbury), the Lord Steward of the Household (the Duke of Montrose), and the Duke of Northumberland, First Lord of the Admiralty.

The Lords Commissioners being seated in front of the Throne, and the Commons (who were sent for) being at the Bar,

VOL. CXXIII. [THIRD SERIES.]

The LORD CHANCELLOR said: My Lords and Gentlemen, we have it in command from Her Majesty to let you know that you shall hereafter be informed of the cause of calling this Parliament together; but, it being necessary that a Speaker for the House of Commons should first be chosen, you, Gentlemen of the House of Commons, will for that purpose return to the place prepared for your meeting, and there be pleased to choose a Speaker, and present such person whom you shall so choose here To-morrow at two o'clock for Her Majesty's Royal approbation.

The Lord Chancellor—Singly, in the first place, took the Oaths at the Table.

Certificate of the Sixteen Peers for Scotland—Read.

The Viscount Falmouth—Sat first in Parliament after the Death of his Cousin Viscount Falmouth (Earl of Falmouth).

The Lord Congleton—Sat first in Parliament after the Death of his Father.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Thursday, November 4, 1852.

CHOICE OF A SPEAKER.

This being the day appointed for the new Parliament to meet for despatch of business, a large number of the Members returned to serve for the Counties, Cities, and Boroughs of the United Kingdom, assembled in the house of the Commons, and the Clerk of the House, Sir Denis Le Marchant, took his seat in front of the table.

Presently the Gentleman Usher of the Black Rod brought a message from the Lords Commissioners appointed to open the Parliament, desiring the immediate attendance of the House to hear Her Majesty's Commission read.

The House went ;—and a Commission having been read for opening and holding the Parliament, the Lords Commissioners directed the House to proceed to the Election of a Speaker, and to present him To-morrow at two o'clock in the House of Peers, for the Royal Approbation.

And the House being returned, the Clerk of the House, standing up, pointed to

MR. ROBERT PALMER, who rose, and, addressing the Clerk of the House, said: Sir, it now devolves upon this House, in obedience to Her Majesty's commands, to perform its first and one of its most important duties, namely, to select from among our own body some hon. Member who shall fill, during the present Parliament, the office of Speaker of the House—an office at all times onerous, and attended with much responsibility, and not the less so on the present occasion, when so many hon. Members are returned for the first time to Parliament, who must necessarily, for that reason, be but partially acquainted with the rules and proceedings of the House. If upon the present occasion it had been my duty to propose to the consideration of the House any untried Member—any hon. Gentleman who, for the first time, might be called upon to discharge the important duties of the chair of this House—although I am well aware that there are many hon. Members present who would fully justify any choice which the House might think proper to make—still for myself, individually, I should have hesitated before undertaking the task of proposing any hon. Gentleman so circumstanced; because I am sure that a considerable degree of personal responsibility attaches to any individual who rises to propose any hon. Member for so high and important an office, on whose ability and efficiency to discharge these duties, so much of the regularity of our proceedings must necessarily depend; for such a task, I am well aware that there are many other hon. Members in the House on whose judgment the House would have much more reason to rely, and it would have been presumptuous in me to put myself into such a position. But on the present occasion, fortunately, I am relieved from any difficulty in this respect; because I rejoice to see among us again, my right hon. Friend the Member for North Hampshire, who has filled the chair of this House during the last thirteen years with so much advantage to the country and so much honour to himself, that the House is left in no doubt, and is relieved from all difficulty, in selecting the hon. Member best qualified among us all to fill that high and distinguished station. Sir, under these circumstances I do not think it is necessary that I should trespass upon the attention of the House by dilating upon the onerous duties that attach to the office of Speaker of this House. They are sufficiently well known to most of the hon. Members who sit in this House. Suffice it, therefore, to say, that in the choice of Speaker we must look to some individual whose intimate acquaintance with the law and practice of Parliament will render him at all times their ready exponent, and will enable him to define and lay down the rules and orders by which our proceedings are regulated, so as to enable us on all occasions immediately and confidently to rely upon his decisions. We must also look for a person who will be ready to uphold and defend the ancient rights and privileges of the House of Commons, if at any time they should become objects of attack from any quarter—privileges, it is well known, which were not granted to this House for individual benefit or for selfish objects, but for the benefit of the community which we are sent here to represent. We must also look for a Gentleman, who, in the heat of the party contests that sometimes occur in our debates, is able to lay aside all party feeling, and who will, while presiding over us, maintain a strict and undeviating impartiality. For all these qualifications which I have enumerated, I am sure that every one who has witnessed the conduct of my right hon. Friend in the chair will agree with me in saying that he has proved himself to be most eminently distinguished. Therefore I think I may add, that in upholding the dignity of the office, in preserving an equal and unruffled equanimity of temper under all circumstances, in courteous demeanour to every Member of the House, my right hon. Friend has not been exceeded by any of his predecessors. I think I have said sufficient to induce all those hon. Members who have before had seats in this House to agree with me in the Motion I am about to make. But if I may be permitted to add one word to the large number of Gentlemen, who, for the first time, have been sent here to take part in our deliberations, I am sure that they will not find themselves deceived when I assure them that in the transaction of that portion of the private business of the House that may devolve upon them, they will always find my right hon. Friend ready to assist them with his advice and experience in any difficulties that may arise in the transaction of the various duties with which they may be entrusted. I am rejoiced to think that on the present occasion it has not been considered necessary to make the question of the choice of a Speaker the test of party feeling or political strength. Such circumstances have before occurred; but I myself feel extremely gratified that I am not restrained by any party considerations, or called upon to surrender those feelings of private friendship and personal regard which I entertain for my right hon. Friend. I am sure that all those who have witnessed his conduct in the chair will agree with me when I say, that the uniform urbanity of my right hon. Friend in his high station has more than proved the wisdom of the choice which this House made in 1839, confirmed as it has been on two subsequent occasions by the unanimous approval of the House. I trust the House on the present occasion is about to exhibit an equal degree of unanimity, and to place my right hon. Friend in the chair without a dissentient voice. In so doing we shall be offering to my right hon. Friend the only reward we have it in our power to bestow for the eminent services he has already rendered to the House—services which I am sure he will continue to render with equal zeal and equal ability in the event of his being again chosen by the House, and, if possible, with increased efficiency from his longer and more matured experience. After the long and eminent services of my right hon. Friend, I shall best consult the feelings of the House if I move, without further preface, "That the Right Hon. Charles Shaw Lefevre, do take the chair of this House as Speaker."

LORD ROBERT GROSVENOR: I must claim the kind indulgence of the House for a few minutes while I second the Motion of my hon. Friend the Member for Berkshire. I have done so in accordance with the wishes of the right hon. Gentleman opposite, who considers that my right hon. Friend the Member for North Hampshire having formerly belonged to the party sitting on this side of the House, it would be more agreeable to him, and more expressive of that unanimity of opinion that should prevail in the election of the highest officer in this House, that his nomination should be seconded by a Member of Her Majesty's Opposition. I entirely concur in the propriety of that sentiment. All I regret is, that the right hon. Gentleman did not make application to some hon. Member more calculated than I am to give weight and authority to the recommendation, and who might more fairly stand up on this side of the House as the unofficial organ of that party to whom I have the honour to belong. I say the unofficial organ, because, as is perhaps well known, it is not usual for any Member holding high office, or who has held high office, to propose a candidate for the chair of this House. Be this, however, as it may, it gives me the sincerest satisfaction to have this public opportunity of bearing my testimony to the manner in which my right hon. Friend Mr. Shaw Lefevre has performed the duties of his arduous position. I am quite sure that I give utterance not only to my own sentiments, but also to those of every hon. Gentleman from amongst whom I rose to second this Motion, when I say that not only are we proud of the right hon. Gentleman as having sprung from the ranks of our party, but also, entirely laying aside all party feeling whatever, we are more proud of him as a Member of that Legislature to which we all in common belong. The merits of Mr. Shaw Lefevre as Speaker of the House are so well known not only to those who have had the advantage under his auspices of taking part in the business of the House, but also to the public at large, that it would be a work of supererogation almost either in this House or elsewhere to dilate at any length upon them; and certainly upon this occasion it would be extremely

so, after the good taste, good feeling, and ability with which the hon. Member who preceded me has referred to them. But before I sit down, I should like to make one remark which I hope the House will not consider as foreign to the subject now under discussion. It is said to be one of the infirmities of human nature to give an undue prominence, an undeserved importance, to the events passing around us; but if I have any due appreciation of the circumstances of the time in which we are now living, there has rarely been in the history of the world a more remarkable crisis than that at which the Imperial Legislature has been now summoned for the transaction of business. When the liberties of Europe—when the right of full, free, and open discussion—I might almost say the right of public opinion—hang by a thread—at a moment of this sort I am sure it will be acknowledged that the character of this House is deeply involved in the manner in which its proceedings shall be carried on. I think at this moment it becomes us to act with unusual prudence, calmness, and circumspection. I think we should take the utmost pains that the liberty of free thought and free discussion, which we have happily enjoyed for so long a period, should not be abused for any personal party or factious purposes, but that we should guard it as a sacred trust committed to our care—I think I may say without any exaggeration—for the benefit of mankind at large. If, then, this be the position in which we now stand—and that it is such not in my opinion only, I believe I may gather, from the assent with which my remarks have been received by the House,—surely it is a matter of great rejoicing that we can avail ourselves of the services of a man whose nice tact, discriminating judgment, conciliatory demeanour, large and varied experience, and indefatigable attention, so eminently qualify him to be the moderator of our discussions and the president of our debates; at a moment, too, when apart from those disturbing causes to which I have adverted, the nicely-balanced state of parties would render the office of Speaker one of great delicacy and unusual difficulty. I will not now trespass further on the attention of the House, and shall, therefore, conclude by seconding the Resolution of my hon. Friend the Member for Berkshire, which I understand to be, that in the opinion of this assembly, the most fit and proper person to fill the chair of this House is the right hon. Gentleman the Member for North Hampshire—a man who, while for so many years upholding the independence, the honour, and the dignity of this branch of the Legislature, has been enabled so to conduct himself as to conciliate the good will, the respect, and the esteem of every Member of every class and every party amongst us.

SIR ROBERT H. INGLIS: The ordinary term used in addressing the individual honoured by the choice of the House is to congratulate him. My feeling, Sir, in rising is not merely to congratulate him, but far more the House by whom he is chosen. In your presence, Sir, and in the presence of so many hon. Members of large experience in this House, it is needless to add a single word as to the personal fitness of the right hon. Gentleman; but it is not unfit and not unnecessary perhaps to recall to the recollection of some, and to take the liberty of stating to others, the very different amount of time and labour which is now required of the Speaker of this House. That time and labour have been bestowed most cheerfully and actively, and most beneficially for the public service, by the right hon. Gentleman to whom again those duties are about to be committed. Why, Sir, a hundred years ago the Speaker had not, perhaps, the tenth part of the labours which now devolve upon the occupant of that chair. A hundred years ago but three debates appear in the Parliamentary history of one Session, and but fifteen divisions are recorded in the journals. In the last year we had 242 divisions; and the Speaker, whom I trust again to have the honour of addressing in that capacity, has sat not less than 13,000 hours in the discharge of his duties as Speaker, since first he was elected, in 1839, to that high post of dignity and duty. When I contrast the labour of former Speakers—when I hear of only one Speaker filling the chair during the whole reign of George I., and one other during the whole reign of George II., I must say that the right hon. Gentleman has compressed into the period of his services more labour, more attention, and more successful energy than any one of his predecessors had ever done. Therefore, knowing what he has been, rejoicing that he is still entrusted with such health and energy as will enable him to continue to us his valuable services with the same success, I should not have taken the liberty of adding a single word; but as one hon. Gentleman from the Ministerial side of the House has proposed, and another from the Opposition benches has seconded, the nomination of the right hon. Gentleman, I thought it not unbecoming in me, as an old Member of the House, to endeavour to express, not merely my own opinions, but the feelings of a large majority—and I hope I may say of every Member—in the proposition now before us: for those who have had experience will at once support the right hon. Gentleman, and those who have not had such experience will give their confidence to those who have already enjoyed the benefits of it. Cordially concurring in all that has been said on both sides of the House, I sincerely rejoice that he has been again selected for this position.

MR. CHARLES SHAW LEFEVRE then rose and said: Perhaps, before the Question is put, the House will allow me to make an observation. I trust it is unnecessary for me to assure the hon. Member for Berkshire, and the noble Lord the Member for Middlesex, that I highly value that friendship and regard which alone could have suggested those complimentary terms in which they have done me the honour to introduce my name to the notice of the House. I hope it is equally unnecessary for me to assure the House that I have not only listened to the speeches of my hon. Friends, but I have witnessed the flattering reception which the House has been pleased to give to those speeches, with feelings of unfeigned gratitude. The experience of more than thirteen years has confirmed the opinions I held when first I had the honour of a seat in Parliament, of the value and importance of those privileges which are enjoyed by the House, as the hon. Member for Berkshire has well observed, for the benefit of the community at large; as well as of the sound practical wisdom by which the forms and orders have been framed for the regulation of your proceedings, and the due and proper consideration and despatch of the public business. But that experience has also taught me what an enormous amount of responsibility rests upon that individual to whom the guardianship of those privileges and the enforcement of those forms and orders are entrusted. My hon. Friend the Member for the University of Oxford, who from his long standing, and the respect the House entertains for him, is so well entitled to pronounce an opinion on a subject of this nature, has stated to you the anxious and laborious nature of those duties which are now attached to the office of Speaker of the House of Commons. They are such as, even after the experience to which I have referred, I should almost hesitate to undertake again, were it not that I feel what is due from me to the House for the undeviating kindness I have received from it during the period of my services in the chair; and, above all, that I entertain a strong conviction that an earnest determination on my part faithfully and impartially to discharge the duties imposed upon me, will not only meet with the indulgence but the cordial support and co-operation of the House. With these few observations I bow to the decision of the House, whatever that may be.

Motion carried nemine contradicente.

MR. ROBERT PALMER and Lord ROBERT GROSVENOR then conducted the right hon. Gentleman to the chair.

MR. SPEAKER elect, standing on the upper step, said: As it has been the pleasure of the House again to place me in this chair, I trust it will permit me to express the sincere obligations I feel for this additional proof of its confidence and esteem. This renewed mark of its kindness will, if possible, redouble my anxiety to devote every energy of my mind to its service.

The CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: Sir, it now becomes my gracious duty to congratulate you on having again received to-day the highest honour which English Gentlemen can confer on one possessing their confidence and esteem. Those who have preceded me have intimated the eminent qualities necessary to be possessed by him who should fill the chair of this House. It is not requisite for me to dwell upon that part of the subject, since during the four Parliaments in which you have filled this high office, all have acknowledged the courage with which you vindicated our privileges—the firmness with which you maintained order in our debates, and the spirit of impartiality which ever guided your judgments. But I may, without presumption, having had the honour of a seat in this House when you were first elected to that chair, and having been a Member of the House during the interval that has since elapsed—I may perhaps notice one trait in your conduct which I have frequently observed, and which, I think, entitles you to the increased confidence of the House; it is this—that in those conjunctures which occasionally occur, when mere routine cannot guide the individual filling the chair—when you have been, as it were, taxed at the moment—your resources have never failed you, and you have always been sustained by the knowledge and self-respect necessary at such a crisis. There is another reason why your re-election should be a subject of congratulation to the House and to the country. I cannot but remember that not only is this a new Parliament, but that the individual who from his position has the principal control over the business of the House, has hardly that experience which is necessary for the post he occupies; and although I feel confident that, whenever the order and honour of this House are concerned, so long as I sit here I shall never appeal in vain to any Gentleman, on whichever side he may sit, I cannot but feel, under these circumstances, that the selection we have made this day is one upon which the House is much to be congratulated, our choice falling as it does upon an individual who not only possesses the confidence of this House, but on one who has repeatedly received the approbation of our most gracious Sovereign.

LORD JOHN RUSSELL: May I be allowed to add one word to what has been said by the right hon. Gentleman? I feel that it is a matter of the greatest importance, and one of the greatest good fortune, that at this particular period, when there are so many Members of the House without experience in its debates, that we should have to preside over these debates a Gentleman who has already shown his qualification for the eminent post of Speaker, and who, whenever it has been necessary to enforce the orders and rules of the House, has done it with such judgment and firmness, and at the same time with such courtesy, as almost to obtain the willing obedience even of those who seemed most inclined to question his decisions. I shall only add further, that the right hon. Gentleman (the Chancellor of the Exchequer), having alluded to his short experience in the conduct of the business of the House, I feel persuaded, on the part of hon. Members around me—and I can give him the assurance of my own part—that any assistance in carrying on the public business which this House or the Chair can render the right hon. Gentleman, will be freely accorded; because we all feel that it is of the utmost importance that we should continue to give that example, which hitherto this House has for more than two centuries given, of being a deliberative assembly which can carry on its discussions with the utmost freedom, and, at the same time, with the utmost regard for propriety and decorum.

MR. HUME should have been disposed to concur in silence with the proceedings; but he had been asked to prefer a request on behalf of Members of that House. It was very desirable that the Speaker should have better opportunities than he had enjoyed during the last three Parliaments of becoming acquainted with hon. Members of the House; and therefore he was anxious to see the former practice revived, and that the Members would have more frequently the opportunity of paying their respects to the Speaker. He looked upon the Speaker as the first commoner in the land, and he had obtained from the right hon. Gentleman's predecessor the concession which he now sought with regard to the Speaker's levees. Many Members were anxious to pay their respects, who were now precluded by a practice which he believed was not in accordance with the original constitution of these assemblages. When he (Mr. Hume) attended Her Majesty with an Address, he was allowed to be present in his ordinary dress; but of late years he was unable to pay his respects to the Speaker of the House of Commons in his common dress. Mr. Abercromby, when Speaker, had yielded to the applications that were made to him; and he now made that application on the part of a number of Members who were very anxious to pay him their respects—as to dining with the right hon. Gentleman, that was not the question which troubled him. He could assure the right hon. Gentleman they would not trouble him much; but it was with regard to the levees, where he did not like to see a House of 650 Members confined to some 50 or 100 persons. He wished that the major part of those who belonged to the House should be ready and able to pay their respects to the right hon. Gentleman. He was one of those who had highly approved of the conduct of the right hon. Gentleman as their Speaker; and he must be aware that no man was more anxious to support the rules and regulations and orders of the House than he had been. He had given all the humble assistance in his power to their maintenance, as the best means of preserving their character as a deliberative assembly. He was not anxious to detract anything from the power or dignity of the Speaker, but he was anxious to see these levees attended by Members who were desirous of doing honour to him, while it would give great satisfaction to them. The alteration he suggested would give great satisfaction. It rested with the Speaker to make the alteration, as it was a private matter, and he did hope that Members would be admitted attired in the same manner as when they accompanied an Address to the Crown. He asked nothing more than that the right hon. Gentleman should revert to the practice of his predecessor.

House adjourned at Three o'clock till To-morrow.

HOUSE OF LORDS,

Several Lords—took the Oaths.

APPROVAL OF THE SPEAKER.

The Lords Commissioners—the Lord Chancellor, the Lord Privy Seal (the Marquess of Salisbury), the Lord Steward (the Duke of Montrose), the Earl of Eglinton, and Lord Colchester—being seated, and the Commons, who were summoned, being come, the Right Hon. Charles Shaw Lefevre, Speaker elect, addressing the Lords Commissioners, said: My Lords, I have to acquaint your Lordships that, in obedience to Her Majesty's commands, and in the exercise of their undoubted privilege, Her Majesty's faithful Commons have proceeded to the election of a Speaker, and that their choice has fallen upon me. Deeply impressed with a sense of my own unworthiness, I now submit myself for Her Majesty's gracious approbation.

The LORD CHANCELLOR: Mr. Shaw Lefevre, we are commanded by Her Majesty to assure you that Her Majesty is satisfied of your ample sufficiency to discharge the important duties which Her faithful Commons have elected you to perform, and that Her Majesty most fully approves and confirms their choice.

MR. SPEAKER: My Lords, I bow with all humility to Her Majesty's Royal will and pleasure. It now becomes my duty, in the name and on the behalf of the Commons of the United Kingdom, to lay claim, by humble petition to Her Majesty, to all their ancient and undoubted rights and privileges; more especially to those of freedom of debate, freedom from arrest for themselves and their servants, free access to Her Majesty whenever occasion may require; and that Her Majesty will be pleased to place the most favourable construction upon all their proceedings. For myself, I humbly entreat that any error which may be committed may be imputed to me alone, and not to Her Majesty's faithful Commons.

The LORD CHANCELLOR: Mr. Speaker, we have it further in command from Her Majesty to inform you that Her Majesty most readily confirms all the rights, liberties, and privileges which have ever been granted to or conferred upon Her faithful Commons, either by Her Majesty or by any of Her Royal predecessors. With respect to yourself, Sir, although Her Majesty is sensible you will stand in need of no such indulgence, we are commanded to assure you that Her Majesty will ever put the most favourable construction on your words and actions, as well as on those of Her faithful Commons.

Then the Commons withdrew.

Friday, November 5, 1852.

The House met—at Two o'clock.

APPROVAL OF THE SPEAKER.

The Speaker Elect took the chair at Two o'clock.

Message from the Lords Commissioners, desiring the immediate attendance of the House in the House of Lords.

The House went:—and being returned,

MR. SPEAKER said: I have to report to the House that the House has been this day to the House of Peers, where I have had the honour of communicating to the Lords Commissioners appointed by Her Majesty, that this House, in the exercise of its undoubted privilege, had proceeded to the election of a Speaker, and that their choice had fallen upon me; which choice Her Majesty's Commissioners were pleased to signify had received Her Majesty's Royal confirmation. Whereupon I made my humble petition to Her Majesty, in the name and on the behalf of the Commons of the United Kingdom, for all their ancient and undoubted rights and privileges, especially those of freedom of debate, freedom from arrest for themselves and their servants, free access to Her Majesty whenever occasion may require, and that Her Majesty would be graciously pleased to place the most favourable construction on all their proceedings. All which privileges the Lords Commissioners were pleased to signify Her Majesty conceded to as full an extent as they had ever been conceded by any of Her Majesty's Royal predecessors. Having made this communication to the House, I hope hon. Members will allow me to take this opportunity of again offering my sincere and grateful acknowledgments for the very honourable distinction they have again conferred upon me by placing me, for the fourth time, in this chair as their Speaker. I invite them to aid and assist me with their counsel and support in maintaining the authority of the chair; and I hope I may assure them that, as far as lies in my power, that authority will be exercised with perfect impartiality, and in the manner most conducive to the public interests, and to the honour and dignity of the House. I will now remind hon. Members that the only business with which we can at present proceed is to take the oaths as prescribed by law.

Mr. Speaker then took the Oaths, first alone; and after him several other Members took the Oaths.

House adjourned at a quarter after Four o'clock.

THE QUEEN'S SPEECH.

THE QUEEN being seated on the Throne, and the Commons being at the Bar, with their Speaker, HER MAJESTY was pleased to make a most Gracious Speech to both Houses of Parliament as follows :—

“ My Lords, and Gentlemen,

“ I CANNOT meet you for the first Time after the Dissolution of Parliament without expressing My deep Sorrow, in which I am sure you will participate, that your Deliberations can no longer be aided by the Counsels of that illustrious Man whose great Achievements have exalted the Name of England, and in whose Loyalty and Patriotism the Interests of My Throne and of My People ever found an unfailing Support. I rely with Confidence on your Desire to join with Me in taking such Steps as may mark your Sense of the irreparable Loss which the Country has sustained by the Death of Arthur Duke of Wellington.

“ I AM happy to acknowledge the Readiness with which My Subjects in general have come forward, in pursuance of the Act of last Session, to join the Ranks of the Militia; and I confidently trust that the Force thus raised by voluntary Enlistment will be calculated to give effective Aid to My regular Army for the Protection and Security of the Country.

“ I CONTINUE to receive from all Foreign Powers Assurances of their anxious Desire to maintain the friendly Relations now happily subsisting with My Government.

“ FREQUENT and well-founded Complaints on the Part of My North American Colonies, of Infractions, by Citizens of the United States, of the Fishery Convention of 1818, induced Me to despatch, for the Protection of their Interests, a Class of Vessels better adapted to the Service than those which had been previously employed. This Step has led to Discussions with the Government of the United States; and while the Rights of My Subjects have been firmly maintained, the friendly Spirit in which the Question has been treated induces Me to hope that the ultimate Result may be a mutually beneficial Extension and Improvement of our Commercial Intercourse with that great Republic.

“ THE special Mission which, in concert with the Prince President of the French Republic, I deemed it right to send to the Argentine Confederation, has been received with the utmost Cordiality; and the wise and enlightened Policy of the Provisional Director has already opened to the Commerce of the World the great Rivers, hitherto closed, which afford an Access to the Interior of the vast Continent of South America.

“ I HAVE the Satisfaction of announcing to you that the sincere and zealous

Efforts of the Government of Brazil for the Suppression of the Slave Trade, now nearly extinguished on that Coast, have enabled Me to suspend the stringent Measures which I had been compelled reluctantly to adopt, a Recurrence to which I anxiously hope may be proved to be unnecessary.

"THE Government of Her Most Faithful Majesty have fully recognized the Justice of the Claim which My Government have long urged for the Abolition of the discriminating Duties on the Export of Wine, and have passed a Decree for giving complete Effect to the Stipulations of the Treaty on this Subject.

"You will probably deem it advisable to resume the Inquiries which were commenced by the late Parliament with a view to Legislation on the Subject of the future Government of My East Indian Possessions.

"Gentlemen of the House of Commons,

"THE Estimates for the ensuing Year will in due Time be laid before you.

"THE advancement of the Fine Arts and of Practical Science will be readily recognized by you as worthy of the Attention of a great and enlightened Nation. I have directed that a comprehensive Scheme shall be laid before you, having in view the Promotion of these Objects, towards which I invite your Aid and Co-operation.

"My Lords, and Gentlemen,

"It gives Me Pleasure to be enabled, by the blessing of Providence, to congratulate you on the generally improved Condition of the Country, and especially of the Industrious Classes. If you should be of opinion that recent Legislation in contributing, with other Causes, to this happy Result, has at the same time inflicted unavoidable Injury on certain important Interests, I recommend you dispassionately to consider how far it may be practicable equitably to mitigate that Injury, and to enable the Industry of the Country to meet successfully that unrestricted Competition to which Parliament, in its Wisdom, has decided that it should be subjected.

"I TRUST that the general Improvement, notwithstanding many Obstacles, has extended to Ireland; and while I rely with Confidence on your Aid, should it be required, to restrain that unhappy Spirit of Insubordination and Turbulence which produces many and aggravates all of the Evils which afflict that Portion of My Dominions, I recommend to you the Adoption of such a liberal and generous Policy towards Ireland as may encourage and assist her to rally from the Depression in which she has been sunk by the Sufferings of late Years.

"ANXIOUS to promote the Efficiency of every Branch of our National Church, I have thought fit to issue a Commission to inquire and report to Me how far, in their Opinion, the Capitular Institutions of the Country are capable of being made more effective for the great Objects of Religious Worship, Religious Education, and Ecclesiastical Discipline.

"I HAVE directed that the Reports of the Commissioners for inquiring into the System of Education pursued at Oxford and Cambridge should be communicated to the governing Bodies of those Universities, for their Consideration; and I rely upon your Readiness ness to remove any legal Difficulties which may impede the Desire of the Universities at large, or of the several Colleges, to introduce such Amendments into their existing System as they may deem to be more in accordance with the Requirements of the present Time.

“THE System of Secondary Punishments has usefully occupied the Labours of successive Parliaments; and I shall rejoice if you shall find it possible to devise Means by which, without giving Encouragement to Crime, Transportation to Van Diemen's Land may at no distant Period be altogether discontinued.

“THE Subject of Legal Reform continues to engage My anxious Attention. The Acts passed in the last Session of Parliament have been followed up by the Orders necessary for putting them in operation. Inquiries are in progress, by My Direction, with a view of bringing into Harmony the Testamentary Jurisdiction of My several Courts; and Bills will be submitted to you for effecting further Improvements in the Administration of the Law.

“To these and other Measures affecting the Social condition of the Country I am persuaded that you will give your earnest and zealous Attention, and I pray that by the Blessing of Almighty God your Deliberations may be guided to the Well-being and Happiness of My People.”

HER MAJESTY then retired.

ADDRESS IN ANSWER TO THE SPEECH.

THE QUEEN'S Speech having been reported by the Lord Chancellor,

The EARL of DONOUGHMORE rose to move that an Humble Address be presented to Her Majesty in reply to the gracious Speech which She had that day delivered from the Throne. In doing so, he claimed the forbearance of their Lordships while, in accordance with the course usually followed on such occasions, he made some observations—and he assured the House that in doing so, he would endeavour to restrict those observations within the smallest possible compass consistent with the importance and variety of the subjects alluded to—on the different topics alluded to in that Speech. During the last Session of Parliament, one of the principal measures passed was the Act for embodying the Militia. It was necessary that the people of this country should be placed in a position capable of resisting foreign invasion—not because such invasion was probable from any quarter, but because a great country like ours ought always to be ready to meet the possibility of such danger, not merely in a satisfactory but in a triumphant manner. It was a most satisfactory consideration that this measure had proved eminently successful. The population had everywhere readily and voluntarily come forward to fill the ranks of the Militia, and in very few instances, indeed, would it be necessary to have recourse to the ballot. The officers also of the corps which had been raised had exerted themselves in the most praiseworthy manner to train and discipline the men, and in no instance had any want of zeal or willingness been experienced. The condition of the Foreign Affairs of the country, their Lordships would rejoice to be informed, was satisfactory. Her Majesty said that “She continued to receive from all Foreign Powers assurances of their anxious desire to maintain the friendly relations so happily subsisting at present with Her Government.” He could not, however, quit this part of the subject without expressing his humble opinion that the course which some part of the press of this country were pursuing on subjects of foreign politics was not only injudicious but mischievous. The ruler of a neighbouring nation had been subject to unmeasured abuse from a large portion of the public press. The people of England ought not to enter on a system of political propagandism. He apprehended that it was not at this day the feeling of the British nation that it would be wise or expedient to force on foreign nations any particular form of government; the example of France at the end of last century, and the sufferings she had endured from her insane attempt to force her form of government on the rest of Europe, should be a warning to us. He believed that in all parts of this country there was a deep feeling of attachment to the constitution under which we lived, and to the institutions by which we were governed, and a great appreciation of the benefits we derived from them; but that was not a reason why we should endeavour to force our system of government on other nations, or to cover them with invectives because they preferred their own. The French, for reasons best known to themselves, had thought proper to organise their government and constitution anew, as undoubtedly they had a perfect right to do; but whatever our opinion might be as to their proceedings, he hoped that opinion would not be made the ground of unjust and mischievous demonstrations on the part of any amongst us, and that there would be an end to the abuse which had been heaped on the head of the new ruler of France. He would only add that at the commencement of the last Session of Parliament, a similar opinion had been delivered in their Lordships' House by the noble Earl now at the head of the Government, and by the noble Marquess opposite (the Marquess of Lansdowne). The next question to which Her Majesty's Speech referred was that of the Fishery Convention with the United States; and as he believed the recent disagreements on this subject between England and the United States arose from a total misconception on the part of the latter country of the terms of the Convention, he would take the liberty of saying a few words on the circumstances of the case. The Convention of Commerce between England and the United States was signed at London the 20th of October, 1818. The first article was in the following terms:—

“Whereas differences have arisen respecting the liberty claimed by the United States, for the inhabitants thereof, to take, dry and cure fish, on certain coasts, bays, harbours and creeks, of his Britannic Majesty's dominions in America, it is agreed between the high contracting parties, that the inhabitants of the said United States shall have, for ever, in common with the subjects of his Britannic Majesty, the liberty to take fish of every kind on that part of the southern coast of Newfoundland which extends from Cape Ray to the Rameau islands, on the western and northern coast of Newfoundland, from the said Cape Ray to the Quipron islands on the shores of the Magdalen islands, and also on the coasts, bays, harbours and creeks, from Mount Joly, on the southern coast of Labrador, to and through the Straights of Belleisle, and thence northwardly indefinitely along the coast, without prejudice however to any of the exclusive rights of the Hudson's Bay Company. And that the American fishermen shall also have liberty, for ever, to dry and cure fish in any of the unsettled bays, harbours and creeks of the southern part of the coast of Newfoundland hereabove described, and of the coast of Labrador; but so soon as the same, or any portion thereof, shall be settled, it shall not be lawful for the said fishermen to dry or cure fish at such portion so settled, without previous agreement for such purpose, with the inhabitants, proprietors, or possessors of the ground. And the United States hereby renounce, for ever, any liberty heretofore enjoyed or claimed by the inhabitants thereof, to take, dry, or cure fish, on or within three marine miles of any of the coasts, bays, creeks or harbours of his Britannic Majesty's dominions in America, not included within the above-mentioned limits: provided, however, that the American fishermen shall be admitted to enter such bays or harbours, for the purpose of shelter and of repairing damages therein, of purchasing wood, and of obtaining water, and for no other purpose whatever. But that they shall be under such restrictions as may be necessary to prevent their taking, drying, or curing fish therein, or in any other manner whatever abusing the privileges hereby reserved to them.”

It was necessary to state that this Convention had been maintained by the authorities of this country, and that a force had been sent immediately after its conclusion sufficient to express our determination to insist on the rights given to by it. From June, 1821, to October, 1851, thirty-five American fishing-vessels had been seized and adjudicated on in the new Admiralty Court of Halifax: but of late, complaints had been received in great numbers from our colonies that infringements were made daily of the treaty of 1818. There was a great call for the establishment of a new marine police to guard our rights and protect our interests. In former years it was our custom to send to the North American station a small number of large vessels; but latterly a larger number of smaller vessels had been sent, which had proved much more effectual in protecting our fishermen. In consequence of these proceedings on our part, some complaints were made by the United States, and a discussion arose as to the words of the treaty, and as to what was meant by the distance of three marine miles from any of the coasts, bays, &c. It turned out that the most valuable part of the fishery was within the distance of three miles from the coast; and that, even if Her Majesty had been inclined, as She was not, to surrender Her rights under the treaty, the United States would not have been entitled to enjoy any part of that fishery which was most valuable—namely, the mackerel fishery. Whatever feeling had been created in the United States by the proceedings of our Government, there was reason now to hope that the Government of the United States was disposed to negotiate cordially on the point, and that great and important commercial advantages would be gained to our North American Colonies by the settlement of the question. His Lordship then referred to the next paragraph in Her Majesty's Speech relative to the recent opening of the great rivers of South America. It would be in their Lordships' recollection that in the last Session of Parliament, the noble Lord opposite (Lord Beaumont) had made a Motion on the subject of the great internal waters of South America. At that time the Dictator, Rosas, who had for years refused access to our shipping to the great rivers of the territories over which he ruled, had been hurled from power, and hopes were entertained that his successors would adopt a more liberal policy. It was most satisfactory to know that all the objects contemplated by the noble Lord and others who took part in that discussion had been accomplished; a joint mission of an envoy of Her Majesty, together with one from the President of the French Republic, had been most cordially received at Buenos Ayres, and the whole of the internal waters of the Argentine Confederation had been thrown open to foreign commerce. It was scarcely possible to estimate the benefit which our trade would derive from this measure. One whole State—the Republic of Paraguay—would now for the first time be opened to us, and our produce could now be conveyed, through these newly-opened channels, nearly to the foot of the Andes. The next paragraph of the Speech adverted to the efforts recently made by the Brazilian Government for the suppression of the slave trade. It would be in the recollection of their Lordships that the Government of Brazil had entered into a convention with this country on the 23rd of November, 1826, subsequently ratified in London on the 13th of March, 1827, whereby the slave trade was declared to be piracy after three years from the date of ratification. A law against the slave trade was subsequently enacted by Brazil on the 7th of November, 1831; but it proved ineffective. A large number of slaves were annually imported into Brazil for several years afterwards. In 1842 the number of slaves landed in Brazil was 17,435, and in 1848 it had increased to 60,000. The law enacted by Brazil in September, 1850, and the subsequent decrees of the 14th of October and the 14th of November, 1850, had, however, been more effective. In 1849 the number of slaves landed in Brazil amounted to 54,000, but in 1850 it sank to 23,000, and in 1851 to 3,287. He therefore hoped that in a very short time the importation of slaves to Brazil would entirely cease. The slave trade was now principally directed to Cuba, the only part of America in which at present it was carried on to any extent. The means at the disposal of Government for the suppression of this infamous traffic could now be concentrated against the Cuban trade, and we might hope that soon the slave trade would exist only in history. Her Majesty had also informed them that the Portuguese Government had fully recognised the justice of the claim which our Government have long urged for the abolition of the discriminating duties on the export of wine, and have passed a decree for giving complete effect to the stipulations of the treaty on this subject; and he (the Earl of Donoughmore) thought the noble Lord the present Foreign Secretary (Lord Malmesbury), deserved great credit for the successful issue to which the negotiations on this subject had been brought. Her Majesty next alluded to the affairs of India. The Committee which sat last Session on the subject rendered it advisable to resume the inquiries which had been already commenced with a view to legislation on the subject of the future government of our East India empire. A very large addition had been made of late years to our territory, and a war was now proceeding which was very likely to lead to still further additions. Her Majesty next congratulated Parliament and the country on the generally improved condition of the nation, and the prosperous state of the industrious classes. He fully concurred in these congratulations. It gave him great pleasure to acknowledge that the state of the manufacturing population and the industrious classes generally was at present most satisfactory. A difference of opinion might and no doubt did exist on the cause of our prosperity; but he was disposed to admit that the improved condition of the working classes might be attributed to the cheapness of their food. The increased importation of gold, and the large amount of emigration to Australia and America, might also have contributed to it. His Lordship then referred to the paragraph in the Speech relative to the general improvement of Ireland

after its many years of care and suffering. The sufferings which the people of Ireland had endured were not to be described, and could only be understood by those who, like himself, had witnessed them. That unhappy country, however, was now, he was happy to state, slowly recovering from the slough of despond in which she had been so unfortunately plunged. He rejoiced to think that the policy which he understood the Government of the noble Earl intended to pursue towards Ireland was so just and good. Ireland must not be treated according to the cold and formal theories of political economy—she was in a peculiar position, and required peculiar treatment—she required indulgent care—she needed the paternal hand of Government to assist her in recovering from her exhaustion—to develop her resources, and gradually to establish a sound system. He was sorry, however, to remark upon some dark features in the picture of Irish affairs—he alluded to those disturbances and murders which had recently occurred there. One would have thought that the scenes of ruin and desolation which had taken place throughout the island would have taught the Irish people the absolute necessity of obedience to the laws, and that from the observance of the laws they were alone to expect prosperity; but it seemed that the terrible lesson had, at least to some extent, been lost upon them, and that insubordination and violence prevailed in many districts. He hoped the Government would assist to their utmost in developing the resources of Ireland, and encouraging industry and trade, but, at the same time, outrage must be repressed, and the power of the law must be maintained. Obedience to the law was an ingredient of the first necessity towards the tranquillity and regeneration of Ireland. The noble Earl then alluded to the following paragraph in the Royal Speech:—

The National Church must always be an object of solicitude to their Lordships, but, like all ancient institutions, it needed reform; but those reforms must be administered with a tender hand. It was worth their Lordships' while to inquire whether those capitular institutions and our great Universities might not be made more consonant to the wants of the age; but the rights of the National Church should not be in any manner endangered by those reforms. Her Majesty had alluded to the question of University reform:—

“I have directed that the reports of the Commissioners for inquiring into the system of education pursued at Oxford and Cambridge should be communicated to the governing bodies of those Universities, for their consideration, and I rely upon your readiness to remove any legal difficulties which may impede the desire of the Universities at large, or of the several Colleges, to introduce such amendments into their existing system as they may deem to be more in accordance with the requirements of the present time.”

The question of University reform was akin to that of ecclesiastical reform. He thought the Universities should have the power of reforming themselves, and he hoped Parliament would confer on them such powers as were necessary to enable the heads of them to adapt those venerable seats of learning to the wants of the age. Her Majesty had also alluded to the question of transportation:—

This question had long occupied the attention of their Lordships. The Colonies had often remonstrated against the present system, and the Government were anxious to find out some other mode of punishment which would not entail the evils now complained of. He had stated that the Militia law was the great Act of last Session, but there was one other great measure also which had been passed into law, he meant that of legal reform. Her Majesty observed upon it—

“The subject of legal reform continues to engage my anxious attention. The Acts passed in the last Session of Parliament have been followed up by the orders necessary for putting them in operation; inquiries are in progress, by my direction, with a view of bringing into harmony the testamentary jurisdiction of my several courts; and Bills will be submitted to you for effecting further improvements in the administration of the law.”

He felt sure that all their Lordships would concur with him in thanking the noble and learned Lord on the woolsack for the zeal, ability, and perseverance which he had shown in carrying out the intentions of the Legislature. The Government, he was happy to say, did not propose to stop the progress of these reforms, but were prepared to bring in other measures which he trusted would meet their Lordships' concurrence. The noble Lords on the other side had arrogated to themselves the title of reformers. He did not quarrel with that designation, but he must apply the same epithet to noble Lords on his side of the House; and certainly the noble and learned Lord on the woolsack had proved himself well deserving of the name of reformer—for he believed none had done so much in the same time to promote legal reform, and place those reforms upon a sound principle. He had thought it better to reserve the most prominent paragraph in the Speech for the last subject of his observations. He believed their Lordships, in common with the whole nation, felt as one man with respect to the illustrious deceased—that great man who had in youth fought our battles, and who in age had guided our councils—that chair, which was now vacant, was that which their Lordships were long accustomed to see filled by the venerable presence of the Duke of Wellington, who, with painful solicitude, from the advancing weakness of mortality, endeavoured to catch the words which fell from their Lordships, and continued at more than fourscore years to discharge his public duty to the last. So much had been said, and so ably said, by public writers and orators—from the press, from the pulpit and the platform—upon the great features of the Duke's character, that it was unnecessary for him to dwell upon them at any length; but there was one point in his character which he thought had not been sufficiently dwelt upon—that his loss was not so much a loss to this nation as to the whole world. As a soldier he restored the equilibrium of Europe, and evoked order out of chaos, and in after years as a civilian, he preserved, by his moderation and good counsel, that peace which he had established by his genius and his valour. When that great man's ashes were laid in St. Paul's, his remains would be followed not by Englishmen only, but by deputations from most of the great nations of Europe. He had left behind him memorials of his worth which would live as long as the literature of the country lasted—documents not remarkable for their eloquence and fine writing, but the character of the man was stamped upon the despatches of the Duke of Wellington in a manner unmistakeable; and the pages of those remarkable volumes would be read with interest and with advantage in ages still far distant. From one comment which had been made on his death, he begged leave to dissent. Now that he was gone, it was said that, if an European war should unfortunately break out, we should have no general capable of directing the action of the war, and of leading our troops on to victory. To that assertion he could not assent; for, in his opinion, the Duke of Wellington would have lived in vain, had he not inspired Englishmen by his example to follow in the course which he himself had run. He believed that there were many men now living who had drunk from the holy fountain which he had opened, and who were anxious to emulate his bright example. He believed that if a day should come when it was necessary to fight our battle on our own shores, we should find a hero equal to the occasion, and that among the officers formed under Wellington's eye, and by his precepts, there would be no lack of men capable of confronting the best chieftain which our enemies might bring against them. The noble Earl (who was throughout very indistinctly heard) then concluded by moving—"That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, in answer to Her gracious Speech from the Throne."

"MOST GRACIOUS SOVEREIGN,

"WE, Your Majesty's most dutiful and loyal Subjects, the Lords Spiritual and Temporal, in Parliament assembled, beg leave to return Your Majesty our humble Thanks for Your Majesty's most gracious Speech from the Throne.

"WE beg leave to assure Your Majesty of our Participation in the deep Sorrow which Your Majesty in meeting us has been pleased to express, that our Deliberations can no longer be aided by the Counsels of that illustrious Man whose great Achievements have exalted the Name of England, and in whose Loyalty and Patriotism the Interests of Your Majesty's Throne and People ever found an unfailing Support.

"WE beg also to assure Your Majesty that we cordially desire to join with Your Majesty in taking such Steps as may mark our Sense of the irreparable Loss which the Country has sustained by the Death of Arthur Duke of Wellington.

"WE thank Your Majesty for Your Majesty's gracious Acknowledgement of the Readiness with which your Majesty's Subjects in general have come forward, in pursuance of the Act of last Session, to join the Ranks of the Militia ; and for the expression of Your Majesty's confident Trust that the Force thus raised by voluntary Elistment will be calculated to give effective Aid to Your Majesty's regular Army for the Protection and Security of the Country.

" We thank Your Majesty for informing us that Your Majesty continues to receive from all Foreign Powers Assurances of their anxious Desire to maintain the friendly Relations now happily subsisting with Your Majesty's Government.

" We beg humbly to thank Your Majesty for the Information that frequent and well-founded Complaints on the Part of Your Majesty's North American Colonies, of Infractions, by Citizens of the United States, of the Fishery Convention of 1818, have induced Your Majesty to despatch, for the Protection of their Interests, a Class of Vessels better adapted to the Service than those which had been previously employed ; that this Step has led to Discussions with the Government of the United States; and that, while the Rights of Your Majesty's Subjects have been firmly maintained, the friendly Spirit in which the Question has been treated induces Your Majesty to hope that the ultimate Result may be a mutually beneficial Extension and Improvement of our Commercial Intercourse with that great Republic.

" We thank Your Majesty for informing us that the special Mission which, in concert with the Prince President of the French Republic, Your Majesty deemed it right to send to the Argentine Confederation, has been received with the utmost Cordiality ; and that the wise and enlightened Policy of the Provisional Director has already opened to the Commerce of the World the great Rivers, hitherto closed, which afford an Access to the Interior of the vast Continent of South America.

" We humbly assure Your Majesty that we receive with Satisfaction the Announcement that the sincere and zealous Efforts of the Government of Brazil for the Suppression of the Slave Trade, now nearly extinguished on that Coast, have enabled Your Majesty to suspend the stringent Measures which Your Majesty had been compelled reluctantly to adopt, a Recurrence to which we, in common with Your Majesty, anxiously hope may be proved to be unnecessary.

" We thank Your Majesty for informing us that the Government of Her Most Faithful Majesty have fully recognized the Justice of the Claim which Your Majesty's Government have long urged for the Abolition of the discriminating Duties on the Export of Wine, and have passed a Decree for giving complete Effect to the Stipulations of the Treaty on this Subject.

" We beg leave to express our humble Concurrence with Your Majesty in the Opinion that it will be advisable to resume the Inquiries which were commenced by the late Parliament with a view to Legislation on the Subject of the future Government of Your Majesty's East Indian Possessions.

" We humbly assure Your Majesty that we participate in the Pleasure which Your Majesty is pleased to express at being enabled, by the Blessing of Providence, to congratulate us on the generally improved Condition of the Country, and especially of the Industrious Classes ; and we beg humbly to thank Your Majesty for Your Majesty's gracious Recommendation that if we should be of opinion that recent Legislation in contributing, with other Causes, to this happy Result, has at the same Time inflicted unavoidable Injury on certain important Interests, we should dispassionately consider how far it may be practicable equitably to mitigate that Injury, and to enable the Industry of the Country to meet successfully that unrestricted Competition to which Parliament, in its Wisdom, has decided that it should be subjected.

" We thank Your Majesty for the Information that Your Majesty trusts that the general Improvement, notwithstanding many Obstacles, has extended to Ireland ; and we assure Your Majesty that while Your Majesty may rely with Confidence on our Aid, should it be required, to restrain that unhappy Spirit of Insubordination and Turbulence which produces many and aggravates all of the Evils which affect that Portion of Your Majesty's Dominions, we shall readily attend to Your Majesty's gracious Recommendation that we should adopt such a liberal and generous Policy towards Ireland as may encourage and assist her to rally from the Depression in which she has been sunk by the sufferings of late Years.

" We thank Your Majesty for informing us that Your Majesty, anxious to promote the Efficiency of every Branch of our National Church, has thought fit to issue a Commission to inquire and report to Your Majesty how far, in their Opinion, the Capitular Institutions of the Country are capable of being made more effective for the great Objects of Religious Worship, Religious Education, and Ecclesiastical Discipline.

" We beg humbly to thank Your Majesty for directing that the Reports of the Commissioners for inquiring into the System of Education pursued at Oxford and Cambridge should be communicated to the governing Bodies of those Universities, for their Consideration ; and we humbly assure Your Majesty that Your Majesty may rely upon our Readiness to remove any legal Difficulties which may impede the Desire of the Universities at large, or of the several Colleges, to introduce such Amendments into their existing System as they may deem to be more in accordance with the Requirements of the present Time.

“We humbly beg to assure Your Majesty that we concur in the Opinion that the System of Secondary Punishments has usefully occupied the Labours of successive Parliaments; and that we shall rejoice with Your Majesty if we shall find it possible to devise Means by which, without giving Encouragement to Crime, Transportation to Van Diemen's Land may at no distant Period be altogether discontinued.

“We thank Your Majesty for informing us that the Subject of Legal Reform continues to engage Your Majesty's anxious attention; that the Acts passed in the last Session of Parliament have been followed up by the Orders necessary for putting them in operation; that Inquiries are in progress, by Your Majesty's Direction, with a view of bringing into Harmony the Testamentary Jurisdiction of Your Majesty's several Courts; and that Bills will be submitted to us for effecting further Improvements in the Administration of the Law.

“We humbly beg to assure Your Majesty that to these and other Measures affecting the Social Condition of the Country we shall give our earnest and zealous Attention, and that we join most fervently in Your Majesty's Prayer that by the Blessing of Almighty God our Deliberations may be guided to the Well-being and Happiness of Your Majesty's People.”

The MARQUESS of BATH rose to second the Address. He said, that he must begin by entreating their Lordships to make allowances for the deficiencies of one who then addressed the House for the first time; and by their Lordships' kind indulgence he would proceed to make a few observations in support of the Motion which had been made by the noble Earl. The first topic in Her Majesty's Speech was the death of that lamented hero the Duke of Wellington. Her Majesty said—

“I cannot meet you for the first time, after the dissolution of Parliament, without expressing my deep sorrow, in which I am sure you will participate, that your deliberations can no longer be aided by the counsels of that illustrious man, whose great achievements have exalted the name of England, and in whose loyalty and patriotism the interests of my throne and of my people ever found an unfailing support. I rely with confidence on your desire to join with me in taking such steps as may mark your sense of the irreparable loss which the country has sustained by the death of Arthur Duke of Wellington.”

He was sure the sentiments expressed by Her Majesty, when She condoled with them on so great a loss, would find an echo in the heart of every class of Her Majesty's subjects, and in none more than in their Lordships' House. The memory of the great Duke would be ever revered by his countrymen as that of one who was the exemplar and type of those great national virtues, devotion to the Sovereign, and attachment to the constitution, which distinguished the people of this country. If the illustrious warrior had been still living, he had no doubt that he would view with satisfaction the happy results of that measure on which he himself bestowed so much attention, and on which he addressed their Lordships—he rather thought on the last time he ever spoke in that House—with so much authority and with so great effect. He alluded to the Militia Bill, which was the next subject to which Her Majesty alluded in Her Speech, in which She expressed Her acknowledgments for the manner in which the people had cheerfully come forward in the discharge of their duties; and it was gratifying to observe that all classes had submitted with readiness to the requirements of the public service, that volunteers had come forward with alacrity, and that at the present moment nearly all the regiments had completed their full complements. Great praise was due, therefore, to the officers for the prompt way in which they had discharged their duty, and to the people of this country, who had so readily responded to the call that had been made upon them. By their conduct on this occasion the people of England had declared that though, at the present moment, there was nothing to fear from any foreign Power, and that though foreign affairs could not be in a more satisfactory condition than at present, yet, that if any change were to occur hereafter, their country would be protected, and that they had nothing to dread for their altars and their homes; and that, whatever dangers threatened, they would prove that they had never lost that love for their country and their constitution which justly distinguished them over every other nation in the world. He would not trouble their Lordships with any remarks on the present state of foreign affairs, though the settlement of the fisheries question with America—which if not in so satisfactory a condition as might be wished, could not fail being satisfactory to their Lordships—at least secured to this country assurances of a desire to maintain peace and friendly relations; and he would therefore proceed to that passage of the Speech in which Her Majesty congratulated the Legislature on the prosperity of the country, and more especially of the industrious classes. It might be that this prosperity was the result of recent legislation, aided, perhaps, by the influx of gold from the colonies and Australia, and by the emigration which had carried away the surplus population, whereby the competition of labour was rendered less severe. The condition of the manufacturing interests and of the operatives throughout the country might be flourishing; but, though they might recognise the good effects of recent measures in these instances, they must not forget that certain very important classes of Her Majesty's subjects had not been so prosperous. The agricultural interest certainly was labouring under depression, and was suffering distress, which had been increased by those measures that had proved so much to the advantage of other classes. The agricultural interest had undoubtedly sustained considerable injury from the new system of finance; but however much they had suffered themselves, he knew that they had no wish to impede or obstruct measures productive of so much good to the rest of their fellow subjects. They were ready to aid and assist in every way they could in the full carrying out of that system. But although its benefits had been felt by the great majority of the industrial classes of the community, still it must be remembered a large portion of the nation, not less loyal, not less industrious, was suffering. He, therefore, hoped that their Lordships would dispassionately consider Her Majesty's gracious recommendation on this subject—

“To consider how far it may be practicable equitably to mitigate that injury, and to enable the industry of the country to meet successfully that unrestricted competition to which Parliament, in its wisdom, has decided that it should be subjected.”

He trusted their Lordships would attend to that recommendation, and that it might be practicable to find some alleviation of the distress of the agricultural interest which would not interfere with the system of policy the country had adopted, and devise some equitable measure of relief for the agricultural interest, that would not interfere with the system of policy which the country had now adopted, and equalise their condition to that of the rest of their fellow subjects. The noble Marquess, after briefly expressing his concurrence in the portions of the Speech

having reference to Ireland, and to the reform of Oxford and Cambridge Universities, said he would not trouble their Lordships with any further remarks, but would content himself with simply seconding the Address in answer to the Royal Speech which the noble Earl had moved.

The MARQUESS of LANSDOWNE: My Lords, I confess that I should not perhaps have felt it my duty to address your Lordships at all on this occasion after the Royal Speech which has been made, and the Address which has been moved, were it not for the circumstance that the greatest feature in that Speech—the most prominent feature at its commencement, and at the commencement of the Address which the noble Lord (the Earl of Donoughmore) has proposed, is one to which I feel it my duty, not to call your Lordships' attention, because your Lordships' attention is already fixed upon it, but on which I feel it my duty to make some few remarks. For, although I do not feel myself authorised, either on this or on any other subject, to speak the sentiments and feelings of any large body of persons in this House, I perhaps have some claim, as an individual, to address your Lordships on this topic, not merely because, owing to the great personal respect that I entertained for the noble Duke whom we have lost—who is lost to the country and lost to our councils—not merely because without any political connexion whatever with that noble Duke, he has done me the honour at times to consider me as his friend; and on the very last occasion on which he addressed this House, he did me the honour to speak of me in those terms; but because as one of, perhaps, the oldest Members of the House, I remember the whole of that noble duke's military and Parliamentary career. My Lords, I stand in somewhat of a peculiar situation before your Lordships, addressing you on this subject, because it may not be known to the greater number of your Lordships—indeed, there are not many now alive to recollect it—that the individual who has now the honour of addressing you, some forty-seven years ago in his place in the other House of Parliament, when young in his Parliamentary life, was permitted and authorised by his colleagues of that time to call on that other House to do justice to the memory and to provide for the family of one of the greatest heroes that ever lived, and with whom alone in the military annals of this country the noble Duke now no more could be compared. It was, my Lords, in the year 1807—at a time of great difficulty and a great crisis in the military affairs of this country—that the country was compelled by a stroke of fate to lose the services of the greatest admiral that ever distinguished this country, and who then fell in the arms of victory—

And weltering in his blood.”

There was then but one unanimous feeling on that subject; but when I addressed the House of Commons upon it I was then but imperfectly aware—those whom I addressed were also but imperfectly aware—that at the very moment when that great man had raised the Navy of this country to the highest pinnacle of perfection and of glory, there was rising in the far East another man destined to perform the same great services by the Army of this country, and to raise it—by efforts constantly directed to that object, by the most unremitting study, the most untiring efforts, and the greatest practical skill—to a position in which it afterwards asserted the dignity of this country throughout the world, and established that high character which, thank God, the British Army, under his peaceful administration, as well as under his military career, have never forfeited. Such were the characters of these two illustrious men—differing from each other undoubtedly, as men do in particular points of their character, but resembling each other in all that was great and excellent—directing their attention to one great object—not indifferent, either of them, undoubtedly (as who is indifferent?) to the praise of others; but never allowing that praise to divert them for one moment from the service of their country, but making the honour of the Crown and the safety of the people the sole object of that unconquerable energy which regulated them in all the paths of duty. My Lords, I feel—any man may feel—proud of having lived with such cotemporaries. I have been reminded, in speaking of them, of that expression which is to be found in one of the most English of our poets, when adverting to the great men of his time, and speaking of the character of England and of Englishmen at that day, he says—Enough to him,

“ That Chatham’s language was his mother tongue,
And Wolfe’s great name compatriot with his own !”

This I can well apply to the great man to whom I allude; and I am sure that the country will feel with me that it is a sufficient gratification of the pride which an Englishman ought to feel in his country and in its history, that he has lived to see in the same age two such men, of such actions, uniformly directed to the public good. My Lords, in selecting these great men as the glory of their age and their country, I do not mean to overlook the fact, that during the same time and through the same lengthened period there has arisen genius of another kind—that the arts and sciences have not been dormant, and that men of great capacity, great industry, and great patriotism have helped to make this country what she is—have contributed, and essentially contributed, to her prosperity, her wealth, and her greatness. But, my Lords, we must always recollect, when we are called on to do honour to the heads of the military profession, that our wealth, our prosperity, and our commerce would cease to be secure unless it was protected. Let it be remembered that, to whatever pitch and to whatever extent the manufacturing and the commercial industry of the country may be carried, and whatever accumulation of capital may find itself employed and settled on our shores, that that capital and that industry would disappear at once, and instead of attracting the eye, would attract the rapacity of the world, if for a moment it was supposed to be defenceless. This is our position. For be assured, my Lords, that in the present state of the world, and in that state in which it must long continue, it is not merely to industry—however laudable as that industry is—it is not merely to science and to art, in their civil characters—noble as those pursuits are—that you can alone look for the continuance of the glory and of the Crown of this Realm, unless you make up your minds to protect them efficiently, and to show yourselves not only one of the most industrious, but also one of the most powerful, nations of the world. I have thought it right, my Lords, to say so much on this subject, because it lies deep in my heart. I have associated these observations with the names of men who, in my opinion, have done more than any men have ever done to bring forward the resources, and to strengthen the power and efficacy of these resources, for the defence and the protection of this Empire. Having associated them together, I do not feel myself called upon to dwell more particularly on the history and the achievements of the illustrious man to whom I have been referring. If it was necessary to enumerate those achievements, I should wish to leave it to greater eloquence and to greater ability; but I do not deem it requisite to enumerate them—they are in all their rapid succession one record, and in daily perusal forming now a part of the history of the world. They live, they are present in all men's minds—they are familiar to all men's tongues, and they are stamped and engraven on all men's hearts. Therefore, my Lords, I have risen for the purpose of giving vent to my own feelings on the subject, with the knowledge and the confidence that such must be the feelings of this House. Therefore I am less inclined even than I otherwise should be to enter upon the various topics of Her Majesty's Gracious Speech, and from the way in which those topics have been carefully introduced I am able to avoid entering upon them; because I do not understand this House to be now called upon for any distinct opinion with respect to them. They are all important; and in making the character of the illustrious person of whom I have spoken the prominent feature—as far as I am concerned—in this discussion, I shall not be accused of in any degree undervaluing the importance of the other paragraphs of the Speech from the Throne. My Lords, I find nothing in the terms of the Speech which attempts to engage your Lordships' support, or to engage your Lordships' approbation in any way that may now or hereafter interfere with that course of policy which your Lordships may think fit to adopt, and which I shall, in common with others, feel myself free to adopt on any future occasion. I certainly do wish that in the Speech we heard from the Throne there had been a less hesitating and a less faltering declaration of the views of Her Majesty's Government with respect to those great questions of commercial policy which have been alluded to. I certainly do think, my Lords, the time has come when, after months and even years have elapsed, when, after all the experience that facts could suggest, after all the arithmetic which has been brought to bear on those questions of policy in every form and in every shape, that not only the country but that even Her Majesty's Ministers might have been able to form a competent opinion. But their opinion has not been very distinctly enunciated; and, even aiding myself in the interpretation of the Royal Speech by the speeches of the noble Earl who moved and the noble Marquess who seconded the Address, I do not know whether I may infer that it has been the opinion of Her Majesty's Government that what is called the recent legislation has had a large share in producing the present prosperity of the country. It is right and natural that when a ship is sinking the officers should be reluctant to be the first to abandon her, and that they should be desirous to be the last seen upon her deck. But I must say that I do not see any very great zeal shown, either in this House or elsewhere in the country, to encourage and stand by what was at one time called "the good old cause," namely protection, but which will be known by that name no longer. I believe that the country has abandoned that cause, having found, if it were not abandoned, that facts would be a cheat, that experience would be a liar, and arithmetic would be good for nothing. I hail with the greatest satisfaction the indirect admissions and direct acknowledgments of the benefits which free trade has conferred upon this country, coming as they do, in different shapes and in different degrees, from almost if not all the leading persons in the Kingdom, in and out of this House. We have had no intimation as to the policy of Her Majesty's Government on the subject of taxation; whether it is their intention to adopt direct or indirect taxation. I hope, however, we may be justified in inferring from this abstinence from all positive statement of the future policy of the Government, that they now entertain the opinion that not only has the legislation of late years been attended with the happiest effects, but that it is their intention to pursue that legislation in the same spirit and upon the same principles. If they should adopt this course, then I have no hesitation in saying that they will be entitled to the support of every man in the country who has been the advocate of free trade; and humble as my support and efforts are, I can assure them that they shall not be withheld from them. I will not say more on this subject. I do not wish to enter at present upon any discussion on the question of free trade and protection. Further opportunities will arise for doing so, if there should still be found persons in this House disposed to raise doubts, or to take up a question which has now been laid aside by Her Majesty's Ministers. When the Government are prepared to lay their explanations before the House, then will be the time to go into detail upon this subject. Upon the other observations and the other paragraphs of the Speech from the Throne, I see nothing that I have to object to; but I must say that there was not one to which I listened with greater satisfaction than to that which testifies to the continuance of that zeal in the Government of Brazil for the suppression of the slave trade, which for the last two or three years has done honour to the Government of that country, and distinguished it from those of many other countries. I rejoice to hear that that zeal on the part of the Brazilian Government has enabled Her Majesty's Ministers—not to have done with, I trust, but—to suspend those stringent measures which had for their object the enforcement of treaties with that Government. Deeply convinced, as I was, that those measures were just, and that if necessary they ought to be resumed, still I am persuaded that there is no reform so efficacious, no amendment so great, as that which springs from a Government itself becoming conscious of the duty which it owes to humanity, and anxious to signalise itself, as others have done, in that noble career. We must all hope that, by following up the persevering exertions that have been already made, that most detestable of all trades may be effectually put down and abolished for ever. My Lords, having said so much, I will detain your Lordships no longer, and I will only add that I am sure your Lordships will receive the various measures which I presume Her Majesty's Ministers will ere long submit to you, with a very sincere desire to give them the most serious and impartial consideration.

LORD BROUGHAM: My Lords, after what has fallen from my noble Friend, I should be doing a very superfluous act were I to detain your Lordships many minutes, by attempting to follow him with unequal steps over the ground which he has so successfully trodden, or by advert- ing to other matters which I agree with him in thinking we shall more conveniently discuss on future occasions. Upon the subject of the slave traffic, to which he has adverted, and upon that other great subject of law amendment, called in the Speech from the Throne legal reform, I need not say how entirely I go along with him. On that which now so justly occupies men's minds, and is so fitly made the leading subject of the Speech from the Throne, I would willingly forbear to dwell did not its connexion with the great interests of this country and of the world, as well as the fear of misconstruction, make silence impossible—that ever-glorious, but now painful, subject on which all are agreed—the irreparable loss which all deplore. It asked, indeed, no gift of prophecy to foresee—there was no risk in foretelling—that when he should yield to fate who had never yielded to man, enemy, or rival, every whisper of detraction would be hushed, and each voice be raised to proclaim his transcendent merit. The event has surpassed the expectation. All classes—every description of his fellow-citizens, without distinction of rank, or party, or sect—abroad as at home—the country he served, the allies he saved, the adversaries he encountered—in just recollection of benefits, or in generous oblivion of differences—all, not inconsiderately, but upon discriminating reflection, have joined with an assent so unbroken, so universal, as I verily believe is not recorded in the history of human renown.—And yet it is not his exploits merely, not his genius, and his marvellous fortune, so apt to dazzle mankind, that we are called principally to mark. The example of his illustrious career is most to be studied for the constant abnegation of every selfish feeling which his whole life displayed—the habitual sacrifice of all personal, all party considerations, to the single object of strict duty—of strict duty rigorously performed in what station soever he might be called to act—so that his public virtue is even more to be revered, than his genius or his fortune to be admired. Heaven, in its great mercy, forbid that the time should come when we shall feel yet more sensibly than now we do, his irreparable loss! I agree entirely with the noble Mover of the Address, that we have no right whatever to interfere with the course which any foreign country may pursue in the management of its own affairs. We can have no possible title to complain of the institutions which other nations may adopt, or disparage the rulers whom they may choose to set over them. But, also, the noble Lord will allow me to add, we lie under no obligation to regard the words rather than the acts of any Government, be it our own or another; and as when the people, here or elsewhere, are fondly and most rationally desirous of peace, a mighty security for that unspeakable blessing is afforded by free discussion prevailing among them, of all kinds, on all subjects, so, I am bound to admit, that this security is impaired by suppressing all discussion, of every kind, on every subject. Such mea-

asures may be quite right, or they may be wholly wrong—they may be absolutely necessary to prevent mischief, or they may be absolutely impotent to avert it, or they may be productive of worsèr mischiefs. With that we have no concern; it is not our affair—we have no right to interfere—God forbid we should!—but we have no right even to object—we may only as bystanders, as spectators deeply interested however, lament that any course should be anywhere pursued which weakens our protection against the last of calamities, not to us alone—not to this country or to that, but to Europe—to the world—to humanity itself—the disturbance of the general repose. Our security against that disaster is impaired. Still I hope and trust such evil times will not come—I even upon the whole believe they will not come—enough that they may—and assuredly it is not only our unquestionable right, but our imperative duty, to make timely provision against them.—And, may I be permitted to add, that in discharging this duty we shall render an appropriate tribute to him for whom we now mourn—the tribute himself would most have prized—if, adopting the opinion he deliberately formed, we follow the counsel he so earnestly gave, and do that which of all men, he of all things had nearest his heart, promptly and effectually complete the defences of the country—not neglecting, but cherishing, her ancient alliances—most available when they are neither forced nor purchased; but, having their origin in a common interest, are to be maintained by constant good offices and scrupulous good faith—good faith between Government and Government—good offices between people and people.

The EARL of DERBY: My Lords, before I proceed to any other of the topics alluded to in the Speech from the Throne, on which it may be expected that I shall address your Lordships, there is one topic on which I am sure you will feel that it is impossible for me to avoid addressing you briefly—and it shall be but very briefly—because that topic is one which at this moment is foremost in the minds, not of your Lordships only, but of every man in this country—nay, more, I think I may say of a large portion of the inhabitants of every country in the world. My Lords, it is impossible that we should again assemble together in this House of Parliament without remembering, as Her Majesty was pleased to remember in the Speech from the Throne, the irreparable loss we have recently sustained. Even now, as I rise to address your Lordships, my eye instinctively turns to the head of this table, and looking to what my noble Friend the noble Earl behind me has so feelingly referred to as that empty seat, I miss there one familiar and venerable form—his grey head resting on his hand, upraised to assist the infirmity of his ear, as, conscientiously and laboriously, he seeks to catch the arguments of the humblest Members who may be addressing your Lordships. Again, my Lords, I see him rising from that seat amidst the breathless silence of your Lordships' House, and with faltering accents, with no studied eloquence, in homely phrase, but with a power and grasp of mind which seized as it were intuitively the very pith and marrow of the matter in hand; slowly and deliberately impressing on your Lordships' rapt attention the pithy and sententious maxims of intuitive sagacity, the results of calm wisdom and of mature experience. Well, indeed, my Lords, do I feel it to be for me that I need not attempt to describe the achievements which have for ever illustrated the name of that great man. You are already all well aware of his unparalleled achievements in the field, his possession of all the qualifications which mark the great military leader, his sagacity in council, his unswerving loyalty to his Sovereign, his deep and untiring devotion to the interests of his country, his noble self-reliance, his firmness and zeal, and that distinguishing trait in his character, his abnegation of all selfish views in consideration of the welfare of his country. My Lords, all these great and high qualities are already written in the undying pages of history; they are already engraven on the grateful hearts of an unforgetting people; they have already been honoured by the recognition of the Sovereign—they have been liberally acknowledged and confessed by all the world. But he is gone; he is gone where human honour is no more, and where mortal glory is lost in infinite benignity and justice. He is gone, in the words of the noble tribute paid by the Italian poet to the illustrious Duke's great rival—

This country can never forget all the events of his long and splendid career—his triumphs on the field of battle, at the head of his troops—his services in the congresses of monarchs, in the councils of statesmen, in the cabinets of his colleagues, and in the face of the assembled Parliament of his country, while throughout he remained unseduced by the lustre of his own great name, and undazzled by the blaze of his own transcendent glory—steadfastly resisting the promptings of a vulgar ambition—flinging away from him as unworthy of his notice all motives of personal interest, he rose superior to the paltry struggles of parties, and in every stage of his life preferred the welfare of the nation and of the Crown which he served to any petty or personal feeling of self-interest. My Lords, from this great subject I turn to subjects of far lower interest, but subjects, nevertheless, of no inconsiderable magnitude. But before I touch upon them, I must return my thanks—and I am sure your Lordships will be disposed to join me on the occasion—to my noble Friends, the noble Earl and the noble Marquess who moved and seconded the Address, for the signal good taste, the clearness and precision with which they have called your Lordships' attention to the various topics in that Address. Although I have often in this and in the other House of Parliament listened to the early efforts of young Members of either House, with respect to whom the country had afterwards reason to form the highest expectations, I can truly say that I have seldom listened to any discourses delivered under the same circumstances which held out stronger hopes of future distinction than the discourses which have this evening marked the introduction to Parliamentary life of my noble Friends, the noble Earl and the noble Marquess. I should also feel that I should not discharge my duty if I did not frankly acknowledge the courteous, and I hope I may be permitted to say, the friendly tone in which the noble Marquess opposite (the Marquess of Lansdowne)—who I rejoice is once more among us at the commencement of the Session—referred to the position in which Her Majesty's Ministers now stand towards Parliament. It is a source of great satisfaction to me to believe that there is nothing in the Speech from the Throne which can disturb that unanimity with which it is so desirable that we should present our Address to Her Majesty. I do not at all complain of the manner in which the noble Marquess referred to one point on which it will be necessary for me frankly and unreservedly to state the views which I entertain. I thank the noble Marquess and my noble and learned Friend opposite (Lord Brough-

am) for the language they have held with regard to the state of our foreign relations; and I concur with both of them in thinking that while it is our plain and obvious duty to abstain from interfering in the slightest degree with the internal condition of any foreign State—while I recognise to the fullest extent the right of every State to regulate its own affairs, the constitution and the form of its government, or any other matter of purely internal interest; and while, moreover, looking not to the language alone, but looking to the acts of all foreign nations, I see no apprehension at the present moment of an interruption of our friendly relations with any one of those nations with which we are at present in amity, whatever may be their forms of government, I cordially concur with the noble Marquess, and my noble and learned Friend, in thinking that it is not to the professions—it is not to the friendly acts—it is not to the attitude of any foreign country that this nation must trust if we desire to be independent and to be respected—I believe that while we are desirous of maintaining the goodwill of all foreign nations—while we are anxious to avoid all causes of offence and irritation, our real permanent security must rest on our own capacity for internal defence, on the hearts in the first instance, and in the next instance on the organisation of our own people. And, therefore, I think it is a legitimate subject of congratulation that, notwithstanding the efforts made in various quarters by persons of whom I desire only to say that I think, whatever may be their motives, their policy is mistaken, to prevent the formation of that purely defensive force which was provided by the Act of last Session, and which received the sanction of the illustrious Duke we have lost in the very last speech which he addressed to your Lordships—I think it is a legitimate subject of congratulation to find that, notwithstanding the efforts that have been made to prevent the formation and organisation of that force, there has still been found throughout the country that strong British feeling, that attachment to our national institutions—an attachment demonstrated not by words, but by actions—which has brought into the field for the public defence, and notwithstanding many difficulties has brought into some degree of efficiency, as fine and able a body of young men as ever volunteered their services for the defence of the country during the hottest period of the war. Nor will I deny that there is much that ought to be done for the material defence of the country. That is a topic, however, into which I am sure that your Lordships will not expect that I should enter on this occasion. It is sufficient if I say that the attention of Her Majesty's Government has been sedulously and continuously directed to that most important object, and no doubt their means of effectively providing for the defence of the country, without any desire of giving offence to foreign Powers, will be not inconsiderably strengthened by the tone and language which the noble Marquess, with so much sound sense and good feeling, has addressed to you this evening. My Lords, I will not now touch on any of the topics of the Speech relating to our foreign relations, or indeed on any topic except one of those to which the noble Marquess has adverted; because—important as they all are, and confident as I feel, that more fitting opportunities will offer of discussing them—I am confident that Her Majesty's Government, whenever discussion shall take place upon any of them, will be able to justify the course which they have pursued, and the measures which they intend to recommend to Parliament. But I concur with the noble Marquess that this is not the occasion, nor is it desirable on any of these subjects, to pledge your Lordships, by agreeing unanimously to this Address, to the assertion of any principle as connected with any of these measures. But there is one topic, and that one of paramount importance, upon which I think I shall not discharge my duty to your Lordships and the country if I do not say a few words. I advert to that passage of Her Majesty's Speech in which She congratulates the country, and I believe with very good reason, upon the improved condition of the country generally, and more especially of the industrious classes. When I say the improved condition I mean this: For a course of three or four years, since a period of great difficulty, of great misery, and of great national calamity, there has been a gradual, and to my mind a most satisfactory, progress in each year in improvement over the year preceding, until at last in the year 1852, I believe we have returned in every respect to, and in some we have gone beyond, the period of 1846, which was a period of great and acknowledged national prosperity. I am not now speaking of causes, I am speaking of facts; and although I will not trouble your Lordships with many of them at present, I will

refer to some which I have obtained from the best sources of information, and which I consider to be the best tests of the real condition of the industrious classes of this country, and which show that that condition is one of unusual prosperity. I believe you can take no better criterions than, upon this subject, for example, the amount of pauperism, and the consumption of the principal articles, such as tea, coffee, cocoa, tobacco, sugar, and all those other articles which enter into the consumption of the great body of the people, and with regard to which, those being articles of exclusively foreign importation, we are capable not merely of ascertaining the amount which has been imported, but also the amount which has been consumed, without the possibility of the admixture of any article grown in this country, the amount of which, of course, greater or less, would materially affect the calculation. I find, then, that with regard to all these articles, there has been within the last few years a continuous and progressively rapid increase of consumption, from which I think we may fairly argue that the great mass of the people, so far as their expenditure would directly show itself in the consumption of those articles, are in a state of gradual improvement. I look again to the condition of the savings banks of this country; and I think that few circumstances more clearly show the condition of the great mass of the community than the proportions which are borne between the amount subtracted from and the amount deposited in the savings banks. Now I am not speaking of the number of depositors, or the amount of the deposits, because the sums deposited and the number of depositors may be influenced by certain accidental circumstances, and do not necessarily exhibit the amount of the sums saved from the earnings of the people; but I am speaking of the amount of the contributions. I find that in the course of the years 1847, 1848, and 1849, there was a diminution in the amount invested in the savings banks of a most formidable character. I will not trouble your Lordships by many figures, but this is a case which shows, in a very striking manner, the extent to which years of distress had operated on the condition of the industrious classes in different parts of the country, and the period at which the tide began to turn towards prosperity. I hold in my hand a table, which, dividing the districts of this country into agricultural districts and manufacturing districts, exhibits in each year since 1846 the amounts paid in to the trustees, and the amounts withdrawn from the trustees of the savings banks; and the balance between those amounts affords no bad indication of the prosperity or the distress of the country. Now, in the agricultural districts I find this remarkable result: In the year 1846, towards the close of that year, there had been withdrawn in those districts, beyond the deposits, a sum of 80,434*l.*; in the year 1847 the withdrawals had surpassed the deposits by a sum of 335,000*l.*; in the year 1848 that balance was no less than 782,000*l.*; in the year 1849 it was 379,000*l.*; in the year 1850 it was 542,000*l.*; in the year 1851 this adverse balance was reduced to 165,000*l.*; and in the course of the present year I am happy to say that the amounts of the withdrawals and of the deposits have balanced themselves within a few hundred pounds. This is so far satisfactory; but these statistics show that from 1848 to 1852 great sufferings had been endured by the agricultural population; for in those four years the balance withdrawn from the savings banks in the agricultural districts alone amounted to nearly two millions and a half. The manufacturing districts exhibited during those years a similar falling-off—that is to say, during the early period of those years; inasmuch as in the years 1846 and 1847, there was a predominance in the withdrawals over the deposits to the amount of 330,000*l.*; but in the years 1848, 1849, 1850, and 1851—in every one of those years—there had been in favour of the manufacturing districts an increase in the deposits, varying from 200,000*l.* to 400,000*l.* But without troubling your Lordships with further figures, it is satisfactory to know that in the years 1850, 1851, and 1852, there is exhibited in these manufacturing districts in regard to the savings banks the same evidence of prosperity as is exhibited in the consumption of articles of prime necessity—the evidence of a constantly improving state of things, and of a recurrence to that condition of national prosperity which was experienced in 1846. Now, my Lords, as I said before, I am stating facts, and not attributing causes; but, at the same time, I will not shrink from expressing my opinion with regard to some, at least, of the causes which have been at work to effect these results. I do not hesitate in making an acknowledgment that in my opinion a great portion of the prosperity of the agricultural, and the manufacturing, and the labouring classes, but more especially of the labouring classes, is to be attributed to that legislation, combined with other causes, which has given to them the advantage of cheap and abundant food, and which, at the same time, other circumstances have prevented from being accompanied by those concomitant evils which we had undoubtedly anticipated. Your Lordships will recollect the circumstances to which I refer as having neutralised the injurious effects of—while they have permitted to come into full operation—the advantages to be derived from a system of policy which makes the provisions of the people cheap and abundant. I do not hesitate to say that I concur in a great measure with my noble Friend the noble Earl behind me, that two causes have had a material effect in contributing to that result—namely, the discovery of extensive gold mines in different parts of the world, and the large amount of emigration, which, partly arising from that discovery, and partly arising from other causes, has taken place to an enormous extent, and to a still increasing extent, during the last few years. The apprehensions which I entertained—apprehensions which were entertained by a large number of those who concurred with me in political opinion—that a fall in the price of provisions, other matters remaining as they were, would be quite certain to lead to a corresponding, and more than a corresponding, fall in the amount of wages, have not, I am happy to say, been verified by the fact. I think, however, that that is a proposition which might have been theoretically made clear, and which, but for the circumstances to which I am alluding, would have been proved by practical demonstration. My Lords, I read, perhaps, an erroneous report, but I read with considerable surprise a few days ago, a statement attributed to a right hon. Gentleman (Mr. T. B. Macaulay), whose improved state of health—and I rejoice to say it—permits him again to devote his abilities to the active duties of public life, the brilliancy of whose oratory, and the greatness of whose talents, the new House of Commons must look upon as a great and important acquisition; but, my Lords, if the speech of the right hon. Gentleman to whom I have referred be correctly reported—a speech, the eloquence of which I cannot but admire, although a considerable portion of it was directed—I will not say hardly, but in a manner not worthy of the talents of the right hon. Gentleman, against myself, and against some of those friends with whom I have the honour and the happiness to act—I say, if that speech be correctly reported, I am compelled to give the right hon. Gentleman greater credit for the brilliancy of his oratory than for the soundness of his arguments. Because, in speaking of this very question of the connexion between the cheapness of provisions and the fall of wages, the right hon. Gentleman is reported to have said that he “never had any apprehensions upon the subject, because he bore in mind that the price of wheat was lower and the amount of wages higher in Ohio than in England.” But that argument has nothing to do with the effect of the price of provisions upon the amount of wages. He compared two different countries in a wholly different state of society. He said that, because in Ohio, where land may be obtained for a trifle, where the population is scattered, and where labour is scarce, because there there is a coincidence of high wages and a low price of provisions, it will follow as a consequence that the same effects would take place in England in a totally different state of society, and where the amount of wages is regulated by the proportion which the supply of labour bears to the demand for labour in the labour market. My Lords, all that we contend for is this—that when in Ohio, as in England and everywhere else, the prices of corn or provisions fall to the consumer and to the producer, in that case, apart from other circumstances, there will be a diminution of wages in the same proportion. But, my Lords, the circumstances as affecting this country have been wholly altered by the two important causes to which I have referred—by, in the first place, the large production, the incredibly large and increasing production, of gold—a circumstance important, not only in its effects upon the money price of all the articles of commerce, but which, by making money cheap and abundant, and consequently reducing the rate of interest, enables the employers of labour to make exertions which they otherwise could not make, and enables them to furnish an amount of employment which throws the balance in favour of the labourer, by diminishing the apparent number of the competitors for employment: and then, independently of this, look to the extent to which emigration has been carried during the last few years. Why, I have here a return of the amount of emigration in the course of the last two years. I find that, taking England and Ireland together, the amount of emigration from these countries in the years 1850, 1851, and 1852, has been as follows:—In the year 1850, 220,000; in the year 1851, 273,000; and in the year 1852, 305,000 persons—making a total in three years of about 830,000 persons: most of them, be it recollected, being in the prime of life, and competitors in the labour market of this country. Now we must not suppose that this emigration is taking place exclusively from Ireland. The emigration from Liverpool must always be left out of consideration to a great extent, because it must be assumed that of the number of those who emigrate from Liverpool 9-10ths are in reality Irish; so that only 1-10th could be considered to be English emigration—that is to say, 18,000 out of about 187,000 persons. There have, therefore, emigrated from England alone about 80,000 persons. It is possible that these two circumstances combined—the large amount of gold, on the one hand, rendering money cheap and the means of employment easy; and, on the other hand, the great diminution in the number of competitors for labour in the market, must have had the effect in the long run of keeping up the price of the wages of the labouring classes, and of thereby altering the state of affairs, so as in a great degree to prevent the occurrence of those accompanying evils, which, but for those mitigating circumstances, would have occasioned a rapid and a considerable fall of wages. But, my Lords, without looking to what might have been the causes, the system is now established, and working more advantageously for the labouring classes than we had anticipated. I am bound to look, not to the causes, but to the practical result. I am bound to look, also, to the deliberate expression of the opinion and feelings of the country. My Lords, when at the commencement of the last Session, I had, for the first time, the unexpected honour of addressing your Lordships from the place in which I now stand, I stated to your Lordships that it was my desire to be enabled to conduct the business of the country through the Session which had then commenced without any reference to those important questions on which a considerable difference of opinion existed: I mean the fiscal regulations of the country. I was of opinion that that was a point which ought to be referred to the deliberate consideration of the country, as tested by the result of a general election. I stated that, by the result of that general election I and my Colleagues were prepared to abide, and had determined we should have the full sanction and support of a large majority of the country, to abstain from proposing those measures which we ourselves, in our own private judgment, might have deemed most conducive to the happiness and prosperity of the State. My Lords, that appeal has been made; and I have no hesitation in saying to your Lordships that with regard to the imposition of any duty upon corn and provisions, not only is there not that large majority without the existence of which I declared that I would submit no such proposition to the consideration of Parliament; but the country by a very large and undoubted majority, including a very considerable number of the representatives of the agricultural districts themselves, has declared that whether it might have been desirable or not as a matter of policy, yet that in the present state of affairs they are determined not to depart from that system of legislation which has been established—that the country will not agree to the imposition of any tax on the introduction of articles of provisions. My Lords, I say that that resolution carries with it the whole financial policy of the country. It might have been possible to have adopted the system of free trade, as it is commonly called, and to have made those particular articles exceptions to the general policy. But it is not possible to lay down a system of policy by which you should have free trade in corn and provisions, and yet not follow up, as far as possible, the same principle with regard to other articles. My Lords, if I understand the meaning of the common expression “free trade,” it is this, that you will not impose taxes for the purpose of protecting individual or local interests, but that you will impose them for the purposes of revenue, and of revenue only; and that in the imposition of those taxes you will have especial regard to lightening the burdens which may be imposed upon those articles which mainly enter into the consumption of the great mass of the community. Now, my Lords, in that system I see much of advantage, but I do not deny that I see much of difficulty. I see great present advantages, but I am not sure—God forbid that I should be right!—that that system may not lead to future embarrassments as the necessary consequences of the changes in our financial system. But, my Lords, I do not hesitate to say that after the opinion which has been pronounced by the country, whatever may be my own views, or those of my colleagues, as to the policy which we may deem it desirable should be adopted, I see that the recurrence of such a policy would be in itself impracticable; and that, even if it were practicable, it would be most undesirable to raise such a question for controversy among large masses of the community. On the part, then, of myself and of my colleagues, I bow to the decision of the country; and having so bowed, I declare on their part and on my own, that while desirous of mitigating to the utmost of our power that unavoidable injury which the adoption of that policy has inflicted, and must inflict on important classes, I do not adopt it with any reserve whatever. I adopt it frankly as the decision of the country, and I am prepared honestly and fairly to carry it out as a Minister of the Crown. My Lords, I hope that the noble Marquess will not, after what I have stated, say either that Her Majesty's Government require time to make up their minds as to the course which they will pursue, or that they have faltered or hesitated in declaring their intention. It would be obviously improper for me, upon the present occasion, to enter into the details of those measures by which we believe that that injury might be mitigated, and by which we believe that without interfering with the general policy which for shortness is called “free trade,” we might confer advantages on those classes which have suffered from its adoption—I say it would be improper for me on this occasion to offer any statement in detail to your Lordships' House. But I have the satisfaction of stating to your Lordships that if you and the country can have patience and wait for a period of one short fortnight, my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer will then be prepared to lay before the other House of Parliament, in full detail, those financial measures, which in the present state of affairs Her Majesty's Government are of opinion should be adopted. Until that period shall arrive, I trust that the House will abstain from pronouncing or expressing any opinion. I trust that your Lordships will hear at all events the views which Her Majesty's Government may entertain upon the subject. I trust you will give a deliberate and dispassionate consideration to that most important and vital question. You may—the other House of Parliament may—dissent from those views, or they may adopt those views. They may, if they dissent from those views, and if they think fit to act upon their dissent—they may, if they can combine a sufficient number of Gentlemen capable of acting together on this subject, and on all other subjects in which the great interests of the country are concerned—they may undoubtedly, in that case, prevent the adoption of the policy which, with no difference of opinion among them—which, without hesitation, subsequent to the decision of the last general election, Her Majesty's Government have deliberately adopted. But I hope and believe, my Lords, on the other hand, that there will be displayed in Parliament a good sense and a moderation which will not sacrifice the great interests of the nation for the purpose of raising personal taunts or indulging in personal recrimination or personal charges. I believe and I hope that on all sides of the House there will be evinced, in the progress of this Session, that spirit of which we have had so honourable and so satisfactory an instance in the tone of the noble Marquess in this House to-night—a spirit which will induce Parliament to look at great subjects of national importance, not through the medium of this or that section or party—not through the medium of private interest—but as the great Duke whom we have lost would have looked at those subjects, through the medium of that national welfare of which not Ministers alone, but the Members of this and the other House of Parliament, are the natural and proper depositories. My Lords, I will not detain your Lordships by entering into any other topics introduced in the Speech from the Throne. With regard to this question, I have frankly stated that we shall endeavour as honestly to carry out the policy to which we have hitherto objected as if we ourselves had been the authors of that policy. On the other hand, I say as frankly and as distinctly that I will not abstain from any effort which in my judgment, and in the judgment of my colleagues, can be made to mitigate the evils which have been endured by those who have suffered from the inevitable effects of that policy which the nation has now finally adopted.

Motion agreed to Nemine Dissentiente; and a Committee was appointed to prepare the Address: The Committee withdrew; and, after some Time, Report was made of an Address drawn by the Committee, which being read, was agreed to, and Ordered to be presented to Her Majesty by the Lords with White Staves.

House adjourned till To-morrow.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

MINUTES.] PUBLIC BILL.—1° Outlawries.

Message to attend Her Majesty; The House went; and being returned—

MR. SPEAKER reported that the House had that day been to the House of Lords, when Her Majesty was pleased to make a most gracious Speech to both Houses of Parliament; and that, for the sake of greater accuracy, he had procured a copy thereof. The right hon. Gentleman then read the Speech to the House.

ADDRESS IN ANSWER TO THE SPEECH.

LORD LOVAINE rose and said: Sir, in rising to move that an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, in reply to the gracious Speech from the Throne which has just been read, I confess that I wish the task had fallen upon some abler, some more experienced Member of this House, who would have been able to give due weight to the many important topics which it contains. I feel, Sir, the more embarrassment when I consider that the first subject of that Speech is one which must awaken in the country as well as in this House, feelings of the deepest sympathy, affection, and regret. I allude, Sir, of course, to that part of Her Majesty's Speech in which, with Her usual kind and affectionate regard for the wishes and feelings of Her people, Her Majesty invites us, their representatives, to join in making provision for the funeral obsequies of the late Duke of Wellington. Sir, I believe this House will excuse me if I approach with awe an event which has cast a shadow of grief and dismay over the mighty empire which obeys the sceptre of these realms—the quenching of that light which for nearly half a century has been the beacon to every Englishman to light him on the path of duty and honour. No obsequies that we can give—no funeral pomp that we can bestow—can be adequate to express the love and veneration which this House and the country bore to that great man—a love and veneration, Sir, which was not founded upon the mere evanescent and vulgar admiration of military glory. It was not that in his early career he had already given to England the supremacy of the vast empire of India—it was not that, from triumph to triumph, he had raised the name and glory of England to the highest rank amongst the nations—it was not that he seemed to have chained victory to his standard, that he finally became the conqueror of the conqueror of the world—it was not, Sir, I say, so much for these things that this country loved him, as because, not dazzled or blinded by the brightest effulgence of those glories that war had shed around his head, and undeafened by the earthquake voice of victory which hailed him the saviour of the nations, he was able to discern the true end and object of war—an honourable and lasting peace. And when he had brought this country out of the most tremendous struggle that ever nation was engaged in, for existence, as well as for victory, he used all the powers that his successes had given him to effect the permanent establishment of that pacification which his arms had obtained—and that, by every means of conciliation, by every counsel of moderation that was consistent with the safety and honour of this country. How well he succeeded, the history of the last thirty-seven years can tell. We loved him, Sir, because, though he was the intimate and counsellor of the monarchs of Christendom, he used his power for no purposes of selfish aggrandisement, but took his station amongst us, ambitious to prove himself the most faithful and devoted servant of the Crown, the surest and most vigilant protector of the rights and welfare of his fellow-citizens. I believe, Sir, his political opponents will bear witness that his counsel was always ready in the darkest hour of danger and difficulty, and that they could always rely on his honour and sincerity, no less than on the far-seeing and intuitive sagacity which could descry the path of safety, hidden to less gifted eyes. His name will descend to posterity, not only as that of a great statesman—of the greatest warrior—but as a colossal example of unswerving obedience to the calls of duty, of truth, of loyalty, and of honour. I thank God that he went down to the grave with undimmed intellect, conscious of the love that his country bore him, conscious how well he had deserved that love, conscious that he had performed his last duty in warning his country against the danger arising from the intoxication of security, into which her very peace and prosperity had plunged

her. And I think, Sir, that when we have closed the tomb over his remains, when we have left him alone in his glory, it will be for the House to consider his last warning, to recollect that we have no longer the protection of that name, which was an omen of victory to us, and of terror and defeat to our enemies—“a lion in their path,” which the boldest never ventured to approach; we must remember this, we must muster our resources, and prepare for the advent of that day of adversity which comes to nations not less than to individuals. But it is time for me to quit this subject. I am well aware how poor and inadequate my expressions are to represent the feelings of this House and of the country; but trust that the House will bear with me in its sympathy in the spirit in which I have ventured to pay this last and feeble tribute to the immortal memory of the greatest of Englishmen. Passing then to the other subjects mentioned in Her Majesty's Speech, I perceive that She graciously acknowledges the readiness with which the population of this kingdom have come forward to volunteer for the defence of the country. Sir, though I was not a Member of this House at the time, I perfectly recollect the evil auguries with which the Bill passed at the beginning of the last Session was received—how we were told that Englishmen, unapt to war, were disinclined to undergo the discipline requisite to fit them for the defence of the country, and were unwilling to come forward as volunteers. Sir, the paper that I have here is a sufficient answer to those auguries of evil. I believe that the levy of men was calculated at 50,000, and that in the short space of six weeks (or hardly so much) which has elapsed since the beginning of the enrolment of volunteers 30,000 men have already enrolled themselves for the defence of their country. I think it but just to read to the House the names of those counties which have already furnished their full quota of volunteers, many of whom are at present exercising—they are Bedford, Buckingham, Dorset, Essex, Gloucester, Hertford, Oxford, Huntingdon, Lincoln, London, Northampton, Denbigh, and Montgomery. I can bear witness, from my own personal experience, to the great docility and aptitude for learning their duties, to the good conduct, and to the very remarkable proficiency in the use of arms, which those volunteers now in the field have shown; and I can state that it astonishes even those who like me have passed part of their lives in the service of the regular Army. Before passing to the next subject, I must observe that if the necessity of a defensive force bears the slightest proportion to the value of that which it is established to defend, it is undoubted that never was a country so much in need of such a protection as ours. Besides the evergrowing wealth, and the immense prosperity already created by the industry of the country, in addition to all the wealth which its commerce has conferred upon her—of which we behold ample testimony in the structures with which private enterprise has covered the land, and which excel as much in the grandeur of their conception as in their utility the boasted edifices of antiquity—in addition to these large sources of prosperity there has been lately poured into the lap of England treasures that exceed almost the wildest fictions of the poet. And, Sir, when one considers the immense emigration this mine of wealth has given rise to, and that the consequent increase in the value of labour has caused the labouring classes in this country, already prosperous, to enjoy a degree of comfort previously unknown I believe in the history of England—when one remembers these things, one is the more struck at the patriotism which induces so many to accept the slender pittance which this country pays to its defenders. Sir, Her Majesty congratulates us upon the peace and tranquillity that prevail on the Continent, and on the friendly relations that continue to subsist, and which guarantee fresh sources of wealth to England, inasmuch as fresh outlets for the products of our industry will be developed by means of that peace and order. The mighty waters which wash the plains of the vast continent of Central America are now open to our fleets, and in their train must follow all the blessings that commerce can confer; and it is to be hoped that the advantages of peace and civilisation will be restored to those countries that have suffered hitherto under all the horrors of civil war. Then, Sir, the success that has attended our arms in the war with the Burmese, will open another pathway for the traffic of nations, by giving us access to the great capital of Burmah. Our trans-Atlantic brethren certainly have conceived against us some feelings of displeasure from the manner in which the acknowledged rights—rights acknowledged by treaty—of England had been enforced; but Her Majesty congratulates us that those differences will soon cease, and that these two nations will pursue in regard to each other a peaceful rivalry in commerce, injurious to neither, but beneficial to both, and which this slight disturbance may have interrupted. Portugal also has shown at last some signs of a disposition to relax her tariff, in the abolition of those duties by which she oppressed our wine trade—and in doing so she will confer not less a benefit on herself than others. But, Sir, there is one species of traffic which, contrary to all others, it has been the pride and glory of England to endeavour to annihilate—I mean the slave trade. Long has she laboured through good report and through evil report to effect that object. Many are the sacrifices she has made of blood as well as of treasure; and now, at last, she sees success within her grasp. The conduct of Brazil has been such as to warrant the hope that we may now look forward to the final extinction of the slave trade. Cuba, and Cuba only, is still a plague-spot on the face of the earth; but when that trade is restricted to so small an island, I cannot see how it is possible that that accursed system can be long maintained in that country. It appears from the returns that the number of slaves landed in Brazil has sunk from 60,000, in the year 1848, to 3,287 in the year 1851—a sufficient reply, I think, to those Gentlemen who are anxious to abolish the blockade which we have so long maintained on the coast of Africa. I am sorry to say that the same cannot be affirmed of Cuba, the number of slaves imported having increased, and that 1,500 more were imported in 1851 than in 1850. I shall now, Sir, refer to another topic, namely, the slavery that exists in all countries—the slavery of crime. I am sure it will be most gratifying to us as well as most cheering to our colonial brethren to hear that the system of transportation to Van Diemen's Land will soon cease; but it is not to be denied that this will involve the mother country in considerable embarrassment if transportation must altogether cease to other countries. I trust, however, that exertions will be made to devise the means by which crime may be checked in the outset, whereby the vast establishments we are obliged to maintain for its punishment may be reduced. Sir, I shall allude no further to the subject of law reform than to express my joy that that which was so happily begun in the beginning of the last Session, is likely to be continued to a practical issue in this. I have a few words more with which I must trespass on the kindness of the House. I have already mentioned the overflowing prosperity of the country—I have already indicated some of the sources from which that prosperity has arisen—I am ready to profess my conviction that the commercial policy which has existed for the last few years has also contributed to that prosperity. I speak now in this House as the representative of an agricultural constituency—I speak now what I spoke on the hustings when I was a candidate for the suffrages of that constituency. I draw a very broad distinction between what is commonly called free trade and the abolition of duties upon corn. I have always believed, and I am ready to assert my belief, that the reformation of the tariff, which abolished all prohibitory duties on all articles of foreign produce whatever, and considering all duties as means only of finance and revenue, was a judicious and unexceptionable course. But the abolition of all duties upon corn, stands altogether upon another footing. It must be argued upon other principles—it must be defended upon other grounds, and sustained by other reasons. When that measure became law, I applied myself to ascertain its effects on the classes that seemed most obnoxious to injury from it. I found that that repeal did inflict considerable misery and suffering on a large and most important class; but I found also, according to the statements of those persons who were best qualified to judge—I found, according to the opinions of that most numerous class which subsists solely on the labour of their own hands—that they had received, in the abolition of the corn duties, a great and practical benefit. Therefore, Sir, I drew the conclusion that it was both impolitic and impossible to retrace our steps in our commercial policy, and that our efforts should be directed as much as possible to the relief of the suffering class from the burdens of which they complain, and to remove from them all restrictions by which they are impeded, and to place them unfettered in the arena in which they have to run the race of competition with foreign countries. I do not think that this House will or ought to turn a deaf ear to the complaints of any class of Englishmen who believe they have a just cause of remonstrance against any measure that may injuriously affect their interests. I believe there are many Gentlemen on both sides of the House representing large and powerful interests, who, in conjunction with ourselves, are ready to raise their voices in the same demands. The sufferings of those classes are not new; they are not for the first time mentioned in the Speech from the Throne; they have been mentioned, and commented upon, at a period when the Government of the country was entrusted to Ministers who were most opposed to the ancient system; and I trust that a conciliatory policy may now be applied—that the present opportunity will be taken to heal the breaches that have been made; to conciliate and to remove those differences that have prevailed hitherto between class and class, and interest and interest. I cannot conceive that the House will turn a deaf ear to the conciliatory policy which has been recommended in Her Majesty's Speech. Hitherto this House has been the place in which the injuries of Englishmen have been redressed, and I trust it will be so still. At least I know it was so of old—when the agricultural interest was the most powerful in this House—for the Statute-book teems with legislation adopted at the instance and under the guidance of the manufacturing, commercial, and shipping interests of this country. I can only hope that by the adoption of such a policy all the dissensions at present existing amongst us will come to an end, and that the internal condition of the country will bear as ample testimony to the reciprocal good feeling between class and class, as its external signs of wealth to the prosperity and welfare of the great mass of its citizens. And, if, Sir, by such measures rest can be given to afflicted and storm-vexed Ireland, I think the Minister that can perform the task will pass to posterity with all the blessings that in heaven and earth are promised to the peacemaker. And now, Sir, I shall conclude by thanking the House for the indulgence it has shown me, and the attention and patience it has displayed in listening to this my first attempt to address it. The noble Lord then moved—

“ That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, to convey to Her Majesty the Thanks of this House for Her Majesty's most gracious Speech from the Throne, and to assure Her Majesty of our participation in the deep sorrow which Her Majesty, in meeting us, has been pleased to express, that our deliberations can no longer be aided by the counsels of that illustrious man whose great achievements have exalted the name of England, and in whose loyalty and patriotism the interests of Her Majesty's Throne and People ever found an unfailing support; and to assure Her Majesty, that we cordially desire to join with Her Majesty in taking such steps as may mark our sense of the irreparable loss which the Country has sustained by the death of Arthur Duke of Wellington:

"To thank Her Majesty for Her Majesty's gracious acknowledgment of the readiness in which Her Majesty's subjects in general have come forward, in pursuance of the Act of last Session, to join the ranks of the Militia; and for the expression of Her Majesty's confident trust that the force thus raised by voluntary enlistment will be calculated to give effective aid to Her Majesty's regular Army for the protection and security of the Country:

"To thank Her Majesty for informing us that Her Majesty continues to receive from all Foreign Powers assurances of their anxious desire to maintain the friendly relations now happily subsisting with Her Majesty's Government:

"Humbly to thank Her Majesty for the information that frequent and well-founded complaints on the part of Her Majesty's North American Colonies, of infractions, by citizens of the United States, of the Fishery Convention of 1818, have induced Her Majesty to despatch, for the protection of their interests, a class of vessels better adapted to the service than those which had been previously employed; that this step has led to discussions with the Government of the United States; and that while the rights of Her Majesty's Subjects have been firmly maintained, the friendly spirit in which the question has been treated induces Her Majesty to hope that the ultimate result may be a mutually beneficial extension and improvement of our commercial intercourse with that great Republic:

"To thank Her Majesty for informing us that the special mission which, in concert with the Prince President of the French Republic, Her Majesty deemed it right to send to the Argentine Confederation, has been received with the utmost cordiality; and that the wise and enlightened policy of the Provisional Director has already opened to the commerce of the world the great rivers, hitherto closed, which afford an access to the interior of the vast continent of South America:

"To assure Her Majesty, that we receive with satisfaction the announcement, that the sincere and zealous efforts of the Government of Brazil for the suppression of the Slave Trade, now nearly extinguished on that coast, have enabled Her Majesty to suspend the stringent Measures which Her Majesty had been compelled reluctantly to adopt, a recurrence to which we in common with Her Majesty anxiously hope may be proved to be unnecessary:

"To thank Her Majesty for informing us that the Government of Her Most Faithful Majesty have fully recognised the justice of the claim which Her Majesty's Government have long urged for the abolition of the discriminating Duties on the export of Wine, and have passed a decree for giving complete effect to the stipulations of the Treaty on this subject:

"To express our humble concurrence with Her Majesty, in the opinion that it will be advisable to resume the inquiries which were commenced by the late Parliament, with a view to legislation on the subject of the future government of Her Majesty's East Indian Possessions:

"To thank Her Majesty for informing us that the Estimate for the ensuing year will in due time be laid before us:

"To assure Her Majesty that we readily recognise that the advancement of the Fine Arts, and of Practical Science, is worthy of a great and enlightened Nation; and to thank Her Majesty for having given directions that a comprehensive scheme shall be laid before us, having in view the promotion of these objects, to which Her Majesty invites our aid and co-operation:

"To assure Her Majesty that we participate in the pleasure which Her Majesty is pleased to express at being enabled, by the blessing of Providence, to congratulate us on the generally improved condition of the Country, and especially of the industrious classes; and humbly to thank Her Majesty for Her Majesty's gracious recommendation, that if we should be of opinion that recent legislation, in contributing with other causes to this happy result, has, at the same time, inflicted unavoidable injury on certain important interests, we should dispassionately consider how far it may be practicable equitably to mitigate that injury, and to enable the industry of the Country to meet successfully that unrestricted competition to which Parliament, in its wisdom, has decided that it should be subjected:

"To thank Her Majesty for the information that Her Majesty trusts that the general improvement, notwithstanding many obstacles, has extended to Ireland, and to assure Her Majesty, that while Her Majesty may rely with confidence on our aid, should it be required, to restrain that unhappy spirit of insubordination and turbulence which produces many and aggravates all of the evils which afflict that portion of Her Majesty's Dominions, we shall readily attend to Her Majesty's gracious recommendation that we should adopt such a liberal and generous policy towards Ireland as may encourage and assist her to rally from the depression in which she has been sunk by the sufferings of late years :

“ To thank Her Majesty for informing us, that Her Majesty, anxious to promote the efficiency of every branch of our National Church, has thought fit to issue a Commission to inquire and report to Her Majesty how far, in their opinion, the Capitular Institutions of the Country are capable of being made more effective for the great objects of Religious Worship, Religious Education, and Ecclesiastical Discipline :

“ Humbly to thank Her Majesty, for directing that the Reports of the Commissioners for inquiring into the system of Education pursued at Oxford and Cambridge, should be communicated to the governing Bodies of those Universities for their consideration ; and to assure Her Majesty, that Her Majesty may rely upon our readiness to remove any legal difficulties which may impede the desire of the Universities at large, or of the several Colleges, to introduce such amendments into their existing system as they may deem to be more in accordance with the requirements of the present time :

“ Humbly to concur with Her Majesty in opinion that the system of Secondary Punishments has usefully occupied the labours of successive Parliaments ; and to assure Her Majesty that we shall rejoice with Her Majesty if we shall find it possible to devise means by which, without giving encouragement to crime, Transportation to Van Diemen's Land may at no distant period be altogether discontinued :

“ To thank Her Majesty for informing us that the subject of Legal Reform continues to engage Her Majesty's anxious attention ; that the Acts passed in the last Session of Parliament have been followed up by the Orders necessary for putting them in operation ; that inquiries are in progress, by Her Majesty's direction, with a view of bringing into harmony the Testamentary Jurisdiction of Her Majesty's several Courts ; and that Bills will be submitted to us for effecting further improvements in the Administration of the Law :

“ Humbly to assure Her Majesty that to these and other measures affecting the social condition of the Country, we shall give our earnest and zealous attention, and that we join in Her Majesty's prayer that by the blessing of Almighty God our deliberations may be guided to the well-being and happiness of Her Majesty's people.”

MR. E. C. EGERTON : Sir, in rising to second the Motion that the House

should agree to the Address just read by the noble Lord—when I take into consideration the deep importance of the occasion which has called us together—when I take into consideration the nature of the topics to be submitted to us, I feel more than ordinary occasion to solicit from the House its never-failing indulgence and kindness. Ably as the noble Lord has spoken on that topic which now is most in the hearts of Englishmen, I trust the House will pardon me if I indulge in a few additional remarks. I feel the fullest conviction, Sir, that this House, whatever difference of opinion there may be upon other parts of this Address, will entertain none but the deepest sympathy for the sorrow, the attachment, and high affection evinced by Her Majesty in that part of Her Message to Parliament in which She deplores the loss of Her ablest and most devoted servant. To the Sovereign, to whom his ready and disinterested counsels were ever open—to the Senate, whose deliberations his matured judgment so often guided—and to the nation at large, who saw in him the highest example of the purest patriotism and most inflexible honour, the loss is indeed irreparable. Sir, it would be presumptuous in me to attempt the praise of his glorious deeds in arms ; they will stand recorded as long as time shall last in the glowing pages of history, which will tell for the admiration of future ages how, in two quarters of the world, the great commander, by his brilliant strategy and indomitable labour, after a series of matchless victories, unclouded by a single reverse, succeeded in obtaining for his country that noblest end of war, a lasting peace. Sir, at the close of those labours, with unabated energy, he brought to the civil service of his Sovereign the same devoted loyalty and unflinching sense of duty ; and has thus presented to the world an unparalleled example of greatness unsurpassed alike in peace and war. But, Sir, I will not dwell any further on this topic, for I know that in the course of the debate there will be opportunities given to others whose eloquence would better befit the noble theme, and who have enjoyed the high privilege of his friendship, to pay their tribute to his imperishable renown. This only I will add, that while this House and the country unite in mournful veneration to do honour to his memory, we at the same time do homage to our free institutions, which have in him added another to the long line of England's sons, who, though born in a private station, have by their own unaided exertions raised themselves to the highest dignities and offices of the State. I will now pass on to the next topic; and here I am sure the House will learn with satisfaction the success which has attended the raising of the militia. Called for as that measure was in the opinions of successive Ministries, by no feelings of groundless panic, but of ordinary prudence for the necessary defence of the country—sanctioned as it was by the high authority of the illustrious hero, whose last words in the House of Lords bore testimony to its absolute necessity—it has, notwithstanding the gloomy predictions of some Gentlemen on the other side of the House, been most cheerfully responded to by the loyalty of the nation, which has thus fully testified its consciousness that in prompt preparation for war consists the best security for peace. I will merely observe, that this House will, I am sure, participate in the satisfaction with which Her Majesty is able to announce the successful results of the late diplomatic negotiations with the Government of the United States; that the differences which had for a time disturbed the harmony of the two countries on the subject of the fisheries, have been brought to a satisfactory termination, and that, without concession on our part of the just rights and privileges of our North American colonies, we have been enabled to maintain those amicable relations which the well-wisher of each must be so anxious to preserve between nations owning one common language and origin, and still further to extend our commercial intercourse. But there is a topic alluded to in the Royal Speech to which the noble Lord has not adverted, and on which I will say a few words—I mean that in which Her Majesty calls the attention of the House to the question of extending education by the advancement of the fine arts and of practical science. Sir, it has long been matter of experience, which was fully confirmed by the late Great Exhibition, that, unbounded as is the energy of our manufacturers, and unrivalled as are the productions of our artisans in many cases, yet that in some branches of art, which require mechanical skill and taste, they have been excelled by the artisans of foreign countries, where greater facilities are given for instruction in the more scientific branches of trade. It is to remedy that, to put the Englishman on the same footing with the foreigner,

and to give a more enlightened instruction with respect to some branches of trade, that Her Majesty has been graciously pleased to put this paragraph in the Speech. That this is a fact of which our own manufacturing population is sensible was evident from their strongly-expressed desire for increased means of instruction. Many hon. Gentlemen could, no doubt, bear testimony to the rapid increase of mechanics' institutes in our large towns, to the gratitude with which the establishment of schools of design has been received, and to the increased demands for those artisans who have in those schools received their instructions. And when I remember that one of the greatest benefits which the Exhibition of last year conferred on society was the opportunity which it afforded to the inhabitants of the whole civilised world to meet together and to inspect together the various natural and artificial products of their relative countries, thus by a happy interchange of practical and scientific knowledge, by the communion of mind with mind, creating a friendly and generous rivalry between nations, likely to conduce to the common prosperity of all—when I remember these things, I may, perhaps, be permitted to indulge the hope, that as it has been the lot of former Ministers to afford to that portion of our manufacturing population whose daily labour administers to our physical requirements and tastes, the inestimable blessings of cheapened food, increased enjoyment of air, light, and drainage, I say, that as it was the lot of two former Governments to administer to their physical wants and requirements, it may be reserved to be the privilege of the present Government that they first secured, on an extended scale, to the industrial classes that sound education in the scientific principles of their trades which will enable them to compete in the race of civilisation with the world, and thus, by a further development of our manufactures and commerce, tend to our increased national greatness and prosperity. That the greatest activity exists in all branches of commerce, that public and private prosperity are on the increase, that, in spite of large reductions, there is no falling-off in the amount of taxation, are matters of sincere congratulation; and that congratulation is much enhanced by the knowledge that in that increase of prosperity the working classes have had a large share. It is impossible for any one who has had personal testimony of the increased comfort of their homes, after the experience of the last two years, to deny that that result has, in a large measure, arisen to them from the late commercial legislation, which has brought not only cheapened food, but the increased enjoyment of the other necessities of life. That boon once given cannot now be withdrawn; and I think the time has come when, an appeal having been made to the electoral body of the country, the verdict which has been given should be acquiesced in, that the question of the unrestricted food of the people should be settled; and that with that question merging those differences which have so long divided classes and contributed to mutual irritation and discomfort, we may find it a fitting opportunity for Parliament to consider dispassionately, and in no spirit of class legislation, whether any injustice has been sustained by other interests who are admitted to have been long suffering; and if any injustice can be shown under which those interests are peculiarly sufferers, I am sure that the sense of justice which this House has always evinced will prompt it to give its best attention to the remedy. There are other topics to which I will make only a short reference. I congratulate the House and the country on the advantages which have been derived from the adoption of the legal reforms of last Session, and on the prospect that further legal reforms are to take place. I hope the progress already made in law reform will encourage the House to persevere in further progress in the same useful direction—the further, I think, we go over that road, the better—and it may confidently be hoped that in a short period the abuses in the Ecclesiastical Courts will be remedied, so that we may thus be enabled to see the administration of the law stripped of all unnecessary delay and technicalities, and made more conducive to the wishes of the community at large. My noble Friend has spoken so fully on the subject of transportation that I will not touch upon it at all; but, thanking the House for the very kind and patient indulgence it has accorded to me, I will, in conclusion, express my trust that a wise and beneficent Providence will direct all our legislation to the advancement of true religion, sound education, and good government, and that we may thereby present to the world the spectacle of an united and a happy people. I will not further trespass on the House than to thank it for its forbearance and courtesy, and to second the Address.

MR. C. VILLIERS said, he hoped the House would not think him very presumptuous if he rose thus early in the evening to make a few observations on the subject of the Address, and on what had fallen from the noble Lord and the hon. Gentleman by whom it had been moved and seconded. He could assure the House it was with great reluctance that he did so, because he was entirely of a mind with those who thought that it was desirable upon the occasion of receiving a Message or a Speech from the Crown, that they should, if possible, respond to it with unanimity. He believed that to be the feeling of the House generally—he had observed it to be so, since he had been in Parliament; but he need not say that it depended entirely on the discretion of the Minister what tone would be taken, and what turn would be given, to a discussion on the Address, because he was responsible for the Speech: he selected the topics contained in it; he chose the Members who were to expound his policy, and he knew well the requirements of the House as to the matters on which it desired to be informed, whether as regarded the state of the country, our foreign relations, or any of those great matters that might be at issue in the country, on which it was desirable to know the opinion of the Government. There would be no Amendment proposed to an Address, or any objection taken to it, unless there was some omission of what it was known to be the desire of the House to be acquainted with, or a statement of some policy which was sure to be opposed. It was under these circumstances that he rose to complain somewhat of the Address that had been moved that evening. He did not, of course, complain of all that was contained in the Address. There were certain matters that spoke for themselves, and with respect to which they were all agreed. And, first of all, he might name that passage which had reference to the late national bereavement. He was sure the House would respond to everything that referred to the great man and the great mind that had recently been lost to them, with sincerity, cordially with a deep emotion of regret. But there were some matters of very deep interest to the country at large, and of which the country had been anxiously waiting for information, on which they had not, as he thought, been sufficiently informed on the present occasion. They had met together at a very unusual season, and there was hardly a man in the country who required to ask why they were so assembled. The facts were so notorious as to the causes why the last Parliament was dissolved, and why the present Parliament was now assembled, that it was hardly needful for him to refer to them; but, to establish the grounds on which he intended to complain of what he considered defective information in the Speech, it was necessary to mention the facts as they occurred, which took him back to the formation of the present Government. It was well known that when the Government acceded to power there was an avowal on the part of the Minister that he held opinions which he was not willing to abandon, and which he admitted were at variance with those held by the majority of the House of Commons. That Minister—he alluded to the First Minister of the Crown—admitted also the justice of the doctrine that it was not constitutional for any man to administer the Government whose opinions did not coincide with those of a majority of that House. But the Minister said—“Without abandoning my opinions, or doing violence to the constitution, I am ready to take the course that will be approved by all men under existing circumstances; I will not interfere with any policy that is now established; I will only advance the business of the House that is actually required; I will put the country to as little inconvenience as possible; but I will dissolve this Parliament, and ascertain with the least possible delay whether my opinions are in accordance with those of a new House of Commons.”

These were the facts as they occurred; and though this was not exactly the earliest moment at which the House might have been called together, yet they were met at an unusual season, in obedience to the declaration of the Minister, that he would call Parliament together to see whether or not they regarded him as a fit Minister to govern the country. Now, there were two ways in which the difficulty admitted by the Minister might be overcome. One was, that a majority of that House should coincide with him in opinion; the other was, that the Minister should declare some change of opinion on his own part. They were met that evening, and the country was expecting generally that they had so met, for the purpose of ascertaining whether the coincidence of opinion to which he had referred existed. They looked to the Speech from the Throne, and listened to the Mover and Seconder of the Address, to ascertain whether there was that coincidence between the country, between the majority of that House and the Government, and he complained that they were not informed. They had no information on the subject. There was a paragraph that referred to the subject on which the difference existed, namely, the commercial policy as it existed at present, and the change that had taken place of late years. That is the point of difference, or was the point of difference, between the Administration and the majority of the House of Commons. There was a reference in the Speech to recent legislation, and to the present condition of the people; but he could not find a distinct, clear, tangible avowal on the part of the Government that they were reconciled to that policy, or reconciled in a way that might give them an assurance that in one way or other they would not attempt to reverse or modify that policy, or make the House feel uneasy as to its permanency. To relieve himself from any charge of presumption in intruding thus early on the House, and in calling for explanations, he might state to the House—which contained many Members not in the last Parliament—that from the great interest he had taken for many years back in this question, on the first accession of the present Government to power, knowing the opinions they had propounded, and knowing the active part they had taken throughout the country in condemning the policy of the late Parliament, and the pledges they had given to reverse that policy, he, under the apprehension that they would use the enormous influence of the Government to carry out their views, and reverse or modify that policy, did put a notice on the books pledging Parliament to a continuance of its free-trade policy. He put that Motion on the paper at the request of the large party who for so many years had energetically and perseveringly attempted, and eventually succeeded, in changing the policy of the country; but, at the request, he might say, of the whole House he withdrew that notice, having consented to do so after the speech of the First Minister of the Crown, accepted and assented to by the Ministers in that House, in which the noble Earl the First Minister of the Crown avowed that he was in a minority on this subject, that he would not change his opinion, but that he would take the opinion of the country on the subject. On that ground he withdrew the notice. He anxiously awaited the assembling of a new Parliament, for the purpose of having this matter decided, because it was the promise, the assurance, of the Minister at that time that he would call an early Session for the purpose of deciding it. The enormous importance of this subject was admitted on all sides of the House. Gentlemen opposite said that unless our policy was reversed, inevitable ruin would follow; but those on his (Mr. Villiers') side affirmed that the prosperity of the country was conditional upon its continuance. The First Minister of the Crown, Lord Derby, said the question was of too great importance to be left unsettled, and that it must be decided finally; and everybody throughout the country knew that it was for this purpose they were assembled at the present unusual season. He rose now, not to depart from what he knew to be the custom, and what he believed to be the wish generally of the Members of that House—not to move an Amendment on the Address. That was not his purpose, but he must call attention to the fact that up to that moment, though they had heard the Speech from the Throne, and speeches from the Mover and Seconder of the Address, they did not know whether the Ministers of the Crown had abandoned their opinions on the subject of protection. And he asserted that in which he had the concurrence of the First Minister of the Crown, when he said that it was essential this subject should be decided. It could not, however, be decided by the language of the Address, for the language was vague; and, though he should be sorry to introduce angry feelings into this discussion, he could almost say that it was deceptive. There was an allusion to the prosperity of the industrious classes, but there was also a reference to injury inflicted on certain interests, and to some, relief to be afforded to the industry of the nation. Why, if the working classes were well off, what was the meaning of the statement that something required to be done to relieve the injury inflicted upon the industry of the country? Moreover, whether any injury was done at all was one of the great points at issue on this matter. The opinion advocated on this side of the House was, that protection was an unqualified mischief—that it was not only an enormous mischief to the community at large, but that there was no exception to its being mischievous, and that it was an evil to the interests said to be protected. Protection to the landed interest meant a monopoly in supplying the food of the country; and, therefore, to talk of injury done to industry, by destroying what was a monopoly of its food, was a statement which he did not like to characterise. It was an insult to the people of this country to talk of persons being injured by the removal of a mischief to them that had been inflicted on them for a period of thirty years. But the whole phraseology of this paragraph was indistinct, vague, and, in his opinion, intended to confuse. He thought it depended a little on the tone that was assumed by Gentlemen on the other side of the House, what interpretation might be put on it by his side. It was said there had been "recent legislation." That was a very curious expression. Why not speak plain English? Why not use language that would be intelligible? If great advantage had been derived to the working classes from the repeal of the Corn Laws, why not state it? If it is intended to be said that injury had been done to any class by repealing the Corn Laws, let that be made clear; at any rate clear, distinct, without question, and unequivocal, they (the Opposition) would have the decision of the House on the great subject for which they had met. He had only risen for the purpose of saying that he, for one, who took a great interest in this matter—and he believed others, who had taken a far more effective interest in it, concurred with him, and felt wholly dissatisfied with the passage in the Queen's Speech in which reference was made to the state of the country, and to the causes of its improved condition. They wanted to know distinctly the opinions of the Government on the great question which had been put in issue, namely, the policy of protection, or the policy of free trade; and they were disappointed, for there was no information on that head; he, therefore, without detaining the House farther, would give them distinct notice that he would submit to the House a Motion, putting the question on such clear and intelligible grounds that at least their fellow-countrymen out of the House should be left in no doubt with regard to the opinion of Parliament respecting it. This Motion he would bring forward on the 22nd of the present month, that being, he understood, the earliest convenient oppor-

Mr. HUME said, he had waited with great patience in hopes that, in accordance with the usual practice of the House, some individual on the opposite side would have risen to notice the speech of the hon. Gentleman who had just sat down. His hon. Friend had thrown out a challenge, but there seemed to be a want of spirit on the other side, and an indisposition to answer the statements which had been made. He thought the Queen's Speech very unsatisfactory to the Commons of England, who had been sent to their different constituencies in order that the people might decide on this important policy of free trade. He was, however, delighted to hear it acknowledged that that policy had been productive of such immense benefits to the working classes. He could recollect his opponents on this question declaring that the desire of the landed interest was not to benefit themselves, but to improve the condition of the agricultural labourers. They had then their wish, for the condition of the agricultural labourer was admitted by the hon. Gentleman opposite to be overflowing with abundance. Had not a single man on the opposite side the manliness to stand up, and to acknowledge that this arose from the repeal of the Corn Laws? This certainly was admitted by the seconder of the Address, who, indeed, was a free-trader, though the mover might not be one; for here, as at the elections, the same rule seemed to prevail, and the Ministerial supporters declared themselves, one for free trade, and another for protection. The House, however, ought to bear in mind the object for which it had met at this period of the year, and he considered Her Majesty most unfortunate in not having a Cabinet Council able to make up its mind on this subject after about nine months' deliberation. Why did Ministers not acknowledge in intelligible language that they were wrong, and declare themselves now ready to keep up a policy which had been productive of such overwhelming benefits to the working classes? He must express his great disappointment that the Ministers had not distinctly stated and defended the course of policy they intended to pursue. He liked a fair, upstanding fight, but not one beneath hedges, or carried on by equivocal phrases which he did not comprehend. He confessed that he himself did not always make his meaning as clear as it should be—it was not every man who had the talent to do that—and he sometimes made use of a wrong phrase: his object was, however, to make himself understood by the House; and if he had the writing of a Queen's Speech, he would endeavour to do what he thought it was the duty of the Government to do—make the Speech clear and intelligible to all classes. He therefore approved the notice of Motion which had been given by his hon. Friend (Mr. Villiers), for the country must have a decision on the question of free-trade, as suspense was creating a paralysis in the whole affairs of the nation. He knew, with respect to a great number of farmers, that their opinions on the policy of free-trade had changed, that they admitted the improvement which had taken place, and would be sorry to retrograde. But still there were others who thought that the Government were in possession of some secret to do them good, and that they were to be benefitted by some measures which the Government would introduce. A clear explanation and decision on this point therefore was absolutely necessary. He had also to complain of an omission in the Queen's Speech. The preceding Parliament had declared that certain taxes were most unjustly and unfairly levied (that was in his opinion a wise declaration), and it was a great neglect that all allusion to this topic was omitted in the Speech. Our whole system of taxation rested on no unintelligible basis, which any one taking a comprehensive view could readily explain. He claimed the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer as an advocate on his side with respect to this point, for his (Mr. Hume's) Motion, for which the right hon. Gentleman voted, limiting the income tax to one year, had not only in view the removal of an unjust portion of that tax, but also the affording an opportunity for revising the whole system of taxation, and considering whether the large burden of taxation could not be imposed in a much less oppressive manner. He did not understand why the Queen's Speech should not have alluded to the subject of the continuance of the income-tax, which was a matter equally important with the East India Committee; and he trusted the Government did not intend to refuse to go on with the inquiry to which he had alluded. There was another point to which he wished to make some reference. Many people had been so simple as to believe that a large measure of Parliamentary Reform would be proposed by the present Ministers, and that they would actually go much further than the noble Lord (Lord John Russell), or any of his Colleagues, were prepared to go. He was sorry to say that disappointment at the silence of the Queen's Speech on this subject was not great with him, though it might be with others. However, as the noble Earl at the head of the Government had declared that he took office to prevent all further democratic progress, why was not some distinct statement to this effect put in the Queen's Speech? The proceedings which had taken place during the late elections had led to a strong opinion that they were not altogether consistent with that freedom which should characterise them; and, while ready to save the privileges of other bodies, yet he must say that he was anxious to see our Constitution prevailing as a really representative one, and to see the people possessing the power and influence they ought to have in that House. He regretted the Government was not ready to come forward and make these reforms in time, thereby preventing the adoption of those hasty measures which were always taken when things were driven to the last. There was another important omission in the Speech. What had become of the clamorous outcry for the repeal of the Malt Tax and other taxes which were peculiarly odious to farmers? The silence of the Speech declared that there was no intention to repeal them. He regretted that the question of taxation was entirely omitted. In conclusion, he wished to tell hon. Gentlemen opposite, if they were not aware of it, that there was a strong opinion in the country that elections could not be conducted in future as they had been lately. He wished to see established a regular Representative Government; he wished to see popular power exercising that influence which it ought to have in the proceedings of that House, while at the same time the just privileges of the different classes of society were properly guarded; and he regretted that in a time of peace and quiet the Government did not seem prepared to come forward and propose those reforms which the country required. The question of free trade must soon be settled one way or other; and the time would then come for introducing other questions of great national importance.

MR. WALPOLE: Sir, I did not rise, nor did any other Member of the Government rise, immediately after the observations which were made by the hon. Member for Wolverhampton (Mr. Villiers), because it was our duty to wait and see whether any Amendment to the Address was likely to be moved, before we gave any opinion in reply to the remarks which fell from that hon. Member. As, however, the hon. Gentleman himself, and also the hon. Gentleman who has just sat down (Mr. Hume), has not thought fit to move an Amendment, and as no one else has risen to do so, it appears at present unlikely that any Amendment will be moved; and I am therefore desirous of offering thus early a few remarks, with reference to the observations which the hon. Gentleman has made. Now, I certainly agree with him, that we are met together at an unusual season of the year, and for a special purpose. That purpose unquestionably is, that the financial and commercial policy of this country shall be finally settled and declared. The hon. Gentleman complains that in the Address there is a certain passage referring to that subject in terms which are ambiguous; and I think he called it evasive and deceptive. Sir, I can assure the hon. Gentleman that no evasion and no deception was intended by that paragraph; but it has been worded carefully in that way—which makes it coincide with the opinion entertained by the hon. Gentleman himself—it has been worded carefully in that way to prevent at this moment what might possibly be a warm and heated discussion, and so as to avoid the necessity of any Amendment being moved to the Address either on this or on that side of the House. By taking this course we have only acted in strict conformity with the usual custom that is observed on these occasions. The custom is to avoid, if possible, the necessity for any Amendment. I think the hon. Gentleman himself admitted that such was the custom. I believe it is recognised to be a good custom—and certainly we wished as far as possible that this custom should not be departed from on the present occasion—but we are prepared, if the hon. Gentleman opposite desire it, to take the discussion at the present moment. The hon. Member for Wolverhampton went on to remark, and so also did the hon. Gentleman who has just sat down, that Her Majesty's Ministers ought to have declared their policy in the Queen's Speech, and that they ought also at the same time to have been prepared with the measures which they intend to propose. Now, I tell the hon. Gentleman that we are prepared with all those measures; and I tell him that we intend, and have always intended, to take the earliest opportunity of submitting those measures to the consideration of the House. But there are circumstances with reference to our present meeting which have certainly made it unadvisable that that business should be taken in hand until the funeral of the Duke of Wellington shall have taken place. As soon as that tribute of the nation is paid to the greatest of its heroes, my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer will bring before the House the views and opinions which the Government entertain of the financial and commercial policy which ought to be established and perpetuated in this country. In the mean time I must take the liberty of adding that there is sufficient in the Speech from the Throne, and in the Address in answer to it, for everybody to draw this inference, that we are not going to propose to reverse the recent legislation which has led to those improvements in the condition of the industrial classes of the community to which the Speech so plainly refers. More than this, I think, the House will not expect me to say, because it would, in fact, be expecting me to announce the different measures which my right hon. Friend will, on a future occasion, have to bring forward, and the views which we take with reference to that subject. I therefore forbear from saying more. But I thought it right to make this declaration in the first instance—for it is a declaration by which the Government intend to abide—and I do say that those measures which the Government think it necessary to introduce will be brought forward on the earliest opportunity.

LORD JOHN RUSSELL: Sir, it appears to me that on an occasion when we have to consider an Address to the Crown, which begins with a paragraph in which we are called upon to condole with Her Majesty on the loss of that great man the late Duke of Wellington, we should not be obliged to enter into any lengthened debate upon topics on which the House is divided, and still less to be compelled to take a division on these topics. In respect to the first part of the Address, I shall not add anything to what has been said by the noble Lord and the hon. Gentleman who moved and seconded the Address. I feel that upon the subject of the late Duke of Wellington eulogy is superfluous. It remains for history to record his great genius. It remains for us, unfortunately—for Her Majesty and for Her Majesty's Ministers—for the House of Lords and for the country at large, to deplore the loss of that eminent man, who was inspired by the purest principles of loyalty and the most ardent patriotism, and who had earned the undying love of his country. One only task remains to us—namely, in conformity with the invitation we have received from the Crown, to show that we are not an ungrateful people, and that we duly appreciate the services rendered to the country by that illustrious man. Passing from that subject, I am glad to find that the Ministers can congratulate the country on the readiness with which the people had come forward, to the amount, as stated by the noble Lord who moved the Address, of 30,000 to serve in the militia; and I trust that Her Majesty's hopes will not be disappointed, but that this force will prove an effective aid to Her Majesty's regular troops. With respect to the other measures deemed necessary for the defence of this country, I can assure Her Majesty's Ministers that I shall be prepared to give a favourable consideration to the subject; and I hope that such measures as Her Majesty's Ministers may think advisable to effect that object, in which we all concur, may be from time to time submitted to the House. I know not that there is any other topic in the Speech to which I need now particularly address myself; but I must say a few words in regard to that paragraph in the Speech which refers to the commercial policy of late years. I must say I participate in the disappointment expressed by the hon. Member for Wolverhampton (Mr. C. Villiers) in the vagueness of the language here used, and I heartily concur in the course which that hon. Member has proposed to take. It seems to me that there were two courses which would have been plain and clear for the First Lord of the Treasury and his Colleagues to have adopted—the one was to maintain the opinions which from 1846 to the present time—or, at least, until February last, when he took office—Lord Derby constantly expressed, and which he expressed with such energy and earnestness that he declared that any departure from the principle of protection to which he adhered, would be a departure from his own consistency, and involve the loss of personal respect. That would have been one course. The other was, that finding he had been mistaken in those views, that the country had prospered owing to the operation of measures which he thought would be ruinous to it, and that the beneficial effects of those measures were acknowledged throughout the country—finding this, he could have manfully declared his adoption of these measures, and his readiness to act upon their principles for the future. Sir, I conceive that, whether he had adopted the one or the other of those courses, the House and the country would have been prepared to form their judgment upon such a declaration; but instead of either of these courses, we have a continuance of that perplexity, of that ambiguity, of that doubt, which for the last nine months has filled men's minds, and made it difficult to know what were the real intentions of Her Majesty's Ministers with regard to our future commercial policy. If one Minister has appeared to be in favour of free trade, we have immediately had the declaration from another that the principles of protection were not to be abandoned. If a Secretary of State has spoken at the hustings, although he may not have said the principles of protection were to be resumed, yet, in speaking of the state of crime, or some other subject, he has endeavoured to throw out some slur by way of depreciating the system of free trade, and thereby induce the country to believe that it was not intended to depart from the principles of protection. And even now, continuing to the end, we have in this Address some parts of the sentences favourable to free trade; we have other parts of the sentences favourable to the theory of protection; and, to complete the whole, the noble Lord who moved the Address was himself one of the adherents of the protective system, whilst the hon. Gentleman who seconded him, spoke out boldly, and declared himself to be in favour of free trade. Well, Sir, if such is the ambiguity, then I say it is full time that we should come to a settlement of this question—that, in the words of the right hon. Gentleman who last spoke (Mr. Walpole), the financial and commercial policy of this country should be finally settled and decided. Well, let us have some declaration which shall be a point of departure for the Ministers of the Crown by which they can regulate their future course. The country has been appealed to—the result of that appeal is known—it is for you then to declare what are the opinions you now entertain upon this great subject. And when I say “this great subject,” I am reminded that there is one in this strange and doubtful sentence that has not been alluded to. Consider what has been done within the last ten years. In the first place you have had the whole system of Corn Laws, upon which the country had reposed for a considerable time, totally repealed. You have adopted a tariff by which many duties which were excessive and exorbitant in amount, have been reduced within moderate limits. In short, during the whole of that period your system of taxation has been subjected to the process of revision. Gentlemen talk of a “revision of taxation,” but they seem to forget that a revision of taxation has been going on from the time of Sir Robert Peel's assumption of the reins of power in 1841. And it has operated in this manner—that whilst a tax which has been reduced left for a time a void in the revenue, in a very short time that void was filled up by the natural buoyancy of the industry of the country; you were then enabled to abolish or reduce other taxes, and thus continue a process by which the industry of the country was relieved and stimulated. Let us add to this that the differential duties on sugar have been equalised, and the prohibition—for it was a prohibition, although it was not so in law—of foreign sugar has entirely ceased. In that manner alone the people have consumed their 200,000 tons of sugar at a price upwards of 5,000,000*l.* less than they did when these duties existed, and the consumption of sugar has so increased that, in a very few years, it will be double what it was in 1849. Add to this also that the Navigation Laws have been repealed; and thus I have enumerated a whole system, not only, I will say, of great importance, but as great a change of policy, adopted by a great country, as is recorded in the history of the world—a change of policy than which nothing, since the Revolution of 1688, has been more important in its effects, and that, be it observed, not only in its effects on this country, but, as I trust, hereafter, in its effects upon the whole system of commercial policy of all civilised nations. Although I was not one of those who were so sanguine as to expect that immediately we declared by a majority in this House that we adopted free trade and abjured protection, all the nations of the world would at once follow our example, yet, on the other hand, it is my confident belief that if this country continues to profit under that system, and if the Government of this country declares that it is satisfied with its importance and with its consequences, and that they mean to persevere in it, other nations will, from free discussion and debate, come to the same conclusion you have arrived at, and thus will be derived not only a great increase of wealth and trade, but great increased security for the peace and the harmony of the world. If such, then, is the importance of this system, if such is its gravity, and if, on the other hand, many persons still maintain that it is a system which is entirely ruinous, is it enough to say that it is one of the causes, put in with a parcel of nameless other causes, from which the industrious classes have received benefit? I affirm that we ought not to evade the question in this way; and that, however much we could wish to avoid a division to-night, it is necessary that the House of Commons should give its verdict upon that question. The right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Walpole) says, that there is no intention to revert to the policy which prevailed previous to the year 1846. I was very glad to hear that declaration from such authority. But there are certain words in this paragraph in the Address which look like giving artificial prop, and creating, therefore, artificial prices, which is only the principle of protection disguised in another shape. Therefore, for this reason alone, I think it is necessary that we should have something clear and decided, and that we should not allow ourselves to be enveloped in that mist in which the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer, like some of the goddesses of old, loves to conceal himself. With regard to another sentence in the Address—that relating to Ireland—I am glad to see that it contains recommendations of a liberal policy towards that country; but in the previous part of the same paragraph there are words to which I own I feel myself unable to attach any precise meaning. I allude to the reference which is there made to “an unhappy spirit of insubordination and turbulence.” That there was a spirit of insubordination and turbulence during the general election in Ireland cannot certainly be denied; but that there is any spirit of insubordination and turbulence at present existing in Ireland, is a statement to which I am not prepared to give my assent. With due execution of the ordinary laws of the country, I believe that the state of Ireland may be considered as a state of tranquillity; and I must say, I think that that country having suffered so severely from the famine of 1847, is now about in some measure to recover, and that there are symptoms which encourage us to hope that at length the labourers of Ireland will obtain that reward for their exertions which has hitherto, up to the present time, been so inadequate to the labours of that class of the people. With regard to the reports of the Commissioners appointed to inquire into the Universities of Oxford and Cambridge, I am rejoiced to find that those Commissions, which were stigmatised by the noble Lord at the head of the Government as illegal Commissions, are now acknowledged as productive of fruit; that it is proposed that their recommendations, instead of being cast aside as the productions of an illegal body, are to be referred to the Universities themselves, and that we are to be asked to pass laws to enable those Universities to carry into effect improvements which cannot now be legally adopted. Whether or not the measures contemplated on this subject will be sufficient, I, of course, cannot presume to say, but I am glad to find that the attention of Her Majesty's Ministers has been directed to the subject. I am sure there is nothing more important at the present time than the whole question of education, beginning with the education of the higher classes at Oxford and Cambridge; considering likewise the education of the middle classes, and their means of obtaining those scientific aids which are often so useful to their progress in life; and comprehending also the education of the whole of the poorer classes of the country. Upon one part of this subject, though it is but a part—the advancement of the fine arts and practical science—I am much rejoiced to find that it is proposed to extend the means by which those who wish to acquire information in these branches of knowledge may attend schools for this purpose. I am likewise glad to find that, on the subject of secondary punishments, a hope is expressed in the Speech from the Throne that measures will be adopted by which transportation to Van Diemen's Land may at no remote period be altogether discontinued. There are two circumstances which have undoubtedly tended to give a new aspect to that subject—the one is, that we have given popular institutions to the Australian Colonies; the other is, the recent discoveries of gold in certain parts of those Colonies. It is quite obvious that these two circumstances make it necessary to revise the whole subject; and I am very glad the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary for the Colonies (Sir J. Pakington), to whom I took the liberty of speaking upon this subject soon after his entrance on office, has come to a conclusion which appears to me a wise one. I hope, however, it is not intended to confine the operation of the contemplated measure to Van Diemen's Land alone. I think the whole of the Australian Colonies ought to be relieved in future from the reception of convicts under sentence of transportation from this country. There are other subjects connected with our penal laws which also seem to me to require attention: but to these I will not further allude on the present occasion. The subject of legal reform, I see, occupies the attention of Her Majesty's Government, and upon this, too, measures are to be introduced. Upon the whole, then, I am rejoiced to find that, with the exception, certainly, of that great question of our commercial policy—the great and important question as between the principles of free trade and the principles of protection—there is nothing in the Speech from the Throne, or in the Address in reply to that Speech, which needs more than the slight remarks I have now made; and I trust that, when we have adopted a policy on that subject, we shall be able, in the present Parliament, to pass measures which will be of permanent advantage to the country at large.

The CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: Sir, I cannot help fancying that if the only paragraph of which the noble Lord disapproves in the Answer to Her Majesty's most gracious Speech from the Throne were really so evasive as some hon. Gentlemen have described it to be, that an Amendment to the Address would at once have been moved. I do not think that the constitutional delicacy of my hon. Friend opposite (Mr. Hume) would have deterred him from taking a course which I doubt not his well-stored memory and his ample experience would have furnished him with sufficient precedents for adopting. I cannot say that I agree with the noble Lord or his friends in the version they have given of this paragraph which they describe as evasive. It appears to me to be one perfectly adapted to the circumstances under which we meet to-day. I think the paragraph is framed in a manner which can leave no mistake in any impartial mind as to the intentions of Her Majesty's Ministers; for the only point which is laid down positively in this paragraph, respecting which there can be no evasion, is the description of the principle upon which the commercial system of this country is recognised to be established by Her Majesty's Government, and that is the principle of "unrestricted competition." That is the distinct declaration in this paragraph, which is described as evasive on this particular topic. It is very true that Her Majesty's Government are of opinion that the legislation which has gradually produced that system of "unrestricted competition" has in its operation caused injury to certain classes in this country; and the noble Lord says that is a protectionist declaration. But I recollect having read an address of the noble Lord's which was published just before the dissolution of the late Parliament—a letter addressed by the noble Lord to the constituency of the greatest commercial city in the kingdom—and there I find that the merchants and shipowners of London were reminded that they were subjected to great burdens and unjust restrictions—burdens and restrictions that could only be considered such by the action of recent legislation. Therefore, the noble Lord was then of opinion, when he was a candidate for the City, that it was quite possible to maintain and preserve our commercial system upon a principle of "unrestricted competition," and yet remove those burdens and those restrictions which one great interest was suffering under, and which suffering, by his own acknowledgment, was virtually occasioned by recent legislation. Was that a protectionist declaration of the noble Lord? Was that a piece of protection, as he has described a similar expression in the paragraph in Her Majesty's Speech? Well, I myself have recently had representations made to me by bodies of merchants and shipowners—gentlemen of extremely liberal opinions upon all subjects connected with the commerce of the country, some of them sitting at this moment on the side of this House opposite Her Majesty's Government; and certainly as far as I could collect their opinions—as the representatives of one of the great interests of the country—they would be dissatisfied if the restrictions under which they suffer, and the burdens they have to bear, are not taken into consideration by any body of men, of any side, who may happen to form the Government of the day. Well, is that a desire to abrogate the laws which have recently been carried into effect as the foundation of our commercial system? Is that a protectionist movement? I ask the House whether the noble Lord has any further foundation for the charge he has made of evasion than the allusion to those suffering interests which he has himself endorsed by his own example and his own words, when a candidate for the City, and of which many hon. Gentlemen sitting in this House, on the other side, are themselves the principal patrons and promoters? Sir, I shall not on the present occasion pursue this topic further—the occasion will soon arise when we may enter into those questions. All I can say is, that it is the intention of Her Majesty's Government to take such claims—such and similar claims—into their consideration, to endeavour to mitigate the injury which has been occasioned by recent legislation in the particular instance to which I have referred, and similar ones; and we believe that we can produce measures which may do all that is necessary in that respect, or all that can reasonably be required, without in any way departing from that principle of “unrestricted competition,” which we recognise as the principle of our commercial legislation. Then the noble Lord has found it very convenient to adopt the course of describing himself and his friends as the representatives of a new and enlightened system of commercial policy, which has been invariably and bigotedly opposed by hon. Gentlemen on this side of the House. [Cheers.] Hon. Gentlemen, though they have changed sides, have not lost one of their weaknesses—an amiable one, I confess—which is, to cheer too soon. The noble Lord has given us an emblazoned catalogue of the great feats of that liberal commercial party of which he is the acknowledged chief; free trade in corn, free trade in sugar, repeal of the navigation laws—these are the three enduring pyramids which have been created by the energy and the enterprise of the party which the noble Lord leads, and the different individuals of the different sections who are associated with the noble Lord. But if we look historically into the question—and I am only in self-defence making these observations, for I had thought from the tone of the debate that we had already terminated it—I cannot help remembering this, that the Prime Minister who carried free trade in corn, was himself opposed to free trade in sugar;

and then, that the Prime Minister who followed him, and who was in favour of free trade in sugar, was not at all disposed to free trade in ships—that, in fact, that question was not taken up by the Government, but that it was an independent Committee of this House, moved by an independent Member of this House, which placed this question in a prominent position—that two Sessions were allowed to pass away before the noble Lord consented to the abrogation of the navigation laws; and when they were abrogated they were abrogated in so loose and unsatisfactory a manner that the noble Lord, at a subsequent period, as I have already reminded the House, when he was a candidate for the suffrages of the citizens of London, confessed that the shipping interest, though deprived by recent legislation of the protection it had enjoyed, had been left with the burdens and restrictions for which that protection was a compensation. Now, Sir, neither myself, nor any of my colleagues, have any intention to propose any policy which will give artificial prices, or attempt to give what an hon. Gentleman on the other side has mentioned as compensation for losses which have been occasioned by changes in the legislation which heretofore regulated the commerce of this country. But what we do say, and say in a manner as distinct as I can succeed in expressing it, with I hope none of those cloudy words for which the noble Lord has given me credit, is, that we think these commercial changes have been effected without at the same time effecting necessary and corresponding changes in our financial system. And, notwithstanding what the noble Lord has asserted, and notwithstanding the sympathising cheer which we received from one of his late colleagues, who is certainly well acquainted with that branch of the subject—I say, it is our intention, believing that a proper revision of our taxation has not taken place—it is our intention to place before the House a policy which will make our financial system more in harmony with our commercial system; and if the noble Lord calls that protection, why the noble Lord will not, I think, be successful in establishing his position when he favours the House with his opinions on the propositions of Her Majesty's Government. My hon. Friend the Member for Montrose (Mr. Hume), in that friendly way in which he sometimes administers a castigation, even to the Government he patronises, has made a most weighty accusation against Her Majesty's Government on the present occasion. The "evasive paragraph," respecting free trade, which my hon. Friend caught up from the hon. Member for Wolverhampton (Mr. Villiers), appears to have really impressed him with a very little amount of importance. The whole mind of my hon. Friend seems to have been engrossed with the income tax. My hon. Friend says there ought to have been a paragraph inserted in the Speech, announcing that there was to be a continuation of the Committee of Inquiry into the Income and Property Tax. Why, we have already had that Committee sitting for two years inquiring into the subject. My hon. Friend appears to be a perfect glutton in this inquiry. I admit there is not a paragraph with regard to the Committee on the Income and Property Tax in the Speech, and for this reason—that Her Majesty's Ministers have made up their minds upon the subject—that subject which seems still to vex the mind of my hon. Friend—Her Majesty's Ministers have arrived at certain conclusions on that subject. They do not, therefore, think it necessary to investigate it any further, and they are perfectly prepared to bring those conclusions immediately under the consideration of the House of Commons. My right hon. Friend the Home Secretary has adverted to the reasons why we have not to-day fixed the exact hour at which we shall solicit the attention of the House to these questions. There are reasons which have prevented us—reasons which really render for a few days the arrangement of business in this House less clear and evident than they would have been under ordinary circumstances; but I believe, if I am not misinformed, my noble Colleague at the head of the Government has already announced in another place that I shall, on the part of Her Majesty's Government, take the earliest day of which we can avail ourselves to lay our entire policy before the House of Commons and the Parliament, in order that it may be submitted to their solemn and serious consideration, and that the verdict of Parliament and of the country may be obtained upon it. The Motion of which the hon. Member for Wolverhampton has given notice, would be in reality a Motion almost of inquiry into the state of the country. Certainly I have no wish to place any obstacle in the way of the Motion of the hon. Gentleman; but if the right hon. Gentleman feels it to be his duty to persevere in it, let him do so by all means; but I do not think that with my utmost exertions to promote the convenience of the House, it would be possible for me to name a Government day for that or any other purpose earlier than the 22nd inst. If the right hon. Gentleman think fit to persevere in the course he has proposed to himself, it is of course competent for him to do so; but he will forgive me for saying that it occurs to me that it will be much fairer to the Government, and much more satisfactory to the country if, before taking any step of the aggressive character he contemplates, he were to permit the Government an opportunity of laying their policy before the country. The debate to which the Motion of the right hon. Gentleman would give rise, must necessarily resemble in character and tendency that which would arise in this House on occasion of our submitting our policy to the consideration of Parliament; and it appears to me that the more convenient, the fairer, and in all respects the better course, would be to blend the discussions together, and not allow the energies of the House, and of the country, to be wasted and frittered away by two debates—one of them—that proposed by the hon. Gentleman—certainly of a less practical character than that which I shall have the honour of bringing forward. The hon. Gentleman can easily introduce his Motion by way of Amendment on the proposition which it is my intention to submit on the part of Her Majesty's Government; and if he should be of opinion that the views and intentions of Her Majesty's Government are not such as are likely to be satisfactory to himself and his friends—if, in fact, he should be of opinion that our policy is one which is not calculated to promote the welfare and prosperity of the country—nothing can be more easy, nothing more conveniently practicable, than that he should bring forward any other policy which he may deem preferable, in the shape of an Amendment on the propositions which we intend to submit. It will then be competent for the House, by one discussion, as long and as elaborate as to its wisdom may seem fitting, to decide between the plan of the Government and that of the hon. Gentleman, and to come to a distinct decision upon all the branches of the question. Nothing can be more remote from my intention than a desire to dictate to the hon. Gentleman—I trust that he will not misunderstand my feelings in making this suggestion—but I confidently appeal to his own sense of propriety, and to that of the House, whether it would not be the more convenient and in all respects the more desirable course, that we should avail ourselves of an early opportunity to explain our policy, and that there then should be one discussion, and one only, on a subject which so closely concerns, not only the present condition of the country, but the future and permanent principles on which the financial and commercial systems of this country are to be established. I cannot at this moment fix a day—but I should imagine that between this time and Friday the 26th instant, there would be sufficient interval to enable Members not now in town to attend here without inconvenience; and if so, I would propose that upon that day I should take occasion, on the part of the Government, to call the attention of the House to our present financial condition, so that I may then explain to the House the measures which, in our opinion, ought to be adopted in the present position of the country. I will not trespass on the attention of the House with any general observations on the Speech from the Throne. The noble Lord the Member for London has himself admitted that there is only one paragraph in it which merits his disapproval, and I am not without hope that I have satisfied the House that even in the case of that one paragraph his disapproval was not well grounded. If the paragraph in question had been of the evasive character which he describes, I cannot think that the House would have acquiesced with such alacrity in the suggestion that there should be no Amendment on the Address. More I will not say upon the present occasion; but it is my intention to avail myself of an early opportunity to vindicate the course pursued by Her Majesty's Government, and to lay before the country, with a distinctness not to be mistaken, the policy which, in our opinion, ought to be adopted in the present juncture of affairs. In conclusion I can only assure the House that no one can be more anxious to meet this great controversy than the individual who has now the honour to address them.

MR. GLADSTONE: Sir, so much has been said, and said so well, on the solemn subject of the first paragraph in the gracious Speech from the Throne, that I shall do no more than express my entire concurrence with those who have preceded me, and to state how high a privilege I feel it to have been permitted to be one of those who, on the part of the people, carried to the foot of the Throne their tribute of admiration and sorrow for the illustrious man we have lost. I will venture to repeat the sentiments expressed in another place, and upon another occasion, by the noble Lord the Member for the City of London, and say—

“While many of the actions of his life—while many of the qualities which he possessed are unattainable by others, there are lessons which we may all derive from the life and actions of that illustrious man. It may never be given to another subject of the British Crown to perform services so brilliant as he performed; it may never be given to another man to hold the sword which was to gain independence for Europe, to rally the nations around it, and while England saved herself by her constancy to save Europe by her example; it may never be given to another man, after having attained such eminence, after an unexampled series of victories, to show equal moderation in peace as he had shown greatness in war, and to devote the remainder of his life to the cause of internal and external peace for that country which he had so served; it may never be given to another man to have equal authority, both with the Sovereign he served, and with the Senate of which he was to the end a venerated member; it may never be given to another man, after such a career, to preserve even to the last the full possession of those great faculties with which he was endowed, and to carry on the services of one of the most important departments of the State with unexampled regularity and success, even to the latest day of his life. These are circumstances, these are qualities which may never again occur in the history of this country. But there are qualities which the Duke of Wellington displayed of which we may all act in humble imitation:—that sincere and unceasing devotion to our country; that honest and upright determination to act for the benefit of the country on every occasion; that devoted loyalty which, while it made him ever anxious to serve the Crown, never induced him to conceal from the Sovereign that which he believed to be the truth; that devotedness in the constant performance of his duty; that temperance of his life, which enabled him at all times to give his mind and his faculties to the services which he was called upon to perform; that regular, consistent, and unceasing piety by which he was distinguished at all times in his life,—these are qualities that are attainable by others, and these are qualities which should not be lost as an example.”

The noble Member for London has adverted briefly to a subject on which, as a Member for one of our Universities, I may be forgiven for offering a single sentence. I am one of many Gentlemen, then in the House, who considered that the noble Lord was venturing upon a stretch of power in the adoption of an inquiry into our Universities; but, the Commissions having been appointed, I do not think that I am guilty of inconsistency in admitting that the results of those inquiries must be considered on their merits, wholly irrespective of abstract discussions, or practical discussions, as to the strictly constitutional nature of the tribunal before which those inquiries were instituted. I now come to the main question—to the question important above all others, and it appears to me that much has been gained for that question by the discussion arising out of the speech of the hon. Member for Wolverhampton (Mr. C. Villiers); and I, for one, tender him my warm thanks for that speech. I do not doubt that it was previously the intention of the Government to announce to the House what has, since that speech, been declared by two prominent Members of the Government, but at the same time it must be confessed that until just now we were left quite in the dark as to those intentions. We have before us a paragraph of the Speech from the Throne, and of the Address in answer to that Speech, in which the important—I must say, considering all the circumstances, the all-important—subject of our commercial policy, is touched, and that paragraph, I must confess, excited in my mind, as in the minds of others who have spoken, dissatisfaction and disappointment. I thought, and I still think, admitting with all respect the reasons alleged in connexion with the solemnities of the next week, that, considering we are now upon the winding up of a great controversy which has had its conspicuous place in the politics of the day, and which will have its place also in the pages of our history—that, considering this question is the final issue on which the policy of the country has been placed, and that the Speech from the Throne is the great constitutional occasion for recognising the great object and principles of the Government—I say I think, bearing all these things in mind, Her Majesty's Ministers would have acted wisely, would have done no more than their duty, had they given us in the course of the Speech a declaration on the subject of their commercial policy which would have placed for ever beyond dispute the intention of the party which now holds the reins of Government. I am confirmed in this impression by the defence which has been set up by the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer; for it appears to me that the Government, in defending that paragraph, defend it on two principles, which are not only not in unison, but which are flatly contradictory to one another. The right hon. Secretary of State for the Home Department says that this was a paragraph suitable for the occasion—suitable for the occasion!—with the view—with the especial view—of obviating the necessity for an Amendment, either on that side of the House or on this. Well, then, if this paragraph was devised simply to obviate the necessity for an Amendment on either side of the House, by declaring nothing that could raise the question of protection, I want to know what becomes of the other defence of the paragraph which is in the mouth of the right hon. Chancellor of the Exchequer, that it is not ambiguous, that we may easily draw one inference from it, namely, that it is not the intention of the Government to revive the policy of protection? Nay, the right hon. Gentleman goes much further, for he says there is but one theme which is categorically declared in the Speech, and this is, that unrestricted competition shall from this time forward be the rule of the commercial policy of this country. But, if unrestricted competition is to be the rule, and that is categorically declared in the Speech—the only thing categorically declared there—I want to know what becomes of all the tenderness suggested by the other right hon. Gentleman for the scruples of those who still adhere to protection? Supposing the Government prepared to adhere to the proposition so categorically declared, that unrestricted competition is to be the rule of our commercial policy, if these Gentlemen do not stick at that, what in the world will they afterwards make a difficulty of? Here, then, we are called upon to accept two defences of the paragraph; but, in my opinion, I am bound to adopt only one of two defences which are so clearly irreconcilable with each other, and the first defence, good or otherwise in itself, may be the best of the two. But the question for us is, do we know the special purpose for which the people have returned us to Parliament; and are we prepared to say that this purpose shall not be fulfilled? Ambiguous the paragraph undoubtedly is. The great question to which so much of our recent legislation had been applied, is left in greater uncertainty since the paragraph than before; that great and all-important topic, instead of being put forward prominently into the light of this paragraph, is drawn into the shade. The right hon. Chancellor of the Exchequer says that any Motion with which he may be met by the hon. Member for Wolverhampton, must necessarily partake of the nature of an abstract proposition. I admire the extreme generosity of the right hon. Gentleman, who, having announced—and most properly announced, and I give him full credit for it—his intention of immediately submitting his commercial and financial views and plans to the House, recommends to the hon. Member for Wolverhampton to meet his measure, of a practical and financial character, with the proposal of an abstract resolution: but I hope we shall not be drawn away from the purpose which was essentially contemplated by the constituencies of the country in returning us to this House, and by Her Majesty in dissolving the Parliament, by any abstract propositions whatever. If you ask me what the people want, it is the full, final, and solemn sanction by Parliament of the system of free trade. They want that the party which is now responsible for the conduct of public affairs, shall, once for all, declare its views on this subject. When we consider that for six years past the controversy of free trade has not only entered into but disturbed the whole political action of our representative system, when we consider the uncertainty connected with it, when we consider the maturity which public opinion has now attained with regard to the controversy—it is not too much to ask that now at least, after so much waste of the public time, after Ministries overturned, and parties disorganised, they should now make up their minds on the issue defined by the First Minister of the Crown in February, 1851, and place the question of free trade high and dry on the shore, where the tide of political party strife could no longer reach it. Not that I think there is any doubt about the permanency of any of the great measures which have been adopted by Parliament in the sense of free-trade system. My firm belief is, and has ever been, that since July, 1846, the return of the Corn Laws has been, not a mere difficulty, but an impossibility; and I have ever thought it a great misfortune for the country that a great party in this House, containing many men of the highest honour and the highest intelligence—a party representing some of the most valuable and essential elements of which a constitutional system is rightly framed—should stand together on the basis of objects, the attainment of which has become beyond the power of man to carry. I feel that this is an evil which should be put an end to on the one hand, and that, on the other, the people should understand what is the measure of doctrine of protection put forward at a time when it is just as impossible to restore protection as to repeal the Bill of Rights, or to reconstitute the Heptarchy. We want no abstract Motions, such as the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer appears to desire, to establish this proposition. We want to set the public mind at ease by the solemn and uniform acceptance on the part of this House of the measures of free trade which have been already adopted by Parliament, and likewise by a declaration that future measures bearing on trade and bearing on finance shall be framed in consistency with the principles that have guided our recent legislation on those subjects. I do not call such a declaration an abstract resolution. I call it laying down a rule of conduct; and it is a rule of conduct which, in my opinion, the interests of this country require should at once be established beyond the reach of further doubt or cavil. Is it unreasonable that we should be anxious on this subject? I think not, for we cannot forget the composition of the Government. We cannot forget the declaration which have been made by various members of that Government as to protection and free trade. I will go at once to the case of my right hon. Friend opposite, the man who, of all others, has shown the greatest courage and maintained the greatest consistency in adhering to what he thinks right principles, I mean my right hon. Friend the Member for Lincolnshire (Mr. Christopher). Did my right hon. Friend hear the speech of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, in which that right hon. Gentleman said that there was one thing, at least, categorically declared in the Speech from the Throne, and that this was, that unrestricted competition was from henceforth to be the rule of commercial policy of this country? If he heard that speech, what construction does he put upon the exposition of the right hon. Gentleman? I will advert to the recent declaration of my right hon. Friend to his constituents, and ask, what we are to consider the force and effect of that declaration, not taking merely its words and expressions, but its whole spirit and tenor? They cannot be mistaken. My right hon. Friend says—"I am here to maintain unchanged all those opinions of financial and commercial policy which for the last twenty-five years I have maintained." Do not let my right hon. Friend think that I should represent it as an offence for a man not to adhere pertinaciously to an opinion. I am in no condition, I have no right, to taunt any man for a change of opinion. Like other men, I inherited in respect to this question the traditions of a party. When I came to examine these traditions for myself, I found them give way under me, and I abandoned them. But my right hon. Friend says, he adheres to the opinions he has held for the last twenty-five years; and what one desires to know is, how, as a Member of the Government, he receives the declaration now made by the right hon. Chancellor of the Exchequer. I ask nothing from the Government which is dishonourable to them, personally or politically. I want no professions of internal conversion to free-trade principles. I ask no man's abstract opinions about protection, which is now a matter of past history, any more than I want to know his opinion about Jacobitism; but what I want is this, that those who now hold power in this country—who exercise the influence which belongs to the administration of public affairs—who represent this great country in the face of foreign Powers and of the world—I ask that these persons shall be persons who have definitively, unequivocally, and finally abandoned the idea of proposing a return to protective policy. More I do not feel bound to ask; with less, it seems to me, this House cannot honourably be content. But I am sure my right hon. Friend will feel that we are placed in a position of difficulty, if we are to understand that the Government is formed on a principle under which it is competent to the leader of the House of Commons to say that unrestricted competition is from henceforward to be the rule of our commercial policy, while one of his colleagues, sitting by his side, is to tell us, as he told his constituents elsewhere, that he was a Member of the Government, in order to defend there the principles he had always advocated out of office, and to use his influence to procure the reincorporation of those principles into our commercial code. Sir, my hope is, that whatever decision may be come to by the hon. Member for Wolverhampton as to the resolution to which he has adverted—whether he shall think, or whether he shall not think, that the necessity for that resolution is at the present moment obviated by the declaration of the Government, that their propositions will be immediately laid before the country—whatever decision he may come to in that respect, I trust that this House will never, in the discussion of secondary and incidental questions—questions of the form, and time, and manner of proceeding—lose sight of the great end we have in view; and that, whether before the Motion of the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer, or after it, we reserve to ourselves the liberty of putting into clear words, at a future day, the principles we entertain in case his measures should not afford a sufficiently practical exposition of our sentiments; whatever decision may be come to, or whatever course may be followed, on any question of this nature, I trust that this House will recollect (and that, too, wholly without reference to party combination, which, important as it is, is far less important in my mind than the great issue which we are now discussing) that the country will justly expect of us that we should remember the peculiar circumstances to which we owe our birth, and the especial object for which we have been sent here. I trust that we shall rest content with nothing that is open to argument, and construction, and inference, this way and that way; that we shall not rest content with a paragraph which, instead of settling the question, itself stands in need of glosses and interpretation; but that we shall have it stated in plain English, intelligible to every class of the community, beyond the reach of cavil or dispute, not at the present moment only, but at other times which may come, when a portion of this House might find it convenient to revive the question of protection, that we shall have it stated in language, I say, which shall for the present time, and shall for all time, give an assurance to the people of England that there is no party in the State prepared to defraud or to deprive them of the inestimable boon which has by the legislation of late years been conferred upon them; which boon, so conferred upon them, has not only conduced with other causes, but which has been the main and great cause of the present prosperity of the country, and which, in increasing the prosperity of the country, has spread abroad a satisfaction, a contentment, a confidence in the spirit of Parliament, a firm attachment to our institutions, and has strengthened the foundations of that Throne from which Her Majesty to-day addressed us.

MR. NEWDEGATE begged to tell the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Gladstone), in reply to his question, that, as an independent Member of that House, he did not intend to move an Amendment upon the Address, and that he did not believe that any independent Member on his side of the House would do so; and further, that so far as he (Mr. Newdegate) was aware of the determination of those societies which had been organised for the promotion of the great cause of procuring justice to native industry, it was their resolve—be the declarations of Her Majesty's Government what they might—that until the Government had submitted their commercial and financial measures to the consideration of the Commons of England, they would not pronounce any opinion upon the policy or upon the conduct of Her Majesty's Government. This they considered no more than just; and, although it might suit the tactics of the Opposition to try to force the Protectionist body from their determination, and to arrive at a decision upon the abstract merits of the protective system, as contradistinguished from unrestricted competition, he could tell hon. Gentlemen opposite that they would fail in the attempt to move the Protectionist body from their position. There were some minds so constituted that they were never at ease unless they rested upon some arbitrary dogma; and he believed that the intellect of the right hon. Member for Oxford was one of these; but he could assure that right hon. Gentleman, and those who had preceded him in the debate, that it was as utterly beyond the power of Parliament to establish any arbitrary rule which should for ever hereafter bind the people of this country, as for them to mortgage the intellect of posterity. Be the decision of that House what it might, they could not abdicate for the people of this country, now or hereafter, their claim that the legislation of the country, financial or commercial, should be adapted to meet the exigencies and conveniences of their industry according to the changing requirements of the age, whenever the people should decide upon enforcing that right. He had no more to add than to say, that he believed he expressed the opinion of the protective societies of the kingdom when he stated that they were determined to await the announcement of the policy of the Government, and that they did so in the full confidence that the measures to be propounded would, as far as possible, meet the just requirements of all the interests of the country.

MR. CHRISTOPHER said, that if it had not been for the pointed allusion that had been made to him by the right hon.

Mr. Newdegate

Gentleman the Member for the University of Oxford (Mr. Gladstone), he should not have ventured, after all that had taken place that evening, to intrude himself on the attention of the House with any observations. But his right hon. Friend had addressed himself to him (Mr. Christopher) in a manner so pointed and personal, that he felt it would not be consistent with his position and character in that House were he to refrain from making a few brief remarks on that portion of the right hon. Gentleman's speech which related to himself. He could not suppose that the right hon. Gentleman could have meant to impute to him that he would venture to express, in the presence of his constituents, opinions which he would not be perfectly prepared to uphold in that House. In addressing his constituents during the last contest in which he was engaged, he had invariably expressed his conscientious opinion with regard to the injustice done to the agricultural interest by the repeal of the corn laws, and by all the proceedings that accompanied that repeal. He told them that his opinions on that subject remained entirely unchanged; but at the same time he warned his constituents that it did not depend upon the opinion of any individual Member of the Government, but rather upon the opinion of the country at large, expressed through their representatives in that House, whether the principle of unrestricted competition or of protection was to prevail as to the governing principle of our commercial policy; and when his right hon. Friend taunted him with expressing opinions at variance with those uttered by the Chancellor of the Exchequer, and the noble Earl at the head of the Government, he would take leave to assure his right hon. Friend (Mr. Gladstone) that he should ever be found prepared, upon fitting occasions, to maintain the opinions which he had always entertained with regard to this subject; opinions which he had always fearlessly expressed since he had had the honour of a seat in that House. But, if he found that the people, being appealed to for their decision on two successive occasions, had, on two successive occasions given a verdict which proved that the doctrines he had heretofore advocated were not in accordance with the feelings of the majority of the country, he should feel himself bound to bow to the decision of the country thus unequivocally expressed—[Laughter—and in spite of the taunts of his right hon. Friend and of the cheers of the benches opposite, he believed it the safer and more constitutional practice to adopt a course of this kind, when the country had solemnly pronounced its verdict; and in this opinion he was strengthened and encouraged by the example of the right hon. Gentleman himself, who had bowed to the decision of the country on the question of Parliamentary reform and other subjects. He (Mr. Christopher) as an individual, still entertained the same opinion, that the policy of Sir Robert Peel, in proposing the repeal of the corn laws was not a wise one; but at the same time that he held this opinion he might be clearly sensible that the state of public feeling might render it impossible to return to the principle of protection. What he had said to his constituents was this—and he had never swerved from it—that if the country should decide against the recurrence to protective principles, Her Majesty's Government would come forward and propose some system with respect to the taxation as a measure of relief to the agricultural interest. This was what he had said; and he trusted that, upon a future occasion, when the proposals of the Government should be discussed, he would again have an opportunity of defending himself from such accusations. His only motive for rising on the present occasion was, to prevent any impression prevailing in the House that he had acted in an unworthy manner towards those whom he had the honour of representing. With regard to his own position in connexion with the Government, he had no hesitation in saying that he accepted office under the Administration of his noble Friend from a sincere conviction that, of all statesmen in the country, the noble Lord now at the head of the Administration was the most fitted, from his admitted talents, position, and high principle, to conduct the affairs of a great empire. He had, however, told his noble Friend when he accepted office, that although he felt deeply gratified at the honour of becoming a Member of his Administration, still that he was prepared to place the office he held entirely at his disposal, whenever his noble Friend could strengthen his Administration by the introduction of another more qualified person. In conclusion, he had only to observe that, after what had taken place, he would never be the person to sow discord among the great party with which he had been connected, under the leadership of the late Lord George Bentinck;

and that he was prepared to defend himself on a fitting opportunity against any accusations that might be made against him for deserting the constituency which he represented.

MR. BERNAL OSBORNE said, it seemed to be generally admitted on both sides of the House that the debate on the Queen's Speech was to be a sort of shake hands preparatory to the great political conflicts which were to ensue; that the lion of Montrose was to lie down with the lamb of North Essex, and that nothing was to be said, but that they were to welcome every paragraph of the Speech with a loyalty which bordered, he might say, upon servility. In a constitutional point of view, he thought it was a pity that the course which was adopted in 1849 and 1850 had not been practised now. If he remembered rightly, the right hon. Gentleman who now deprecated any interruption to the harmony which prevailed in that "happy family," and who had attained to the office of Chancellor of the Exchequer, owing to the advocacy of the doctrines of Protection, upon that occasion moved an Amendment upon the Address, for an inquiry into the burdens upon agriculture. That Amendment, after a night's discussion, the right hon. Gentleman did not think it prudent to press to a division; but in 1850 another right hon. Gentleman, who he supposed would give in his adhesion to free trade that evening—he meant the present President of the Poor Law Commission—also moved an Amendment to the Address upon agricultural burdens; and he had greater faith in his principles upon that occasion than his right hon. Leader, for he pressed his Amendment to a division, in which he was disgracefully beaten. He (Mr. B. Osborne) merely alluded to this in order that new Members might dispel from their minds the notion that it was not a constitutional proceeding on the part of the House, when they felt an objection to a paragraph in the Speech, to move an Amendment to the Address; and he thought they would have better done their duty to the country, and advanced the interests of free trade, if they had at that, the earliest opportunity, moved an Amendment upon that paragraph in the Address which had been dictated by the genius of rigmarole, and traced by the hand of mystification. If the right hon. Gentleman wished to tell the House and the country that he had given in his adhesion to free trade, and the Cabinet had gone along with him, what was the occasion for that studiously evasive and deceptive paragraph? Would any Englishman when he read the papers in the morning be able to gather more from that paragraph, so carefully worded to delude Gentlemen on both sides of the House, and to give no information, than that the whole question of free trade was reopened in this country? It might be very well for the right hon. the Secretary of State for the Home Department to tell them, in smooth and dulcet accents, that the policy of free trade was not to be reversed; but how did he reconcile that with his speech before his two-and-twenty electors at Midhurst—or whatever the number might be—when he told them that crime and poor-rates were inversely increasing with the practice of free trade? If the policy of free trade were not to be reversed, as the right hon. Gentleman now with “bated breath” assured them, why had it not been distinctly stated in the Speech from the Throne? Why did not the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer, who had screwed up his courage to many points, take his physic like a man—why make so many gulps in swallowing this free-trade potion? Why did the right hon. Gentleman, who was the genius and soul of his Cabinet, condescend to be tied together with a bundle of incompetent marquesses and men who were at least questionable as to their principles, however honourable they might be in other respects? Why did he not say, “I am a free-trader; I hunted Sir Robert Peel to his grave; I maligned Sir Robert Peel; but I see that I committed a grievous error, and I am now a free-trader?” Don’t let them talk in a vague manner about the spirit of chivalry in the heart of the noble Lord at the head of the Cabinet. Why did the noble Lord in 1846 stand by in the presence of that great man whom he might designate the “Wellington of peace,” and listen to those bitter and envenomed attacks which were levelled, not only against the principle of free trade, but against the person of Sir Robert Peel? For himself, he stated at once that he had no confidence in the chivalry or high principle of the leader of the Administration; and sorry was he to add that he had no great trust in the sincerity of the creator of the party who sat in the House of Commons. He must congratulate the House upon the course of the debate. He had no doubt that in a short time every one of the hon. Gentlemen opposite would take the very manly course adopted by the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster, and bow to the decision of the country. He had nothing to say to that graceful bow which the right hon. Gentleman had made to the decision of the country, except that he thought he would have consulted his own position and his high character, of which he had told them, better, if he had made that bow in the days of Sir Robert Peel, and had not waited until he himself came into office. He knew that office was no object to the right hon. Gentleman. He knew that he had been dragged into this by the mischievous love of party; but still he must bear the imputations which would be made by persons out of that House, who would regret that he had delayed until the eleventh hour making his bow to the decision of the country. The paragraph with reference to free trade imperatively called upon the leaders of the Opposition to decide at once. When the measures of 1846 were passed, they had no notion of compensation to any interest. He denied that injury had been inflicted on any interest, and he denied that compensation should be paid to any interest for the robbery which it had committed on the public for so many years. He was surprised that hon. Gentleman had not seen it in that light. It might be desirable, as an object of party tact, to delay this question; but he was convinced that it would have been better for the country to have met this insidious and evasive paragraph by an Amendment upon the very first opportunity. So much for the doctrine of free trade. As to what was “looming in the future,” as to the bottled problems that they were by and by to see enunciated, he would say nothing on the present occasion. But he would warn the hon. Member for North Warwickshire (Mr. Newdegate), and he would warn the country Gentlemen generally (of whom so much had been said in 1846 and 1847), that the Chancellor of the Exchequer might, after all, turn out to be the Flying Dutchman of the agricultural party; that the right hon. Gentleman having led them on so far—and he begged the farmers of England to mark this—that, having led them on so far for no other object but to elevate himself, would probably be found to have been deluding them once more on the subject of protection. [Cries of “No!”] Aye, but “Yes.” He was not using his own language: he was giving them a paraphrase of the language which the Chancellor of the Exchequer used towards the late Sir Robert Peel. He (Mr. B. Osborne) remembered well the words of the right hon. Gentleman, for they strongly impressed themselves on his memory at the time. The right hon. Gentleman said that he could see a great difference between the leader of the Opposition and the head of the Ministerial party—that he would not contrast too strongly the hours of courtship with the hours of possession—and he moreover said that he had the satisfaction of proclaiming that the policy of the Conservative party was “an organised hypocrisy.” The right hon. Gentleman had taunted his opponents on this occasion with having carried some of their weaknesses into the present discussion. He (Mr. B. Osborne) left the House to judge whether the right hon. Gentleman had not carried a certain degree of “organised hypocrisy” into it as his contribution. Away then, he said, at once with their speeches and their “chivalry,” for he, for one, had confidence in neither, believing, as he did, that they had only used them that they might thereby get into power, and that the result would be that they would as soon as possible kick down the ladder by which they rose. He had no heart, and he believed the House had no inclination, to go into the other petty paragraphs of Her Majesty’s Speech. He believed, as had already been said, that eulogy had been exhausted on the character of the Duke of Wellington, and on that topic he would only say that his Grace was a truly illustrious Englishman—an Englishman worthy to take his place among the Pantheon of great men—by the side of Sir Robert Peel. He must, before he sat down, make an exception with reference to the paragraph relating to Ireland. There was, at any rate, no deception there. He observed that the right hon. the Chancellor of the Exchequer did not take the opportunity, even when his attention was drawn to it, of disclaiming that he did not mean to involve the whole of Ireland in the “unhappy spirit of insubordination and turbulence” which was referred to. He (Mr. B. Osborne) denied that there was any “insubordination and turbulence” on the part of the people of Ireland. There might be a certain amount of agrarian crime, and no man regretted it more than he did. But was there no crime in this country? He believed that for one crime in Ireland, there were fifty in England; and it was, to say the least of it, not becoming in a Minister of the Crown who wished to avoid an Amendment to the Address—who desired to see them all a happy, united family on that occasion—it was not becoming in him to cast a slur like this on the people of Ireland in Her Majesty’s Speech. He would not now dwell on this topic, as other opportunities would doubtless occur of discussing it; but he could not help observing that when the Government talked of adopting a “liberal and generous policy towards Ireland,” it would not have been out of place to have heard when the promised Landlord and Tenant Bill would be introduced; whether the Government intended to propose any inquiry into Maynooth; and whether they had any intention of interfering with the noblest and best institutions in Ireland? He alluded to the system of national education in Ireland. He confessed that when he saw the recent appointment to the episcopal bench in Ireland of a rev. gentleman who, whatever might be his other qualifications, had always been remarkable for his hostility to the national system of education, he (Mr. B. Osborne) could not but tremble for the result. It was true that Lord Derby had formerly instituted the system; but it was possible that some new light had beamed into his mind upon that as upon other subjects, and that he was now disposed to alter and destroy that which the House had taken such pains to promote. He hoped that before the discussion concluded, the House would be favoured with some intimation of the views of the Government upon this subject from the law officers, or some other official, connected with Ireland. Of this he was quite sure, that it was by no means “a liberal and generous policy towards Ireland” to be introducing paragraphs into Her Majesty’s Speech maligning that country; and he was sure that it would not conciliate the affections of the people of Ireland to find that the right hon. Gentleman had studiously avoided noticing the point after his attention had been specially called to it. The right hon. Gentleman, in the speech which he had delivered that evening, had, with his usual ability, raised one of those thick mists which he had found so successful with the country Gentlemen who had been returned to Parliament to promote protection. And, speaking of the country Gentlemen, he wished to ask what had become of them? Were they content to hear that there was to be no reversal of the system of free trade? He saw an hon. Gentleman opposite who he had always understood was a Protectionist to the back bone, and who told his constituents at the last election that he should be the last man who would give in his adhesion to the doctrine of free trade. What had that hon. Gentleman to say to the declarations of Government on this occasion? Surely the right hon. Member for North Lincolnshire (Mr. Christopher) would not be allowed to be only penitent. If Protection was really to be given up, let hon. Members swallow the dose and become free-traders at once—and, what was more, without looking for compensation; for they (the free-traders) were determined that there should be no compensation, believing, as they did, that no injury had been done. If they wished to remain in power, and to be infamously contented, let them do so if they could. He had done his duty in warning them of the consequences. Such was in effect the kind of speeches which had been directed by the right hon. Gentleman opposite against the late Sir Robert Peel. He (Mr. B. Osborne) had not attempted to emulate the glowing language of the right hon. Gentleman; but of this he was sure, that he had spoken with greater sincerity and with greater devotion to the cause which he professed to advocate.

MR. ADDERLEY did not rise for the purpose of throwing any light upon the intentions of Government, for he was not in their secrets, and had no more means of understanding their views than any other hon. Member; but, as an independent country gentleman, and as representing a large constituency, partly agricultural, but quite as largely manufacturing, he was anxious to state his views to the House on the points which had been raised on the present discussion; and, in the first place, he deprecated the repeated attacks which had been made on Her Majesty's Government by hon. Members opposite. Such attacks must recoil upon the heads of those who made them; and he appealed to those hon. Gentlemen whether it would not be more consistent, if not with their own character, at least with the character of the House, to wait until they had really something to attack, instead of making an onslaught which was simply based upon a spirit of malevolence. It might do very well for certain organs of public opinion, in the absence of direct information, to fabricate their facts and deal in wholesale fiction for the purpose of damaging the Ministry; but such tactics ill became that House, where there was not the same excuse for their adoption, or the same licence allowed as in the case of the press. He repeated that he had no means of arriving at an interpretation of Her Majesty's Speech beyond what any other Gentleman unconnected with the Government had; but on reading the paragraph which had been so much discussed, he had come to the conclusion, which, with all their mystification, even those Gentlemen who had attacked the Government had themselves clearly come to—namely, that Her Majesty's Government had for ever, as far as they were concerned, given up any notion of attempting to reimpose any protective duties upon corn; but that at the same time they were resolved to put it to the House whether they thought that the removal of those duties, while conferring advantages upon one class of the community, had not inflicted injury upon another class; and, if so, whether they were not prepared to adopt measures to mitigate the injury? But did this satisfy hon. Gentlemen opposite? It did not; nor would they, he believed, have been a bit more satisfied had the language of the Speech been even still more explicit, or had it even been drawn up in their own language; for, from the first moment that the Government had been placed in their present position, the same identical attacks had been directed against them de die in diem, and were now repeated usque ad nauseam, however strong the necessity for the despatch of business. What had been said by hon. Members opposite that evening? What did the hon. Member for Montrose complain of, for instance? It would be remembered that nobody rose immediately after the hon. Member for Wolverhampton; that there was a total silence for a few moments in the House; and that then up got the hon. Member for Montrose and denounced all the Members on that (the Ministerial) side of the House—and for what? Simply because they had not replied to the Motion which was to be brought forward by the hon. Member for Wolverhampton on Monday week. Really when the hon. Gentleman was in such an unreasonable mood, it would not be wisdom on the part of the Ministerial Members to attempt to allay dissatisfaction grounded on such an unfathomable feeling of hostility. Then, what did the hon. Member for Wolverhampton himself say? He complained on constitutional grounds of the paragraph in the Queen's Speech referring to free trade. He laid down the broad constitutional principle that the opinions of the Minister of the day must be in consonance with the opinions of the majority of the House—about which there could be no doubt—and that, in order that the Minister should be able to maintain a constitutional position, he must follow one of two courses—he must first ascertain whether the opinions of a majority of the House were the same as his own; and if not, he must either recant his own opinions or resign. Now, he (Mr. Adderley) would take leave to say that there was a third course that might be followed, and that was to allow any opinion which he had formerly held, but which he was now unable to carry out, simply to remain at rest. He saw no need for an absolute recantation. When Sir Robert Peel took office in 1835 it was not found necessary to ask him to make an affidavit that he would never attempt to repeal the Reform Bill of 1832; neither did the noble Lord the Member for London think it advisable to come under any pledge with reference to the celebrated “appropriation clause” when he became First Minister of the Crown. The noble Lord found it more convenient to let that subject pass away sub silentio, though he had turned out a strong Government expressly upon it. The noble Lord and his friends, therefore, were not the men to ask that an affidavit, security, or guarantee should be imposed upon the present Government—that in no circumstances whatever should they attempt to revive the question of free trade. He observed that there were three sections of the Opposition united in calling in question the paragraph of Her Majesty’s Speech on the subject of free trade. There were—first, the immediate predecessors of the present Government; second, the leaders and staff officers of the Government of Sir R. Peel, strangely hostile to the remainder of their own party now in office; and, third, the free-trade party, to whom the whole credit should be given of the free-trade measures which were now the law of the land—he meant the hon. Member for Wolverhampton and his friends, to whom alone, he repeated, belonged the full credit of being the friends of the poor on this question; and he must say that he thought it gross presumption on the part of the party which called themselves by Sir Robert Peel’s name to attempt to take to themselves the credit of a measure which they had tried so long to delay, obstruct, and keep down. He denied, however, that either of these three sections were entitled to bring the charge of inconsistency against the present Government. Was the noble Lord, the late Prime Minister, consistent on the Appropriation Clause, coming into power expressly upon it, and never alluding to the subject after gaining office by it? or on the Militia Bill of last Session? or was he consistent in telling Her Majesty that it would be a disastrous course to resort to a dissolution of Parliament, and then immediately afterwards pressing the present Government to adopt that course? or was he consistent when, opposing the Militia, he suggested supplying our home defences by troops drawn from the Colonies; a measure which, when he (Mr. Adderley) proposed it on other grounds, he denounced? And, with regard to the Colleagues of Sir Robert Peel, what sort of a recantation was it that the right hon. Baronet the Member for Carlisle (Sir James Graham) and his Colleagues wanted from the Government, after they had stated, as plainly as language could, that they had no intention of raising the question again? Was it a recantation such as Sir Robert Peel himself made in 1846, when he all at once announced his intention of introducing a measure in direct opposition to every argument he had formerly used, and reversed not only his policy, but avowedly every principle on which he had based it? Was it a recantation like that which had been made by the right hon. Baronet himself? He was sure that many hon. Members would recollect how the House was electrified by the rapidity with which the right hon. Gentleman reversed all his former arguments, and how, to use his own phrase, he swept whole volumes of Hansard away by one single word. If it was a recantation of this kind that was wanted, he could only say that it was unreasonable to ask it of them, and that it would not at all meet their views to accede to the request. Then, with regard to those whom he might call the apostles of free trade, they seemed to him like the children in the market-place—there was no pleasing them. If the Government and their friends declared themselves to be Protectionists they were not satisfied; and if they called themselves Freetraders they were equally dissatisfied. He denied that the Government had reversed any principle on the subject of protection, or that it had ever been held by them as a principle at all. It was, indeed, based upon a principle—and principles are of eternal obligation, essential and fundamental, and are never to be reversed—he meant the principle of equal justice—the principle that all classes should be taxed alike; but the system which was known as Protection was only an artificial arrangement based on that principle. He had always said that if protection meant the favouring one class at the expense of another, he would not defend it for a single moment; it was only to be justified as a balance of unequal taxation. Protection, however, having been withdrawn, the same principle called upon them to adjust the inequality which the removal of protection had produced. The party which was at present in power was the same party which was formed by Sir Robert Peel in 1841; and the cause of the indignation which had been expressed against them by their late colleagues, now in opposition, was, that they had not been able to follow their common leader equally in opposite directions. The hon. Gentleman the Member for Middlesex (Mr. Osborne) sneered at the want of independence shown by the country Gentlemen; but if following a leader one day in his advocacy of protection, and being ready the next day to share in his advocacy of free trade, was his idea of independence, he differed from it toto cœlo. He had always admitted that the conduct of Sir Robert Peel on that occasion was highly honourable to himself: the rapidity, ill-adjustment, and inconsistency of his change of policy was at least not selfish, but a great personal sacrifice; but he thought it rather hard that his party should be blamed for not following him in the last phase of his political career, simply because their minds had been too ineffaceably impressed with the arguments which he had urged upon them just before. The hon. Member concluded by protesting against the House being called upon to give the guarantee which the proposed Motion of the hon. Member for Wolverhampton implied. It appeared to him to be a dangerous precedent, and he hoped the House would not assent to it: that any measure, however inappropriate and set aside for the present, should be put under a perpetual ban of excommunication from all future discussion—a ban which, moreover, would not be binding on any single Member of the House the hour after it had passed into a resolution.

MR. COBDEN: I don't know that I should have trespassed upon the attention of the House, had I not wished to impress upon my hon. Friend the Member for Wolverhampton (Mr. Villiers), the propriety of not listening to the advice which comes from the other side, with respect to his intention of bringing forward a substantive Motion on the question of free trade. I think my hon. Friend has duly appreciated his position before the country with reference to that subject. He has long been the faithful representative of the principle of free trade in this House; and the country is deeply interested in our discussions on that subject, and they will expect that those discussions shall be brought to some definite result. Now, I ask, is it possible that the plain, honest, and simple-minded people of this country can consider that this clause in the Queen's Speech is a sufficient solution of the fourteen years' controversy which, within my knowledge and experience, have passed away upon this question? Why, if I read the passage aright, it is put into that form with an intention that it shall not mean anything. It begins with an "if." A right hon. Gentleman has said that the "if" is intended to be a peacemaker; and Shakespeare has said that "your if is a great peacemaker"—but, if this passage be hypothetical and means nothing, how can we come to any decision on the question, or how can it be said that we are satisfying the country, or convincing them that the views of the House of Commons are in harmony with those of the great majority of the people out of doors upon a question so interesting to them? I think, therefore, my hon. Friend has pledged himself most wisely before the country that within a fortnight of this time he will bring this question substantively before the House. Supposing, however, what the Chancellor of the Exchequer says be true—and I understand that a noble Earl in another place has made a statement confirmatory of his opinion—supposing it to be true that the Cabinet have resolved to adopt the principle of unrestricted competition, where can be the difficulty, or where the delay, arising out of the Motion of the hon. Member for Wolverhampton? I undertake to say that his resolution will do no more than affirm the principle of unrestricted competition with a view to carrying it out. The Chancellor of the Exchequer says that is the opinion of the Cabinet. Then the right hon. Gentleman will only have to second the Motion of the hon. Member for Wolverhampton, and in one night—nay, in one short hour—for I promise him he will not be troubled with many speeches—this question will be disposed of for ever. But it must not be mixed up with other questions, it must not be mixed up with questions of finance. I think the hon. Member for Wolverhampton has had too much experience of this House, and has seen too much of what is required for success in the advocacy of any measure, to allow one grave question to be mixed up with any others. We must have the pure and simple free-trade principle affirmed, and that is a principle not to be based upon the casual prosperity of the present day. The hon. Gentleman who spoke last is most anxious that we should allow this question only to be settled for the present. Yes, yes, there would be great convenience in that—because hon. Gentlemen might then go down to the farmers' tables a month hence, and say, "We only assent to this for the present. You have only to agitate. Get up meetings, subscribe to protection societies, and the time will come when the manufacturers, instead of being prosperous, will be suffering, and then we may reverse this principle, and adopt again the policy of protection. ["Hear!"] Ay, but we don't intend to act upon that principle at all. We say that the principle of unrestricted commerce is true, and sound, and politic, and just at all times, in all places, and under all circumstances. If it be a truth it will answer to all these conditions; and if it be not, it is not worth the fourteen years' struggle to establish it by legislation. I have no objection to see a financial scheme brought forward. I think that, apart altogether from the principle of unrestricted commerce—apart from abolishing protective duties—there is a very great field open to any ingenious Chancellor of the Exchequer in the modification of our system of taxation. That is a process which I invoke quite as much in the interest of my constituents, the woollen manufacturers of Yorkshire, as you who are opposite can do in the interest of the landed proprietors; because my constituents in West Yorkshire, the manufacturers of woollens and stuffs, are open to the unrestricted competition of the whole world, and are equally interested in the question of taxation. Therefore I cannot allow you to go into the question of taxation with the view of remedying what you call an injury done to certain interests in 1846. I know what those interests are. You mean the parties engaged in agriculture. Well, but that will open a very wide question. In the first place I deny the injury you talk of. You will have to prove your case. You have not proved it. I could mention two or three circumstances that would stand in your way at the outset. Some of the largest landowners in the kingdom have declared that their rents have not suffered in consequence of free trade. Last year we heard this stated by the Duke of Buccleuch and Sir James Graham. Farmers have not all suffered either. Those engaged in grazing, in raising wool, and in dairy farming, have all been profiting by the prosperity of trade which has arisen from the changes which have taken place. But when you talk of relieving landed property, you are going not only to relieve wheatgrowers from taxation—you contemplate not only a modification of taxation for the benefit of wheatgrowers—but you relieve railway property, house property, and, in fact, more than half the real property of the country, which does not come under the denomination of agricultural property at all. Besides, what are you going to do with the 7,000,000*l.* or 10,000,000*l.* worth of property in Ireland bought under the Incumbered Estates Act, since the free-trade measures passed? These parties have bought their land under free-trade conditions. Are you going to give compensation to them? There are many millions' worth of property sold every year. On what principle, then, are you going to make your remission of taxation? I deny the loss; but I say it would be a most clumsy thing to attempt a compensation which must cover all the owners of real property, when, avowedly, you only want to reach the growers of wheat, and the owners of two or three other descriptions of property. I deny that even your agricultural proprietors—your owners of land—can show a loss. Is the land worth less now that it was when Sir Robert Peel made the change in the law? I say, then, that you must begin by showing your case. Where is the injury—the loss? You must then show your right to compensation, because I can point you to other people who have sustained losses. You don't intend to compensate lawyers, who are now suffering great losses, because you have abolished their "John Doe and Richard Roe," and other expensive processes. No; they may emigrate to the "diggings." I lay down this rule—that when a class of the community has been benefiting under the operation of laws, such class can have no beneficial interest in those laws; and if the laws are abrogated, the class can have no right to compensation for their loss. If the corn laws entitle anybody to compensation they will hold it with bloodstained hands; for I will on a future occasion give you some recitals of what took place in 1816, in 1819, and in 1829—of riots, of murders, and of executions—and I will distinctly trace them all to the operation of your corn laws. If you had now in force the law which existed in 1815, I am convinced that in the last autumn, when the harvest threatened to be a failure, you would, instead of contentment and happiness, and a well-affected state of mind among the people, have witnessed the misery and crime which prevailed at the periods to which I have referred. I say, then, you are wrong in meddling with this question at all. Why, you surely don't expect that the country, and the majority of this House, will go into a discussion on the financial state of the country with the foregone conclusion that certain interests are entitled to compensation? That is the very thing we (the Opposition) have been fighting about, and you ask us to reopen the whole question! The first thing my hon. Friend the Member for Wolverhampton must do is to see that we are put in as good a position as before the elections; and if the Members of the House of Commons pledged to free trade do their duty, as I believe they will, we shall have free trade recognised by a vote of this House, and without its being in any way alloyed by the question of compensation. The right hon. Member for Oxford University (Mr. Gladstone), who is perhaps more difficult to follow in his speeches than any one in this House, appeared to me to fail in what I should have thought of all other points he would have been least likely to err—I mean his casuistry. He laid down the principle that we might call upon a Government for a declaration of their policy, but that we had no right to put them in the crucible, in order to extract from them a declaration of their opinions and convictions. Now, if I were engaging an agent or steward, I should like to know what his views were upon the business I wished him to perform; and, knowing his views, I should conclude that, if he were an honest man, his practice would be in accordance with those views. It is upon the same principle that I wish to know the sentiments of the Ministry; because they are the agents, or stewards of the people at large; and I believe that, whatever their convictions may be, their policy will be in accordance with them, if we give them the opportunity of carrying those convictions out. Can it be supposed that right hon. Gentlemen would take office, holding certain convictions on the greatest question of the day, and that, notwithstanding those convictions, if you will let them remain in office, they are perfectly willing to carry out the very opposite policy? That would be a very compendious mode of dealing with party politics; it would simplify proceedings very much. There would be none of those migrations from one side of the floor to the other which occasionally take place. Once "in," and whatever the demands of the country might be, the convictions of Gentlemen in office would never be any obstacle to their acceding to such demands. Now, I could more easily tolerate that doctrine, provided the Gentlemen opposite had never given their reasons for the faith that is in them. I cannot forget, however, that the Chancellor of the Exchequer told us, not in the heat of debate in 1846, but as lately as 1849, the reasons why he was in favour of protection, and why especially he was in favour of reciprocity. He has given most elaborate arguments to show that free trade, according to the "Manchester school," as he was pleased to call it—that is, free imports in opposition to hostile tariffs—are calculated to degrade the labourer, to lower the rate of wages, to diminish capital, and to increase pauperism. He has told us all that within the last three years. I am the last person to wish to go back to Hansard to quote statements which have been made in this House; but when I find the right hon. Member for Oxford University asking me to leave the Ministers in office, whatever their convictions may be, I cannot separate those arguments of right hon. Gentlemen to which I have alluded from what I believe to be their present convictions, and which, I have no doubt, they would carry out in practice if they could do so. We cannot forget the last time the Chancellor of the Exchequer alluded to this subject of free trade—last May—when he told me very indignantly, "I deny that I have come to this side of the House to betray the principles I held on the other side. On the contrary, I am here, and I say it emphatically, to carry out, if I have the power, all those principles which I have hitherto advocated." I think, then, I am justified in asking right hon. Gentlemen opposite what are their present convictions on this question? I would not subject them to the ordeal to which they subjected the late Sir Robert Peel when he changed his opinions. The hon. Gentleman who last spoke has talked about the way in which Gentlemen on this side of the House are constantly assailing those on the other side. I imagine he must have been mistaken, and have been thinking of what happened four or five years ago. The late Sir Robert Peel avowed changing his opinions, and yet he was not allowed to remain in peace with his new convictions, though he abandoned office as the price of his conversion. I don't think the Gentlemen opposite have any reason to complain of the retribution with which they have been visited. I have often felt, and I have often been on the point of saying, what I will not hesitate to say now—that the personal friends and political Colleagues of the late Sir Robert Peel have, in my opinion, shown more forbearance towards his assailants than ever I could have done with the Christian temper I aim at possessing. But if the Gentlemen opposite will come forward when my hon. Friend (Mr. Villiers) makes his Motion, and will give in their adhesion to free trade, and declare that they have changed their views upon that question, I give them my solemn pledge that from that moment they will never hear one taunt or one single reproach from me. If we have not that declaration, others may be inclined to trust Gentlemen who profess one set of opinions, and who carry out another set in practice; but I can only say for myself that, representing a constituency the largest in the Empire, and a population of a million and a half, whose opinion is unanimous, unless right hon. Gentlemen opposite do avow a change in their opinions, they shall not remain in office one day with my consent, or a day beyond the time that I can turn them out. I have only to repeat to my hon. Friend (Mr. Villiers) what I am sure he does not require to be cautioned about—namely, that he should take the earliest opportunity of bringing forward his substantive Motion. Let it cover the whole ground. Let him declare emphatically the right of the people of this country to free trade in corn; let him avow that principle as just and politic, and one that must be maintained, enlarged, and extended in every practicable way. If the Gentlemen opposite will endorse that resolution, they will have a truce for ever for me. If they resist it, I shall be their opponent as long as I remain in this House.

MR. E. BALL said, that though he stood alone in the House, he would still declare his conviction, in spite of all that had been said on both sides, that protection was the best and wisest policy for this country and for all nations to adopt. He might be ridiculed for maintaining such a doctrine; but he had some consolation in the knowledge that there was not a single nation of the earth, save Great Britain, that did not adhere to the principle he advocated. He had the satisfaction of knowing that all the greatest men of America, France, and the whole Continent, agreed with him, maintained his views, and carried out in their several countries those principles which he believed to be sound and right: and he believed that, under the guidance of a gracious Providence, this country had attained its greatness and its superiority over all other nations by the maintenance of that protective policy which many Members of that House now despised and condemned. It had been very properly remarked, that they had arrived at a period when it was necessary for all men and for all parties distinctly to avow what their opinions were. But the Home Secretary had truly said, that this was not a night to be devoted to political and party discussion, but one on which they had met unitedly to testify their honour and attachment to Her Majesty, by receiving and responding to the Royal Speech. ["Hear!"] Surely the case was not so urgent, or the matter so pressing, that it was necessary to enter upon the question of the Ministerial policy immediately; and when the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer had asked only for a delay of a few days, the denial of his request must be promoted rather by party spirit than by any desire to benefit the country by extracting now an opinion from the House. The noble Member for the City of London (Lord John Russell) had stated that there was one paragraph in the Royal Speech of which he could not approve—a paragraph so mystified and unintelligible, one part of it professing one principle, and the other part another, that he was much disposed to take the sense of the House upon it—meaning thereby the paragraph which related to the question of free trade. Now, he (Mr. Ball) could very well understand how a particular policy might be very good for one portion of the people, while it was not equally good for another. He could easily understand how free trade might have advanced some interests in the community, while it had damaged others. If they only looked back two Sessions ago, when the noble Lord (Lord John Russell) was Prime Minister, they would find that the noble Lord admitted, through the Speech from the Throne, that there was one class in this country which had not been benefited by free-trade measures—that there was a body suffering great distress; and Her Majesty suggested to the House of Commons the propriety of taking the condition of that class into consideration. That Speech, like the present Speech from the Throne, acknowledged that certain principles which had been attended with great and certain good to some parties, had been adverse and injurious to the interests of others. But, though the noble Lord at that time recognised the injuries the agricultural interest had sustained, they had not to thank him for having done anything to redress those injuries. The hon. Gentleman who had last spoken (Mr. Cobden), and who had told them that he represented a million and a half of people, among whom there was no dissension, but that all opinions were in accordance with the principle of the late measures, asked how, when no party was suffering, could any one come to that House and ask for redress? and he added that the wool producers and farmers were in a prosperous state. But the very fact that the wool farmers were now selling their sheep at a profit, was destructive of the policy of free-trade principles. Why was it that these classes were making profits? When the system of free trade was first adopted, sheep were brought into this country in such numbers that a panic was created among the sheep breeders. These foreign sheep brought the disease with them; they introduced the smallpox into this country. The consequence of importing these horrible animals in such numbers was, that the sheep breeders killed off their stock; they ceased to breed to the same extent as before; the supply had fallen off, and prices had advanced to a remunerative point. This was the reason the sheep trade was remunerative. He believed the same consequence would result with regard to other branches of trade from the adoption of free-trade principles. Everybody knew that this country now grew less wheat than was produced before free trade was established; and if the growth of wheat proved unremunerative it could not be expected that farmers would give much attention to its production. They would then have a decreased supply at home year by year; and if mildew, or blight spread over the Continent they might have cause to regret that they had abandoned those principles under which the country had attained prosperity. He did not intend, however, to go into the question on that occasion. He had risen merely to assure hon. Gentlemen opposite that he had nothing to conceal, and nothing to disavow, and that he stood in that House just as much a Protectionist as he had been on the hustings before his constituents. He had the honour to appear in that House because he had advocated the principle of protection; and the very fact of his having a seat in Parliament proved how permanently and universally that principle had taken root in that part of the country in which he resided. He would not deny that free trade stood in a different position from what it was a few years back. Things did not look so gloomy as they did a year and a half ago; but that was not owing to free trade. That was the result of free trade alone? Did free trade discover the gold of Australia? It was to the vast and unforeseen influx of gold that we owed our prosperity, in spite of free trade. It was the wealth poured into the country from the newly-discovered gold regions, which had prevented the otherwise certain mischief of free trade. It was the goodness of Providence that sent us this wealth to relieve us from our sufferings. He had seen in the Quarterly Review, three years of free trade contrasted with three years of protection. He would read them an extract from that article to show the effects of free trade. A comparison was made of the results of the four years since 1846. In 1845–6 the poor-rates for England were 13,500,000*l.*; in 1849–50 they were 15,000,000*l.* In Scotland the increase was greater. Another fact was brought forward, relative to crime. In 1845–6 the number of cases were—

For England	35,500
For Ireland	15,700

In 1849–50 the number of cases were—

For England	41,000
For Scotland	8,000
For Ireland	38,000

Here were a few of the benefits which had flowed from cheapness occasioned by free trade. A more important fact was also to be noticed—the deposits in the savings banks; in 1846 the amount was 62,000,000*l.*, but in 1849 it had declined to 55,000,000*l.* He knew but one inference that could fairly be drawn from these facts, and these facts gave him more confidence in the opinions which he held. He recollected it was a great point of the free-trade advocates that those nations from whom we took corn would become customers of our manufactured commodities under a free-trade system, and buy so much of our manufactures as would add wonderfully to the wealth of the country. He believed, without exception, that the reverse was the case. If he were correctly informed, France, Germany, and the corn-growing countries from which we took such large quantities of corn of late, took less of our manufactures now than they did before free trade. If these were facts, why should he be asked to justify the principles which he had always professed, and why should he be asked to abandon them? He could never consent to be the advocate in that House of principles which he repudiated out of the House. Nothing would be more painful and more repugnant to his feelings than to read a recantation of opinions which he had elsewhere expressed when his convictions were unchanged. He repeated, he was a Protectionist, and he would not abandon the flag so long as it floated under a commander that he could follow, or a party in whom he could confide.

SIR J. V. SHELLEY congratulated the House that they had found one man bold enough to avow the principles of protection. He trusted, that when the hon. Member for Wolverhampton brought forward his Motion, that hon. Gentleman, whatever Her Majesty's Government might do, would give them an opportunity of having a discussion, and that he would oppose that Motion. He must say he gave the hon. Member credit for the manliness with which he had stated his conscientious opinions; but the hon. Member would allow him, as an old free-trader, entirely to disagree with the reasons he had given for those opinions, and especially that the stock of sheep was rapidly diminishing. He believed the agriculturists of Cambridgeshire were unfortunate enough to have the small-pox among their sheep; but he thought the hon. Member's constituents would laugh when they heard the cause to which he attributed the increase in the price of mutton and wool. To all persons having anything to do with agriculture, it was notorious that, instead of the number of sheep bred in the country having greatly decreased, the contrary was the fact, and that the prices of both mutton and wool had advanced in consequence of a great increase in the demand; and, moreover, in consequence of the improved method of farming, the supply of lean sheep was insufficient to meet the demand. When also the hon. Gentleman took upon himself to say the quantity of corn grown was less than in the days of protection, he was equally inaccurate; and he (Sir J. V. Shelley) could take upon himself to assure him that never were such improvements being carried out in agriculture as had been carried out since the introduction of free trade. After they had been told, as they had been to-night, that never again would the Government attempt to lay protective duties upon corn, he trusted the hon. Gentleman the Member for Cambridgeshire would be prepared to give his opposition to Her Majesty's Ministers. With regard to the question to be brought before the House by the Member for Wolverhampton, he entirely agreed with those who thought the country looked to this House that the question should at once be settled either one way or the other. For himself, he was satisfied nothing had done so much injury to agriculture, had so truly been the bane of agriculture, as that protection to which the hon. Member even now adhered, and whenever that subject should be before the House, he would take an opportunity of entering more largely than at present into the arguments by which that opinion was supported.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON: Sir, I wish to make one or two observations upon the Address and the Speech prepared by Her Majesty's advisers; and I cannot refrain at the outset from joining my voice to those who have spoken already, in bearing testimony to the good taste and good feeling which have led Her Majesty's Ministers to place in a prominent part of the Speech a just tribute to the memory of that great man whom we have just lost. Of him at present I shall content myself with saying, that I believe that never was there any other man, in any country whatever whose lot it was to render such great and important services to his country, or who had the good fortune to live so long in the enjoyment of the universal and unbounded love, respect, and admiration of his countrymen. Sir, I am glad to find, talking of the principle of protection, that at least a measure for the further improvement of the County Courts.

THE QUEEN'S ANSWER TO THE ADDRESS.

The LORD HIGH STEWARD (the DUKE of MONTROSE): It is my duty to inform your Lordships that I have presented to Her Majesty the Address agreed to yesterday by your Lordships in Answer to Her Majesty's Speech from the Throne, and that I have obtained this Answer, which I am commanded to communicate to your Lordships. The noble Duke then read the Answer as follows:—

"MY LORDS,

"I THANK you for your loyal and dutiful Address.

"It will be My constant Desire to co-operate with you in Measures calculated to advance the permanent Interests and Welfare of My People."

MESSAGE FROM THE QUEEN—FUNERAL OF THE DUKE OF WELLINGTON.

The LORD HIGH STEWARD said, he had to acquaint the House, that he had a Message under Her Majesty's sign-manual, which Her Majesty had commanded him to deliver to their Lordships:—

The LORD CHANCELLOR accordingly read the Message, as follows:—

"VICTORIA R.

"Her Majesty, desirous of marking in the most solemn manner Her sense of the pre-eminent Services of the late Field Marshal the Duke of Wellington, and of affording to Her Subjects an opportunity of testifying their veneration for his memory, and their sorrow for the loss which they have sustained by his death, has directed that measures should be taken for the public interment, at the earliest possible period, of His Grace's mortal remains in the Cathedral Church of St. Paul's.

"The Queen is persuaded that, in taking this step, Her Majesty has only anticipated the general wishes of Parliament and of the Country, and that you will afford to Her Majesty your cordial aid and concurrence in giving to the mournful ceremony a degree of solemnity and importance worthy of the country and of the occasion.

"Her Majesty is confident that you will readily concur in any suitable provision which may be made by the liberality of the House of Commons for the due discharge of this debt of Public gratitude and tribute of national sorrow."

The EARL of DERBY: I beg to move that Her Majesty's most gracious Message be taken into consideration on Monday next. And at the same time I shall move your Lordships to appoint a Committee for the purpose of inquiring, considering, and reporting to your Lordships, in what manner the propositions of the Message shall be carried out, and in what manner this House shall join in the proceedings consequent thereon.

Agreed to.

THE DERBY ELECTION—MAJOR BERESFORD.

SIR ALEXANDER COCKBURN presented a petition from certain electors of Derby, all of them persons of great respectability, complaining that at the last election for that borough systematic bribery was resorted to for the purpose of procuring the election of Thomas Berry Horsfall, Esq., as a Member for that borough; and that the Right Hon. Major Beresford, a Privy Councillor, a Member of Her Majesty's Government, Secretary at War, and a Member of that House, was himself a party to such bribery, through one John Frail, who had conducted it. He (Sir A. Cockburn) also begged to give notice that, on Monday next, he should move that that petition be printed with the Votes, and that on Friday, the 19th, he should move for the appointment of a Select Committee to inquire into and report upon the allegations contained in the petition, or otherwise, as the House might think fit.

BETHLEHEM HOSPITAL.

MR. FITZROY said, he wished to put a question to the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for the Home Department in reference to the statements recently made as to the alleged ill-treatment of the patients in Bethlehem Hospital, and to the reports of the inquiry thereunto, which had appeared in a morning journal, and also to ask whether he would have any objection to lay on the table of the House a copy of the Report made by the Commissioners who conducted the inquiry in question?

MR. WALPOLE said, the Commissioners' Report was communicated to him in the summer, and in consequence of the nature of that Report he felt it his duty to send to the Governors of the Hospital to know what observations they had to make upon it. He should think it his duty to lay the Report, with their observations, on the table of the House, in order that Parliament might consider and determine the course proper to be taken. Those observations he had pressed for from time to time, and he had been informed that they would be sent. They had, however, not yet come; and without them he did not think it exactly fair towards the Governors of the Hospital to lay the Report upon the table. He thought it only right that those who were implicated by the inquiry should have an opportunity of stating their case.

MESSAGE FROM THE CROWN—FUNERAL OF THE DUKE OF WELLINGTON.

The Right Hon. Cecil Forester, Comptroller of the Household, appeared at the bar, and stated that he had a Message from Her Majesty. The right hon. Gentleman then advanced to the Chair, and delivered the message into the hands of Mr. Speaker.

MR. SPEAKER read the Message, as follows:—

“VICTORIA R.

“Her Majesty, desirous of marking in the most solemn manner Her sense of the pre-eminent Services of the late Field Marshal the Duke of Wellington, and of affording to Her subjects an opportunity of testifying their veneration for his memory and their sorrow for the loss which they have sustained by his death, has directed that measures should be taken for the public interment, at the earliest possible period, of His Grace’s mortal remains in the Cathedral Church of St. Paul’s. The Queen is persuaded that, in taking this step, Her Majesty has only anticipated the general wishes of Parliament and of the Country, and that you will afford to Her Majesty your cordial aid and concurrence in giving to the mournful ceremony a degree of solemnity and importance worthy of the Country and of the occasion.

“Her Majesty relies on the liberality of Her faithful Commons to make suitable provision for the due discharge of this debt of Public Gratitude and tribute of National sorrow.”

The CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said: I will propose for the consideration of the House an answer to Her Majesty’s most gracious Message on Monday next.

MR. HUME would beg to suggest that the right hon. Gentleman should, at the same time, lay on the table of the House an estimate of the probable expense.

The CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: I also take this opportunity of referring to a subject mentioned yesterday. It is my intention on the 26th of November to lay before the House those alterations in our system of taxation which we think the change in our commercial system renders necessary. The House will permit me to say, if any notice is brought forward the object of which is to prevent me making that statement, I reserve to myself the right to take a different course.

THE ADDRESS—REPORT.

LORD LOVAINE brought up the Report on the Address.

MR. FAGAN said, he had reason to complain of a statement put forth in the Speech last evening. Hon. Members complained yesterday of the ambiguity and deception which characterised some portions of that document; but he thought the Irish Members had more right to complain of the unnecessary and uncalled-for libel it contained on the people of Ireland. Her Majesty had been advised to state to the House that there existed in Ireland “an unhappy spirit of insubordination and turbulence.” For his part, he was not in a position to guess at what that allusion pointed. If it was to agrarian disturbances, he would join with the Government in endeavouring to repress those disturbances which were a stain on the country, and tended to prevent the amelioration of its social condition. But he did not believe that that was the intention of the allusion. Neither did he believe that the noble Lord the Member for London (Lord John Russell) was right in supposing that reference was made to the natural excitement at the last elections in Ireland. What was the cause of that excitement? He traced the cause to a proclamation of the Government which revived the forgotten penalties of the Emancipation Act, and interfered to prevent many of the religious services of the Roman Catholic population. The result of that proclamation was seen in the Stockport riots, and in the insults offered to the Roman Catholic clergy in the public streets immediately after it was issued. Speaking of the city which he represented, and which had been pointed to as one where excitement existed during the recent election, he knew that the excitement was not greater on that occasion than at any former election. He must therefore say that the expression in

Her Majesty's Speech relating to Ireland was a libel, uncalled for, and totally undeserved; and at that moment he could say with all sincerity that he did not know to what the Government alluded. With respect to the relations between landlord and tenant in Ireland, he was afraid the measures contemplated by the right hon. and learned Attorney General for Ireland would not give satisfaction. He was greatly afraid it was the right hon. and learned Gentleman's intention to leave the whole matter to the landlords in Ireland. It was no doubt the interest of the landlords of Ireland to develop the resources of the country; but he (Mr. Fagan) was afraid, judging from past experience, that they were blinded to their own interest; and he was of opinion that if the Government wished to develop the natural wealth of Ireland, they could not attain that end by leaving the matter in the hands of the landlords, and without doing at the same time justice to the tenant-farmers.

Mr. NAPIER said, if any libel had been meant upon Ireland in the passage in question, he should have been quite as ready to resent such an imputation as the hon. Gentleman the Member for Cork himself (Mr. Fagan). But, the truth was, there had been such a deliberate design on the part of some persons to misunderstand portions of Her Majesty's Speech, and such a determination that plain language and plain English should be ambiguous, that really he was not surprised that persons should again come down to the House to torture from passages in that document a meaning they were never intended to express. The passage of the Speech in which allusion was made to Ireland was as follows:—

"I trust that the general improvement, notwithstanding many obstacles, has extended to Ireland; and while I rely with confidence on your aid, should it be required, to restrain that unhappy spirit of insubordination and turbulence, which produces many and aggravates all of the evils which afflict that portion of my dominions, I recommend to you the adoption of such a liberal and generous policy towards Ireland as may encourage and assist her to rally from the depression in which she has been sunk by the sufferings of late years."

How it was possible to torture this passage into a call upon Parliament to adopt coercive measures towards Ireland, he was at a loss to conceive. The language was plain and direct, and meant that, in the event of bad men taking advantage of the spirit of insubordination, which it must be admitted had existed in Ireland, Her Majesty's Government hoped that Parliament would lend its aid to maintain the authority of the law. If the Government had meditated any present appeal to Parliament on this head, the language would have been different. For a long series of years past it had been the complaint of Irish Members that no remedial measures had been brought forward with a view to ameliorate the social condition of the people, and especially the relationship between landlord and tenant; and thence, they contended, the necessity for Coercion Bills. Now, however, Her Majesty did not say she asked for any coercive measures with regard to Ireland. So far from that, she suggested to Parliament what he (the Attorney General for Ireland) hoped Parliament would be ready to carry out, and what Ireland needed and expected, and had a right to expect—a liberal, generous, and high-minded policy, to enable it to rise from the depression in which it had lately been sunk. With respect to the Bills which he himself intended to introduce, he would ask that before any discussion took place on those Bills, they should be read and understood. He did not know whether those measures would satisfy the hon. Member for Cork; but he hoped they would satisfy all those who were sincere in desiring the welfare and prosperity of Ireland.

Mr. JOHN MACGREGOR said, he wished to notice a passage in the Speech which related to the difficulties or the misunderstandings that had taken place between this country and that of the United States of America, on the subject of the North American fisheries. That was a question of the greatest importance, inasmuch as it might have broken the peace and tranquillity existing between this country and the United States, and prevented the reception in this country of the raw material of cotton so necessary for our manufactures. His view with regard to that question corresponded with that taken by Mr. Pitt immediately after the peace of 1783, when a proposal was made during the Presidency of Washington, by Mr. Adams, for placing the commercial and maritime intercourse between England and the United States on the footing of a coasting trade. That proposal fell through in consequence of the breaking-up of the Shelburne Administration, in which Mr. Pitt was Chancellor of the Exchequer. The amazing progress of America since 1759, when we conquered Canada, rendered such a policy more than ever desirable. Ninety-three years ago, there was no British subject who possessed an acre of land north of a few small villages in Nova Scotia and Maine, nor south of a small colony in Georgia, nor east of the Alleghany Mountains. Now, all the countries from the shores of the Atlantic to the coasts of the Pacific; from Hudson's Bay to the Gulf of Mexico, were under the dominion of two great Governments, the British and the United States, the inhabitants of which speak, write, and legislate in the English language. The population during the same period had increased from less than two millions to more than thirty millions. If there was one policy more than another which the Government should pursue, it should be to maintain amicable relations between this country and the United States, by placing all the navigation of all the British dominions in North America and the United States as nearly as possible upon the footing of a coasting trade; to allow the citizens of the United States to fish without restriction in the British American Seas, on condition that the fish caught or cured, by British fishermen, should be admitted free of duty for consumption in the United States; and to admit all British colonial articles, on payment of no other duties than we should be paid on similar articles imported from the United States into the said Colonies. During the period of the late Government, when his noble Friend the Member for Tiverton (Viscount Palmerston) held the seals of the Foreign Office, and also during the term that the Earl of Aberdeen was Foreign Secretary, those amicable relations had been kept up. The Earl of Aberdeen had most wisely made those concessions to the fisheries, and maintained the harmony which it was just and proper to observe. In consequence also of the adjustment of the boundary question and the settlement of the Oregon boundary, the affairs of this country and the United States were put on such a footing as to leave no cause of disagreement between the two countries except this fishery question. Every commercial man in the country looked forward with the greatest anxiety to the satisfactory adjustment of the fishery question; and he trusted the negotiations now pending would be settled upon the principle of a free and uninterrupted course between the countries. He trusted that the citizens of the United States would have the freedom of fishing in the British North American seas, and that the British North American Colonies would have a free intercourse with the United States.

CAPTAIN WALCOTT said, he begged to trespass on the attention of the House for a few moments while he adverted to the first topic referred to in the Address. He rose for the purpose of expressing his admiration of an illustrious individual whose services were known and acknowledged throughout the world. He rejoiced that it was the intention of the country to place his remains in St. Paul's Cathedral, by the side of the heroic Nelson; and no person could ever pass that building without offering a thanksgiving to God that two such men had been given to promote the glory and welfare of the country. He was sure that through the length and breadth of the land but one opinion would prevail as to the merits of that illustrious individual, and that every mark of national gratitude would be paid to his remains.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON: Sir, I called the attention of Her Majesty's Government yesterday to that passage in Her Majesty's Speech which alludes to the co-operation of the Government of Brazil for the suppression of the slave trade, and to the significant omission of any mention in that paragraph of a similar co-operation on the part of the Spanish Government to put an end to the slave trade in Cuba. I am afraid that omission is but too significant, considering that we have seen lately in the newspapers an account of the landing of several cargoes of slaves on the coast of Cuba. It is undoubtedly without any excuse on the part of the Spanish Government that such an infraction of the treaty between Spain and this country should continue. I am afraid there are influences at Madrid, and pecuniary interests in Cuba, which tend to induce the Government of Spain to forget its treaty obligations, and to omit to perform its duty in regard to this important matter. It has exposed itself also to the imputation—whether well or ill founded it is not for me to say—that it is part of its policy, with regard to the retention of the island of Cuba, to encourage the increase of the black population, believing that in proportion as the blacks increase, the fears of the whites may increase also; and that the increase of the slave population may tend to make the white population cling more closely to the mother country for protection. I do hope that no such motive influences the Government of Spain. My object in rising is to state to Her Majesty's Government that I would wish, after this Motion is disposed of, if they see no objection, to move for a return of the number of negroes landed in Brazil and Cuba respectively, from the date in 1851 at which the last return was made up, to the latest period in 1852 to which information has been received. I am sure the Government can have no objection to grant those returns, which will show the extent to which the Spanish and Brazilian Governments have adhered to their obligations.

MR. MAGAN said, he wished to have an explanation as to what was meant in the Speech from the Throne by "the spirit of insubordination and turbulence in Ireland?" The right hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General for Ireland had explained the matter as well as he could, and he understood him to say that the phrase had reference to past insubordination and turbulence; but it was placed in the Speech in the present tense, and the Irish Members were exceedingly anxious that the noble Lord the Chief Secretary for Ireland would tell them in that plain language for which the Government were so justly celebrated, according to their own account, what meaning he attached to these words. Did it mean that the people were not ready to submit to the brutal efforts that were used in nearly every county in Ireland by the emissaries and agents of Her Majesty's Government to vote against their own consciences? That was the fact. He did not intend to enter into any lengthened discussion at present; but some other opportunity would offer on which he would call attention to the conduct of the agents of the Government in three counties with which he was connected, and particularly in the county represented by him. He hoped the noble Lord would have no objection to act as the dictionary of the Government, and tell them what was meant by those words to which he had alluded.

LORD JOHN RUSSELL: Sir, there are some important subjects referred to in Her Majesty's Speech, of which no notice has been taken—one with regard to the Burmese war, and another with regard to the continuance of the war with the Kafirs at the Cape of Good Hope. There is another subject on which I should wish to ask a question of the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary for the Colonies. Some time ago the Parliament of Canada expressed a desire that the Act with regard to the Clergy Reserves of the Imperial Parliament should be repealed, and that the Parliament of Canada should have power, with the consent of the Crown, to deal with the subject. The right hon. Gentleman stated last year very fairly that that had been the decision of one Parliament in Canada, but that a general election had taken place, that the decision of the new Assembly might be different, and that they might no longer express that wish. For my own part, if the people of Canada are contented with the arrangements made by the Imperial Parliament, it would be very desirable that they should be continued; but if, on the other hand, it was the decided wish of the people of Canada, as expressed by their Parliament and by their representatives, that a different arrangement and distribution should be made of the funds raised for the Clergy Reserves, I think, provided the interests of the present holders should be secured, and no vested interests affected, it is a subject entirely for the people of Canada. I cannot conceive that either the Crown or the people of this country have the smallest interest in wishing to prevent the settlement of that question by the representatives of such an important province as Canada, with its large population, and in the united form it now is. There was a despatch sent out on the subject that seemed to go more into the merits of the question than it was necessary to do, but on which I wish to make no remark. It appears that there has been in the new Parliament of Canada a considerable discussion on the subject, which has been transmitted to me in a newspaper, and that a resolution proposed by the Ministers, expressing a wish that an Address should be presented to the Crown, praying that they might have full power with the question, has been carried, I understand, by a majority of 54 to 22. Under these circumstances, I should think that the Government can have no difficulty in introducing a measure in a short time to enable the Parliament of Canada to deal with the subject. As no notice has been taken of it in the Speech from the Throne, I beg to ask the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary for the Colonies if the Government have come to any decision respecting it?

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON: I can assure the noble Lord and the House that I am quite sensible, and so are Her Majesty's Government, of the importance of the subject to which he has called my attention. The noble Lord has adverted with perfect accuracy to what fell from me on this subject last Session, and the despatch sent out to Canada respecting it. The noble Lord has also adverted to the proceedings that have lately taken place in the new Parliament in Canada. I believe that on the division which took place, the numbers approached very nearly to what the noble Lord has stated; but it was only one of several divisions that took place on the subject. The resolution that has been agreed to, and the proceedings of the Canadian Parliament, have been forwarded by the Governor General, have been received, and are now under the consideration of Her Majesty's Government. Therefore, I am not at present prepared to announce definitely the intentions of the Government; but when a decision is formed it will be made known. The noble Lord having adverted to another subject of great and general interest—the Kafir war—I regret it is not in my power to communicate at this moment intelligence on that subject so decided as I would wish. It is now nearly a month since any additional reports have been received; but I am happy to say that the additional reports we received by the mail in October were certainly of a more satisfactory character than any that had been received for a long period. We have had long experience of the protracted and tiresome nature of the war; but, judging from those reports, the war appeared to be gradually dying away and wearing itself out, and we may expect that the next mail may bring us some satisfactory information.

SIR DE LACY EVANS said, he thought that information should be afforded them from time to time which would enable that House to judge of the events that were taking place at the Cape, the House not being at present clearly informed as to what objects are contemplated in carrying on the war. One event had occurred on which he begged to congratulate the Government—he meant the arrangement with Mr. Prætorius and the boers who acted in conjunction with him. It was very much to be lamented that that course had not been adopted some years ago, and he should like to know if they might anticipate some amicable arrangement with the other inhabitants of those territories, founded upon similar principles. He hoped the right hon. Gentleman would soon be able to lay despatches on the table showing the objects of the war, and the prospects of a final termination of it.

MR. HUME said, he wished to refer for a moment to what had fallen from the noble Lord the Member for Tiverton (Viscount Palmerston) on the subject of the slave trade. The noble Lord had taken a warmer interest in this subject, and had been longer engaged in endeavouring to prevent that traffic, than any other man. He gave him credit for the object he had in view, and he asked the noble Lord whether the time had not come when he might, with advantage, bring the whole question before the House? We had paid some 900,000*l.* to Spain, and some 400,000*l.* or 500,000*l.* to Portugal, on the express condition of their suppressing the slave trade; and he thought the noble Lord might, with great propriety, take an early opportunity of stating to the House what our engagements were with those countries; what we had paid them; whether any return had been made for those payments; and what steps ought now to be taken. He wished also, before sitting down, to call the attention of the Government to a request made by an hon. Member from Ireland (Mr. Magan). The hon. Gentleman asked a simple question, and courtesy required that it should be answered. There was a doubt as to the precise meaning of certain words in the Royal Speech, used with reference to Ireland, and he thought an answer to the question should be given.

LORD NAAS said, the question put to him by the hon. Member for Westmeath was simply whether he would give an interpretation of a paragraph of Her Majesty's Speech which referred to Ireland. Holding the opinion he did, that that paragraph was perfectly intelligible and clear, he could not add, by any explanation he could give, anything to the clearness of the passage, or to the explanations that had been already given by his right hon. and learned Friend the Attorney General for Ireland. If an assurance on the part of Her Majesty that the Government was prepared to deal in a liberal and generous manner with Irish affairs and interests, did not please or suit hon. Gentlemen opposite, it was not the fault of the Government.

MR. HADFIELD begged to call the attention of the House to the paragraph in the Speech which referred to legal reform, and said he must complain of the expense and inconvenience of refusing probates in different parts of the country where property was transferred. He wished to know whether by the recent arrangements one probate would serve for the property of testators in all parts of the country?

MR. SIDNEY HERBERT: Sir, I wish to ask a question with reference to part of the Speech on which no information has yet been given. The paragraph in the Speech referring to the difficulties that arose during the last summer with respect to our Colonial fisheries conveys an impression as to the origin of those difficulties, and as to the course taken with regard to them, and likewise as to the result likely to ensue from the negotiations, at variance, I think, with the public impressions on the subject. Of course, the information in the hands of the Government, on the subject to which this paragraph alludes, would, if produced at once, set at rest any doubts that exist on that point. I gather from the conclusion of the second paragraph that those negotiations are not yet terminated, and in that case, of course, it would not be proper to press the Government to give any information or lay any papers on the table of the House respecting them; but it is important we should know if there be a prospect of an early settlement of the question, and at what period the Government would be enabled to lay on the table of the House the papers and correspondence respecting these negotiations.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: Sir, it will be quite impossible for Her Majesty's Government, in the present state of the question, to lay any papers on the table of the House. I can only repeat what I believe is mentioned in the Speech, that the Government of the United States has agreed to enter into negotiations with us in the most friendly spirit, and in such a way as to lead to increased commercial relations between the two countries. The spirit in which the negotiations between the two Governments have taken place, has been of the most friendly character, and I think the result will prove very satisfactory; but, of course, under these circumstances the House cannot expect that the Government will lay any papers on the table on this subject.

MR. SHEE said, he was unacquainted with the course which was generally adopted by Government in answering questions put to them by independent Members of the House; but when questions were put in terms of courtesy to Her Majesty's Ministers, he did not think they should give such off-hand answers as had been given that evening. First, they refused to answer the question of an hon. Member for an Irish county, and then an answer was reluctantly given to the remark of the hon. Member for Montrose (Mr. Hume), by the noble Lord the Chief Secretary for Ireland. Being a very plain man himself, he understood plain English according to its ordinary sense and meaning, and when Her Majesty was advised by Her Ministers to speak of "an unhappy spirit of insubordination and turbulence which produces many and aggravates all of the evils which afflict that portion of Her Majesty's dominions," he understood the Queen to mean, and he understood Her Majesty's Ministers to mean, if they meant anything, that there is now existing "an unhappy spirit of insubordination and turbulence in that part of her dominions," which seriously increases and aggravates the evils by which they are afflicted. Now, they had no explanation of that language. Were the Members sent from Ireland to that House to understand that it was not the intention of Ministers to propose any measure for the repression of an existing "unhappy spirit of insubordination and turbulence?" He rather guessed it from what had been said by the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General for Ireland; but the right hon. and learned Gentleman did not say it very distinctly, nor, indeed, had anything been said very distinctly by any hon. Gentleman who had spoken on the other side of the House. The only Member who spoke out on that side, was an hon. and learned Friend of his, the hon. and learned Gentleman who seconded the Address, and he did come out boldly and frankly with the declaration that he was for free trade. The hon. Gentlemen who came after him did not seem inclined to follow the lead, and they hemmed and hawed, and spoke in such a way that a new Member of the House could not, at all events, understand what they meant. After the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General for Ireland had spoken, the noble Lord the Chief Secretary for Ireland stood up and expected them to believe that those words, "insubordination and turbulence," were only inserted in the Speech to make a rounded period; and that the real purport of the sentence was to inform the House that that which was not to be expected from the hon. Gentlemen opposite—namely, a course of generous and liberal measures for Ireland—was all that was intended by this sentence in Her Majesty's Speech. The right hon. and learned Attorney General for Ireland and the noble Lord the Secretary for Ireland had both spoken; and he (Mr. Shee) now appealed to the candour of his right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Home Department, who was specially charged, as a Member of Her Majesty's Government, with the administration of the affairs of Ireland, and he asked him first, would he get up in that House and say that the words in Her Majesty's Speech to which attention had been called did not mean, yesterday, whatever they meant that day, "an existing spirit of insubordination and turbulence in Ireland," which it was the intention of Her Majesty's Ministers to repress? If they did not mean that yesterday, what did they mean? Did hon. Gentlemen opposite intend to tell that House that the Government had advised Her Majesty to insert words of mere insult in the Speech with reference to Her Majesty's subjects in Ireland? Her Majesty had visited that part of Her dominions but a short time ago, and was received in a manner in which She had never been received in this country, notwithstanding the attachment of the people of this country to Her person and family, and the loyalty they had always evinced. He asked his right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Home Department if yesterday (whatever they meant that day) those words did not mean that there was an existing spirit of insubordination and turbulence in Ireland, which it was the intention of Her Majesty's Government to repress? He wished, secondly, to ask him to state distinctly—that they might know the intentions of Government before the Motion of the hon. Member for Wolverhampton (Mr. C. Villiers) was submitted to the House—whether Her Majesty's Government intend to propose any coercive measures of any kind, or any measures restrictive of the civil and religious liberties of Her Majesty's Roman Catholic subjects in Ireland?

MR. WALPOLE said, that his hon. and learned Friend having pointedly referred to him, he rose to answer the question. He understood his hon. and learned Friend to ask whether by the latter words of the Address the Government meant to say that they intended to bring in any measure to repress the turbulence and insubordination there alluded to. His answer was, that the Government did not, and he hoped that answer was distinct and clear. Still, however, he must say, that turbulence and insubordination to a certain extent did unquestionably exist in Ireland. He did not wish to provoke discussion, yet everybody must be aware that one of the last things which it was necessary for the Government to do before the dissolution of the late Parliament was to renew a Bill for one year for proclaiming certain districts in Ireland, in consequence of there then being counties in Ireland exposed to what might be called turbulence and insubordination, which rendered that Act necessary. In some counties it was still necessary to continue the operation of that Act. But he, for one, should be glad to find that the generous and liberal policy alluded to in the same paragraph of the Queen's Speech, and more pointedly alluded to than the turbulence and insubordination, might have the effect of removing all necessity at no distant period for any of those measures which had peculiarly affected Ireland in consequence of the turbulence and insubordination which had prevailed there. The meaning of the paragraph in the Queen's Speech was both general and particular: general, inasmuch as the Government did not intend to do anything in respect to Ireland of any sort or kind which could be construed as contrary to a generous and liberal policy, taken in the largest sense of the word; and particular, inasmuch as it was intended in the course of the Session to bring in certain measures of a liberal and generous policy towards Ireland, and, among them, a settlement of the whole relations between landlord and tenant, including in that settlement the much-vexed question which was now anxiously discussed in Ireland—namely, compensation for unexhausted improvements. This was the policy which they intended to pursue, and he trusted that it would be responded to by the people of Ireland in the spirit in which it was offered.

Report agreed to.

BILLS OF EXCHANGE AND NOTES (METROPOLIS) BILL.

MR. WALPOLE said, he begged to give notice of his intention to bring in a Bill, which would require the suspension of all the Standing Orders, in order that it might pass through the House on Monday next. The object of the Bill would be to declare that the day appointed for the funeral of the Duke of Wellington should, as regards the payment of bills of exchange and promissory notes, be treated as the "Lord's-day," commonly called Sunday. From all he could hear, he believed that if some such provision were not made, great inconvenience would be experienced by the commercial and banking classes.

The House adjourned at Six o'clock.

MINUTES.] Took the Oaths.—Several Lords.
Sat First in Parliament.—The Lord Panmure, after the Death of his Father.

THE DUKE OF WELLINGTON'S FUNERAL (BILLS OF EXCHANGE AND NOTES) BILL.

The EARL of DERBY: My Lords, I have to move the First Reading of a Bill which has been passed by the other House of Parliament under rather peculiar circumstances, which make it necessary that I should ask your Lordships to dispense with your Standing Orders in order that it might be passed as speedily as possible. The Government has received representations on the part of a great number of merchants and commercial men of the city of London, with respect to the great inconvenience that will arise in connexion with the presentation and payment of bills falling due on Thursday next, the day of the Duke of Wellington's funeral, unless some arrangements be made by Parliament. It is proposed, therefore, to enact that Thursday next shall be considered a dies non; and that all bills falling due on that day shall be presented and be payable on Wednesday; but that if these bills are paid before two o'clock on Friday, the parties shall be subjected to no notarial charges arising from the delay.

Bill read 1^a; to be printed; and to be read 2^a To-morrow. And Standing Orders Nos. 37 and 38, to be considered, in order to their being dispensed with.

MESSAGE FROM THE QUEEN—FUNERAL OF THE DUKE OF WELLINGTON.

The Queen's Message considered.

The EARL of DERBY again rose and said: I have now to ask your Lordships to agree to an Address to Her Majesty in answer to Her Majesty's gracious Message of Friday last, in reference to which I am sure that it is quite unnecessary for me to say a single word, because I am convinced that it will meet with the universal concurrence of your Lordships. And if I had not been convinced of this before, the language of general eulogy which I heard in this House a few days ago would have relieved me from the necessity of addressing your Lordships at any length, and would have made me perfectly certain that you would have but one feeling as to the propriety of doing all that you at present can to honour the memory of the late Duke of Wellington in that public funeral which Her Majesty, in anticipation of the wishes of Parliament and the country, has already directed. I beg therefore to move—

"That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, to express to Her Majesty the Thanks of this House for Her Majesty's most Gracious Message of Friday last, humbly to thank Her Majesty for having given Directions for the Public Interment of the mortal Remains of His Grace The Duke of Wellington in the Cathedral Church of Saint Paul, and to assure Her Majesty of the cordial Aid and Concurrence of this House in giving to the Ceremony a fitting Degree of Solemnity and Importance."

On Question, agreed to, Nemine Dissentiente.

The EARL of DERBY then said: I have now to move the following Resolution:—

"That this House will attend at the Solemnity of the Funeral of Arthur Duke of Wellington in the Cathedral Church of St. Paul on Thursday next."

On Question, agreed to, Nemine Dissentiente.

It was also moved—

"That a Select Committee be appointed to consider the Circumstances relating to the Attendance of this House and their Place at the Solemnity of the Funeral of Field Marshal the late Duke of Wellington."

The DUKE of CLEVELAND said, that he wished to suggest to the First Lord of the Treasury the propriety of giving facilities for the departure and return from the cathedral of St. Paul of those persons who had been officially engaged in the procession and solemnity. He thought it was but reasonable that if those persons were not to return in procession, they should have some priority of departure over those who were present merely as spectators.

The EARL of DERBY said, he need hardly assure the noble Duke that the question of the whole of the arrangements connected with the funeral had been a matter of very anxious consideration on the part of the Government, and of those connected with the responsibility (for such it was) of conducting a ceremony of such magnitude; and he had no doubt that provision had been made for the fitting accommodation of those persons who had to join officially in the procession, and for facilitating as far as possible their return after the ceremony had been performed; but he thought it would be convenient, if their Lordships agreed to the appointment of a Committee, that that Committee should have in attendance before them on the following day Garter King-at-Arms, from whom they might ascertain what were the precise arrangements made, and then the Committee or any noble Lord would have an opportunity of suggesting any alterations which they thought desirable; and if it was possible to make them within the limited time which remained, he was sure that every person engaged would be ready to pay the utmost deference to the wishes of the House, and would have every disposition to meet them.

House adjourned till To-morrow.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

MINUTES.] PUBLIC BILLS.—1^o Bills of Exchange and Notes (Metropolis).

Reported.—Bills of Exchange and Notes (Metropolis).

THE DUKE OF WELLINGTON'S FUNERAL —THE DEAN AND CHAPTER OF ST. PAUL'S.

SIR DE LACY EVANS said, he wished, in consideration of the public anxiety to participate in the coming solemnity at St. Paul's, to ask what number of places had been allotted in the cathedral to the Dean and Chapter during the approaching solemnity?

MR. WALPOLE said, he believed that the mode in which the tickets for St. Paul's had been allotted was this:—that all those who attended the funeral, whether as deputations or otherwise, would have places allotted for them, as, for instance, the Members of the House of Lords and of the House of Commons, Privy Councillors, Knights of the Bath, the Trinity House, and so on. Then there would be accommodation for peeresses, foreigners of distinction, ambassadors, and persons of that class. A certain number of tickets would be allocated to the Horse Guards, for officers who had served under the Duke of Wellington; the same provision had been made for the Ordnance, the Artillery and Engineers, and for the Admiralty and naval officers. The total number of tickets for the different public offices, including a certain number allotted to the Lord Chamberlain, would be upwards of 7,000. Then the Dean and Chapter would have the remainder of the tickets, out of which provision was to be made for the city. Perhaps the hon. and gallant Gentleman was not aware that at the time of Nelson's funeral the whole distribution of tickets was under the care of the Dean and Chapter. It was very different, however, on the present occasion.

SIR JOHN SHELLEY said, he was of opinion that the right hon. Gentleman had not completely answered the question put to him: he would therefore beg to ask whether it was true that a large number of seats—something like 3,000—had been reserved for the Dean and Chapter of St. Paul's?

LORD JOHN MANNERS said, it was not true that 3,000 seats were reserved for the Dean and Chapter, but 3,000 seats had been reserved for them and the city of London. He might take this opportunity of stating that it was altogether untrue that the Dean and Chapter of St. Paul's had made any application for 3,000 or 5,000 tickets—or, indeed, for any number whatever. Looking to what had been done on past occasions, the Government had thought it right to offer the Dean and Chapter a certain number of seats. The Dean and Chapter had offered every possible facility; and he took this public opportunity of saying that their conduct on this important and solemn occasion had been marked by the strongest desire to consult the public convenience and public feeling.

THE CONVOCATION.

MR. J. A. SMITH begged to ask the right hon. Secretary of the Home Department whether any communication had been made by the Archbishop of Canterbury to the Government with reference to the present sitting of Convocation, and whether it was intended that it should continue to sit or be prorogued as usual?

MR. WALPOLE said, that as far as he was aware, no communication such as the hon. Member referred to had been made to any Member of the Government; certainly none such had been made to him. In answer to the other branch of the question—namely, whether the Convocation was to be allowed to continue sitting, or to be prorogued as usual, he begged to state that the usual course would be observed, and this was intended from the beginning.

THE COAL TRADE.

MR. LIDDELL said, he wished to ask the noble Under Secretary for Foreign Affairs whether any communication had taken place between our Government and the Government of France relative to the equalisation of the duties levied on British coal when imported into the latter country?

LORD STANLEY said, that the subject to which the hon. Member's question referred was one on which the attention of the Government had for some time past been fixed. The Government was fully aware of the great benefit which would accrue to British interests, and he believed to French interests also, by the establishment of lower rates of duty on British coal imported into France, than those at present enforced; but, under all the circumstances of the case, and considering the nature of our commercial relations with France, it had been thought better not to enter into any negotiations on this subject separately. Communications relative to it had passed between the two Governments, and from those communications it appeared that the Government of France was favourably disposed—as was also the Government of this country—to making considerable modifications in the present international commercial system.

THE QUEEN'S ANSWER TO THE ADDRESS.

MR. FORESTER appeared at the bar, and stated that, having presented to Her Majesty the Address of the House in answer to the Speech from the Throne, the Queen had been pleased to make the following gracious reply:—

"I have received with satisfaction your loyal and dutiful Address.

"I rely, with confidence, on your co-operation with Me in My endeavour to promote the welfare of all classes of My subjects."

BILLS OF EXCHANGE AND NOTES (METROPOLIS) BILL.

MR. WALPOLE rose, pursuant to notice, to move for leave to bring in a Bill to make provision concerning bills of exchange and promissory notes payable in the metropolis on the day appointed for the funeral of the Duke of Wellington. This course was taken in consequence of the representations made to him by bankers and members of the commercial interest as to the great inconvenience that would arise from having bills of exchange payable on a day when the streets would be filled with the dense crowds that might be expected to assemble on that occasion, and which would render it impossible for persons engaged in business to pass from place to place. The Bill would provide that bills of exchange and notes falling due on the day of the funeral should be payable on the day before. It was evident that this arrangement could not be injurious to the holders of bills, while the only inconvenience which could result to payers would be, that in the event of their not being prepared to take up their acceptances on the day before their funeral, they would incur certain notarial charges on account of the noting of bills. To obviate this inconvenience, he proposed that the payers of bills of exchange should not be liable to notarial charges, provided their bills should be paid by two o'clock on Friday, the day following the funeral.

Bill brought in (the Standing Orders being suspended), was read a first and second time, and committed, without observation.

On the Question, that it be read a Third Time,

MR. MANGLES said, he wished to know whether there was any objection to extending the provisions of the Bill to the whole country? He had reason to know that a wish prevailed generally to have the day of the funeral observed with solemnity throughout the Kingdom.

MR. GLYN begged to express the thanks of the commercial public of London to the right hon. Gentleman for having introduced this Bill, and to the House for the disposition which it showed to pass it. The measure was rendered necessary, not so much from a desire to make a holiday of the day appointed for the funeral, as on account of the absolute impossibility of transacting business on that occasion. Whether or not the rest of the country should be placed on the same footing as London on any future similar occasion, was a question which could not now be properly considered; but he hoped that the right hon. Gentleman would turn his attention to it.

MR. J. L. RICARDO said, it would be desirable to fix the payment of bills peremptorily for Wednesday; otherwise persons in the country—Manchester, for instance—who had payments to make on Friday dependent on the honouring of bills of exchange in London on Thursday, might be subjected to great inconvenience.

MR. WALPOLE said, in reference to what had fallen from the hon. Member for Guildford (Mr. Mangles), as to the propriety of extending the operation of the Bill beyond London; that he had considered that point a great deal, and it seemed to him that as the inconvenience to be provided against—namely, the obstruction to business likely to be caused from a dense mass of people, would not extend beyond the metropolis, it was useless to make the measure applicable to the whole country. As to the general question mooted by the hon. Member for Kendal (Mr. Glyn), it was well worthy of consideration whether it would not be expedient to introduce a general Bill repealing former Acts, and giving the Crown power, by proclamation, to place days devoted to any peculiar solemnity on the same footing—as regarded bills of exchange—as Sundays, Fast days, and Thanksgiving days.

MR. J. L. RICARDO said, that as the Bill provided that a bill of exchange paid before two o'clock on Friday should be subject to no notarial charges, it might be assumed that it would be duly honoured if paid under those circumstances.

MR. WALPOLE said, that the Bill would make bills of exchange due on the 18th presentable and payable on the day before, in the same way as if the 18th were a Sunday; but, inasmuch as the presenting of bills on the 17th might subject payers to certain notarial charges, it was provided that in the event of their meeting their liabilities by two o'clock on the following Friday those notarial charges should not be enforced.

AN HON. MEMBER asked whether it would not be better to make all bills due on the 18th payable on the day after the funeral?

MR. WALPOLE, in reply, said, that the point had been fully considered. All the commercial authorities whom he had consulted strongly recommended that there should be no departure from commercial usages.

Bill read 3^d, and passed.

FUNERAL OF THE DUKE OF WELLINGTON—THE QUEEN'S MESSAGE.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER rose and said: Mr. Speaker, Sir,

The House of Commons is called upon to-night to perform a sorrowful but a noble duty. It has to recognise, in the face of the country and of the civilised world, the loss of the most distinguished of our citizens; and it has to offer to the ashes of the great departed the solemn anguish of a bereaved nation.

Sir, the princely personage who has left us was born in an age more fruitful of great events than any other period of recorded time. Of its vast incidents, the most conspicuous were his own deeds—deeds achieved with the smallest means and against the greatest obstacles. He was, therefore, not only a great man, but the greatest man of a great age. Amid the chaos and conflagration which attended the close of the last century there arose one of those beings who seem to be born to master mankind. It is not too much to say that Napoleon combined the imperial ardour of Alexander with the strategy of Hannibal. The kings of the earth fell before his fiery and subtle genius, and at the head of all the Powers of Europe, he denounced destruction against the only land that dared to disobey him and be free. The Providential superintendence of the world seems scarcely ever more manifest than when we recollect the dispensations of our day—that the same year which gave to France the Emperor Napoleon, produced also for us the Duke of Wellington; that in the same year they should have embraced the same profession; and that, natives of distant islands, they should both have repaired for their military education to that illustrious land which each in his turn was destined to subjugate. During that long struggle for our freedom, our glory—I might say for our existence—Wellesley fought and won fifteen pitched battles—all of them of the highest class—concluding with one of those crowning victories that give a colour and a form to history. During that period that can be said of him which can be said of no other captain—that he captured three thousand cannon from the enemy, and never lost a single gun.

But the greatness of his exploits was, perhaps, even surpassed by the difficulties which he had to encounter. For he had to encounter a feeble Government, a factious Opposition, a distrustful people, scandalous allies, and the most powerful enemy in the world. He won victories with starving troops, and he carried on sieges without munitions. And as if to complete the fatalities which attended him throughout life in this respect, when he had at last succeeded in creating an army worthy of the Roman legions and worthy of himself, this invincible host was broken up on the eve of the greatest conjuncture of his life, and he had to enter the field of Waterloo with raw levies and discomfited allies. But the star of Wellington never paled. He has been called fortunate, but fortune is a divinity which has ever favoured those who are at the same time sagacious and intrepid, inventive and patient. It was his own character that created his career—alike achieved his exploits, and guarded him from every vicissitude; for it was his sublime self-control alone that regulated his lofty fate.

Sir, it has been of late years somewhat the fashion to disparage the military character. Forty years of peace have, perhaps, made us somewhat less aware how considerable and how complex are the qualities which go to the formation of a great general. It is not enough that he must be an engineer, a geographer, learned in human nature, and adroit in managing men—he must also be able to fulfil the highest duty of a Minister of State, and then to descend to the humblest office of a commissary and clerk; and he has to display all this knowledge, and to exercise all these duties, at the same time, and under extraordinary circumstances. At every moment he has to think of the eve and of the morrow—of his flank and of his rear. He has to carry with him ammunition, provisions, and hospitals. He has to calculate at the same time the state of the weather and the moral qualities of man; and all these elements that are perpetually changing he has to combine, sometimes under overwhelming heat, and sometimes under overpowering cold—sometimes even amid famine, and often amid the roar of artillery. Behind all these circumstances, too, there is ever present the image of his country, and the dreadful alternative whether that country is to welcome him with laurel or with cypress. Yet this image he must dismiss from his mind; for the general must think—and not only think—he must think with the rapidity of lightning, for on a moment more or less depends the fate of a most beautiful combination, and on a moment more or less depends the question of glory or of shame. Unquestionably, Sir, all this might be done in an ordinary manner, and by an ordinary man, as every day of our lives we see ordinary men who may be successful Ministers of State, successful authors, successful speakers—But to do all this with genius is sublime. Doubtless, to be able to think with vigour, with clearness, and with depth in the recess of the cabinet, is a fine intellectual demonstration; but to think with equal vigour, clearness, and depth amidst bullets, appears the loftiest exercise and the most complete triumph of the human faculties.

Sir, when we take into consideration the prolonged and illustrious life of the Duke of Wellington, we are surprised how small a section of that life is occupied by that military career which fills so large a space in history. Only eight years elapsed from Vimiera to Waterloo; and from the date of his first commission to the last cannon-shot which he heard on the field of battle, scarce twenty years can be counted. After all his triumphs he was destined for another career; and the greatest and most successful of warriors—if not in the prime, at least in the perfection of manhood—commenced a civil career scarcely less successful, scarcely less splendid, than that military one which will live for ever in the memory of men. He was thrice the Ambassador of his Sovereign at those great historic Congresses that settled the affairs of Europe; twice was he Secretary of State; twice he was Commander-in-Chief of the Forces; once he was Prime Minister of England; and to the last hour of his life he may be said to have laboured for his country. It was only a few months before we lost him that he favoured with his counsel and assistance the present advisers of the Crown respecting that war in the East of which no one could be so competent to judge, and he drew up his views on that subject in a state paper characterised by all his sagacity and experience; and, indeed, when he died he died still the active chieftain of that famous Army to which he has left the tradition of his glory.

Sir, there is one passage in the life of the Duke of Wellington which in this place, and on this occasion, I ought not to let pass unnoticed. It is our pride that he was one of ourselves—it is our glory that Sir Arthur Wellesley once sat on these benches. If we view his career in the House of Commons by the tests of success which are applied to common men, his career, although brief, was still distinguished. He entered the Royal Councils and filled high offices of State. But the success of Sir Arthur Wellesley in the House of Commons must not be tested by the fact that he was a Privy Councillor or a Secretary of a Lord Lieutenant. He achieved here a success which the greatest Ministers and the most brilliant orators may never hope to accomplish. That was a great Parliamentary triumph when he rose in his place to receive the thanks of Mr. Speaker for a brilliant victory; and, later still, when at that bar to receive, Sir, from one of your predecessors in memorable words the thanks of a grateful Senate for accumulated triumphs.

Sir, there is one source of consolation which I think the people of England possess at this moment under the severe bereavement over which they mourn—It is their intimate acquaintance with the character, and even the person of this great man. There never was a man of such mark who lived so long and so much in the public eye. I will be bound there is not a Gentleman in this House who has not seen him; many there are who have conversed with him; some there are who have touched his hand. His image, his countenance, his manner, his voice are impressed on every memory and sound almost in every ear. In the golden saloon and in the busy market place to the last he might be found. The rising generation among whom he lived will often recall his words of kindness; and the people followed him in the street with that lingering gaze of reverent admiration which seemed never to tire. Who, indeed, can ever forget that venerable and classic head, ripe with time and radiant as it were with glory?

To complete all, that we might have a perfect idea of his inward and spiritual nature—that we might understand how this sovereign master of duty fulfilled the manifold offices of his life with unrivalled activity, he himself gave us a collection of military and administrative literature which no age and no country can rival. And, fortunate in all things, Wellington found in his lifetime an historian whose immortal page now ranks with the classics of that land which Wellesley saved.

Sir, the Duke of Wellington has left to his country a great legacy—greater even than his fame; he has left to them the contemplation of his character. I will not say of England that he has revived here the sense of duty—that, I trust, was never lost. But that he has inspired public life with a purer and more masculine tone, I cannot doubt; that he has rebuked by his career restless vanity, and regulated the morbid susceptibility of irregular egotism, is, I think, no exaggerated praise. I do not believe that among all orders of Englishmen, from the highest to the lowest, from those who are called on to incur the most serious responsibilities of office, to those who exercise the humblest duties of our society—I do not believe there is one among us who may not experience moments of doubt and depression, when the image of Wellington will occur to his memory, and he finds in his example support and solace.

Although the Duke of Wellington lived so much in the minds and hearts of the people of England—although at the end of his long career he occupied such a prominent position, and filled such august offices, no one seemed to be conscious of what a space he occupied in the thoughts and feelings of his countrymen until he died. The influence of true greatness was never, perhaps, more completely asserted than in his decease. In an age in which the belief in intellectual equality flatters so much our self-complacency, every one suddenly acknowledges that the world has lost its foremost man. In an age of utility, the most busy and the most common-sense people in the world find no vent for their woe, and no representative for their sorrow, but the solemnity of a pageant; and we—who are assembled here for purposes so different—to investigate the sources of the wealth of nations, to busy ourselves in statistical research, to encounter each other in fiscal controversy—we offer to the world the most sublime and touching spectacle that human circumstances can well produce—the spectacle of a Senate mourning a Hero.

Sir, I beg leave to move a Resolution—

"That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, humbly to thank Her Majesty for having given directions for a public interment of the mortal remains of his Grace the Duke of Wellington, in the cathedral church of St. Paul, and to assure Her Majesty of our cordial aid and concurrence in giving to the ceremony a fitting degree of solemnity and importance."

LORD JOHN RUSSELL: I ask the permission of you, Sir, and the House, to second the Motion of the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer. I do not wish to add a single word to those

said, that Members need not stay in the House after midnight, unless they pleased; but some Members wished to discharge their duty conscientiously, and therefore remained so long as the House was sitting. He was convinced that by the adoption of the Resolution, the business of the House would be facilitated; that it would be more favourable to the health of Members, and be more satisfactory to the country.

MR. EWART, in seconding the Motion, said, he wished that the proposition was one which would have the effect of assimilating more their business to the course they adopted on Wednesdays. It was stated, by a high authority, that more real practical business was done by that House on the Wednesdays than on any of the other days of the week. He (Mr. Ewart) considered that after twelve o'clock at night, those Members who were really anxious to do their duty might with great reason and propriety protest against proceeding any further with the business of the Legislature. The practice of sitting beyond twelve o'clock was most injurious to the health of the Members generally, especially to that of the Ministers, who had so many other duties to attend to. He had seen Ministers at such a time, while endeavouring to push forward business, actually sinking under the weight of their labour. He believed that the voice of the country was with his hon. Friend in taking this step. The voice of common sense was, at all events, in his favour.

“That in the present Session of Parliament no Business shall be proceeded with in this House after midnight; and that, at Twelve o'clock at night precisely, notwithstanding there may be Business under discussion, Mr. Speaker do adjourn the House without putting any Question.”

MR. W. WILLIAMS said, he thought the practice of sitting so late at night was most discreditable to that House. Bills of the utmost importance were passed over night without the slightest consideration. Oftentimes were they called upon after midnight to dispose of thirty or forty Orders of the Day, and the consequence was, that measures were hurried through in an imperfect manner, and had to be amended in subsequent Sessions. It might be said that the mass of public business could not be otherwise got through; but every one acquainted with the mode of business in that House was acquainted with the fact that the early part of the Session was consumed in discussion upon Bills that in many cases were never intended to be passed, and in others were withdrawn at the close of the Session. Never had the business been so well conducted as at the close of last Session, when the House sat early. He hoped the Government would give at least a trial to this Motion.

SIR WILLIAM CLAY said, the object of his hon. Friend in this Motion was really within his own power, by moving an adjournment after midnight. He thought there were many occasions on which the House would feel the enormous importance of forwarding certain Bills a stage, although it might be after midnight; and he therefore urged his hon. Friend not to press his Motion, but to leave it to the good sense and good taste of hon. Members.

The CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, the business of the House had very much increased of late years, and the gist of this Motion was to reduce the time they could dedicate to the transaction of it. The proposition of the hon. Gentleman (Mr. Brotherton) was really to establish a restriction on debate; it was an extraordinary proposition in a free-trade age and a free-trade House of Commons. The hon. Baronet who had last addressed them, had reminded the hon. Gentleman of his frequent exercise of the salutary privilege of moving the adjournment of the House after midnight, and no doubt on many occasions it had contributed very much to public convenience; but there had been occasions when hon. Gentlemen had made Motions that the debate should terminate, on which an irresistible feeling had been shown on both sides of the House that the termination of the debate under such circumstances would be extremely inexpedient to the public welfare and public business. An iron inflexible rule on the question would be highly inconvenient. The subject had been very much considered in the Committee on Public Business. This restriction in debate was very much like the plan for limiting the duration of a speech, upon which point the Members of the Committee, formed from all parties of the House, came to an almost unanimous opinion, that if such a resolution were adopted, many hon. Gentlemen whom the House did not wish to hear would certainly speak for the hour, while the Gentlemen whom the House wished to speak more than an hour, would be prevented from doing so. As to the sanitary part of the question alluded to, and the reference made to the mode in which the business of the House was carried on during the latter part of the Session, he could only say that if a sanitary consideration was alone to influence the hon. Gentlemen who supported the proposition, he did not think that they would persevere in it. It would be totally impossible that the system of meeting at an early hour of the day could be generally acted upon. They were obliged to meet very early every day during the last month of the previous Session for the purpose of hurrying on the dissolution, and of disposing of the important business which it was absolutely essential to transact. They were consequently obliged very frequently to sit for a period of fourteen hours in the day. Now, when hon. Members recollected the arduous duties of the Government, and the necessity of their attending to their offices, as well as in their places in that House, they must admit the impossibility of their continuing for any length of time such a system of prolonged labour. He doubted much whether they would be able to undertake the duties of a Government if such a demand was to be made upon their time. He really thought that the question might be left to the good taste of the House; for he had seen many instances where rigid rules failed to accomplish that which, when left to the good taste and feeling of hon. Members, was successfully achieved. It would be his duty, therefore, to oppose the Motion of the hon. Gentleman, though he readily admitted it was introduced with the best and most commendable intentions.

MR. HUME said, he should support the Motion, for in the opinion of the public the manner in which the business of that House was managed was not consistent with a due regard to the great interests committed to its care. The right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer had ridiculed the idea of hon. Members being compelled to make short speeches, but he (Mr. Hume) was not quite sure that such a regulation would not have a most salutary effect. At all events, he had heard that the adoption of a limitation of the sort, in an assembly in another country, had, after some six or eight months' practice, been attended with very satisfactory results. He thought his hon. Friend (Mr. Brotherton) had acted perfectly right in thus appealing to the good sense of the House, and asking them to adopt some mode by which their late sittings might be abridged. If the plan proposed by his hon. Friend were agreed to as a general rule, leaving extraordinary cases as exceptions, he believed they would soon find that they had got rid of one-half of the obnoxious measures which were now being constantly brought before them. He (Mr. Hume) had been the innovator in the case of the Wednesday sittings, and he thought he should have the testimony of the right hon. Gentleman in the Chair, as well as the great majority of the Members of that House, in favour of that alteration. Adopt the Motion of his hon. Friend, and equally beneficial results would be the consequence.

LORD JOHN RUSSELL said, that, however satisfactory the limitation of the sittings of that House might be to the public, and great as the convenience of such an arrangement might be to hon. Members, yet he believed that they would not improve the mode of carrying on the business of the House by merely adopting the Motion under discussion. The House must be aware there was not a legislative assembly in the world which transacted nearly half as much business as the House of Commons did. With regard to the example of the Congress of the United States, it should be remembered that the whole of the local business of the Union was carried on by the several State Legislatures, and, moreover, that as the whole of the Administration formed no part of Congress, therefore there were not in that assembly those debates as to matters of administration which took up so much of the time of this House. Considering then that they had this amount of business to do, he put it to them whether it might not become necessary very much to alter all their other rules in case they agreed to the present proposition. If that was to be the case, let them have the whole scheme to be proposed for a different mode of conducting the business of the House laid before a Committee, and not begin by at once adopting the Motion of the hon. Member for Salford. With regard to reducing the number of stages through which Bills had to pass in that House, let him remind hon. Gentlemen that it was not many years ago that, from the introduction of a Bill to its passing, there were not less than thirty-two questions put. Adopt the proposition now made, and it would probably become necessary to still further reduce the number of questions which were still put—to read a Bill a first and second time, and not go to a third reading at all, or some change of that sort. It appeared said, that Members need not stay in the House after midnight, unless they pleased; but some Members wished to discharge their duty conscientiously, and therefore remained so long as the House was sitting. He was convinced that by the adoption of the Resolution, the business of the House would be facilitated; that it would be more favourable to the health of Members, and be more satisfactory to the country.

MR. EWART, in seconding the Motion, said, he wished that the proposition was one which would have the effect of assimilating more their business to the course they adopted on Wednesdays. It was stated, by a high authority, that more real practical business was done by that House on the Wednesdays than on any of the other days of the week. He (Mr. Ewart) considered that after twelve o'clock at night, those Members who were really anxious to do their duty might with great reason and propriety protest against proceeding any further with the business of the Legislature. The practice of sitting beyond twelve o'clock was most injurious to the health of the Members generally, especially to that of the Ministers, who had so many other duties to attend to. He had seen Ministers at such a time, while endeavouring to push forward business, actually sinking under the weight of their labour. He believed that the voice of the country was with his hon. Friend in taking this step. The voice of common sense was, at all events, in his favour.

“That in the present Session of Parliament no Business shall be proceeded with in this House after midnight; and that, at Twelve o'clock at night precisely, notwithstanding there may be Business under discussion, Mr. Speaker do adjourn the House without putting any Question.”

MR. W. WILLIAMS said, he thought the practice of sitting so late at night was most discreditable to that House. Bills of the utmost importance were passed over night without the slightest consideration. Oftentimes were they called upon after midnight to dispose of thirty or forty Orders of the Day, and the consequence was, that measures were hurried through in an imperfect manner, and had to be amended in subsequent Sessions. It might be said that the mass of public business could not be otherwise got through; but every one acquainted with the mode of business in that House was acquainted with the fact that the early part of the Session was consumed in discussion upon Bills that in many cases were never intended to be passed, and in others were withdrawn at the close of the Session. Never had the business been so well conducted as at the close of last Session, when the House sat early. He hoped the Government would give at least a trial to this Motion.

SIR WILLIAM CLAY said, the object of his hon. Friend in this Motion was really within his own power, by moving an adjournment after midnight. He thought there were many occasions on which the House would feel the enormous importance of forwarding certain Bills a stage, although it might be after midnight; and he therefore urged his hon. It appeared to him (Lord J. Russell), that, however large might be the accumulation of Bills at the end of the Session, yet they could not agree to a proposal of this kind without first considering all the consequences which might result from it. He did not say that it was not possible to adopt some scheme by which the increased business of the House might be better transacted; but to accept the Motion of the hon. Member for Salford under present circumstances would, in his opinion, be highly imprudent.

SIR HENRY WILLOUGHBY said, he would have supported the Motion if he could have done so with propriety, because he should be glad to prevent that system of midnight legislation which had sometimes been conducted with such evil effects in that House. But unfortunately the hon. Gentleman (Mr. Brotherton) had overshot the mark in not limiting his Resolution to the introduction of new business. If his hon. Friend would bring forward some Motion by which no new business should be introduced after midnight, unless with the distinct leave of the House, such a proposition as that would come before them with effect; although even that might require some further consideration, as suggested by the noble Lord opposite. Under existing circumstances, it was clear that if they adopted the Motion of the hon. Member for Salford, they would put it in the power of any party in the House to talk any question out. That would be so fatal to their deliberations that he could not give his support to the Motion.

MR. BROTHERTON, in reply, said, he must express his regret that he could not enlist the leading Members of the House in support of his Motion: the discussion had only tended to show how much more difficult it was to unlearn bad habits than to acquire good ones.

MANNING THE NAVY.

LORD BROUGHAM wished to put a question to the noble Duke opposite, the First Lord of the Admiralty. He believed that towards the close of last Session a Commission or Committee was appointed to inquire into the subject of manning the Navy. He now wished to ask whether any steps had been taken by that Commission or Committee, and whether any report would be laid before Parliament? The subject was one of the most important of those connected with that most important of all questions—the effective force of our Navy, and it was one upon which he felt not an inordinate but a rational anxiety. He hoped above all things that expense would be no obstacle to the improvements which might be required in this department. If there were a man in the House who grudged the money necessary for this purpose, let not that man be listened to.

The DUKE of NORTHUMBERLAND said, that he had no difficulty whatever in answering the question of his noble and learned Friend. There was a Committee, not a Commission, under the Board of Admiralty now sitting, to inquire generally into the state of the manning of the Navy, and embracing everything connected with the condition of our seamen. It had been sitting for several months, but no report had yet been made. The Committee was of a private nature, for the purpose of informing the Admiralty, and was composed of many most distinguished officers, in whose judgment the greatest confidence could be placed, and who would ever have prominently in view the good of the service. He entirely agreed that the question was one of great importance.

LORD BROUGHAM said, when he spoke of the expense, he had in his eye the undoubted fact of the wages being so much better in other branches of the sea service than in our Navy; and, not only in our own mercantile marine, but in the American service.

BILLS OF EXCHANGE AND NOTES (METROPOLIS) BILL.

The EARL of DERBY then moved the Second Reading of the Bill with respect to the presentation and payment of Bills falling due on Thursday next.

LORD CAMPBELL said, that, entirely approving the Bill, he wished to make one observation with a view of removing some apprehensions which had been expressed with respect to it. It had been suggested that foreign acceptors and endorsers of bills might be released from their liabilities if the bills due on the 18th were presented on any other than the day on which they originally became due. He apprehended, however, that it was a maxim of modern law that that which was done in each country must be taken according to the law of that country. Now, the 17th inst. would be the day for the presentation of bills falling due in England on the 18th, according to the law of this country; and he thought, therefore that the acceptor and endorser would be as much liable if the bill were then presented as if it were presented on the 18th.

LORD TRURO said, he did not intend to offer any opposition to the Bill; but he was afraid that some inconvenience might arise. There could be no doubt that the provisions of this Bill, by which bills falling due on the 18th instant might be presented the day previously, would be attended with no evil consequences in relation to British bills. Let them, however, take the case of bills drawn in foreign parts on British subjects. Suppose that one of these bills was in the hands of a British subject, who had to look to the foreign endorser in default of the English acceptor, or suppose the English holder got payment from the foreign endorser, but that endorser had to look to a prior endorser, and that that remedy had to be enforced in a foreign court—the effect of this Bill would be to alter the nature of the contract which had been made abroad between the parties to the bill. Now a bill of exchange drawn upon a British subject, so far as concerned a British subject, enured according to the British law. Although, however, the general principle of the law was that contracts depended on the law of the country where they were made, there was an exception. If a bill was drawn in one country upon the subject of another in that country, the law of the country where the bill was to be paid was that which regulated the liability of the acceptor. But in this case the foreign endorser had engaged that the acceptor should pay if the bill was presented according to the tenor of the bill; and it was very doubtful if the foreign courts would enforce the contract as altered by an ex post facto law in this country. He wished therefore to suggest that it would behove all holders of bills due on the 18th, whose bills were not paid on Wednesday, to present them again on Friday. Generally speaking, presentation was excused for a reasonable cause, and it had been held that, where there was a physical restraint on the party holding the bill—such as riots on the day when the bill was due—nonpresentation on the day on which it fell due was excused, provided the bill was presented as soon as the physical restraint was withdrawn, and at the earliest practicable moment. Now the effect of this Bill was, if not to render the presentation of bills on the 18th instant unlawful on the day on which they fell due, at least to show that the Legislature intended they should not be presented on that day. That might not be considered equivalent to a restraint by force by the foreign courts. It was therefore important that holders of foreign bills falling due on Thursday should present them on Friday, as the earliest period possible after they fell due, in order to place themselves in the best possible situation.

LORD CAMPBELL said, that he must express his confidence that the foreign endorsers and drawers were liable, according to what would be a good presentation by the law of England when that presentation had to be made. Now, as there were three days of grace there was no necessity for a presentation on the day when the bill fell due; and, therefore, according to the law of England, the presentation would now be good either on the 17th or 19th inst.

LORD TRURO said, he referred only to foreign contracts.

LORD BROUGHAM said, that when two Judges gave opinions not exactly the same, he hoped they would not consider themselves bound by the opinions which they might there express, if the point was ever brought before them judicially.

Bill read 2^a (according to Order); Committee negatived; and Standing Orders Nos. 37 and 38 considered (according to Order), and dispensed with; and Bill read 3^a, and passed.

FUNERAL OF THE DUKE OF WELLINGTON.

LORD REDESDALE brought up the First Report of the Select Committee appointed to consider the best mode in which the House could assist at the ceremony of the funeral of the late Duke of Wellington.

The Clerk at the table then read the Report:—

“1. That the House be represented in the Procession by the Lord Chancellor only.

“2. That the Lords attending the Ceremony in the Cathedral do appear in Mourning in the Places reserved for them.

“3. That arrangements be made for such Lords as desire to go to the Cathedral by Water to proceed from the House to Paul’s Wharf, at a Quarter past Nine o’Clock.

“4. That Tickets be ready for Delivery to all Lords proposing to attend the Ceremony, till Five o’Clock To-morrow, at the Earl Marshal’s Office, No. 1, Parliament Street; such Tickets will be required by all who go to the Cathedral, whether by Land or Water.

“5. That similar Tickets be also delivered to all Peers of Scotland and Ireland.”

Ordered to be printed.

“That this House be represented in the Procession by the Lord Chancellor only.”

IMPROVEMENTS IN THE ADMINISTRATION OF THE LAW.

The LORD CHANCELLOR: My Lords, I rise for the purpose of stating to your Lordships what steps have been taken since we last met for the purpose of carrying into operation the Acts which were passed last Session having reference to the Court of Chancery, and various matters connected therewith. I rise also to state to your Lordships what are the further measures which Her Majesty’s Government propose to adopt for the further prosecution of the objects which your Lordships and the other House of Parliament had then in view. My Lords, the Acts which your Lordships passed last Session with regard to the proceedings of the Court of Chancery were three in number. One Act was for the abolition of the office of Master in Chancery, and for introducing an altogether new system of Chamber practice with regard to matters which, up to that time, had been prosecuted by the Masters in their own Chambers. The next Act was for the Improvement of the Jurisdiction in Equity; and the third Act was called the Suitors in Chancery Relief Act; and it certainly did afford a great relief, by the reduction of salaries and the abolition of useless and unnecessary offices. Now, my Lords, it has been very much the practice of Parliament, and it is a very easy mode (whatever other difficulties it may involve) of getting through the business of legislation on such subjects, not to fill up in detail the outline of the Bills, but to leave almost everything beyond their leading subjects to be carried into execution by Orders to be made by the Court after the Bills themselves have passed. This was the course adopted by Parliament with respect to the measures of last Session; and I can assure your Lordships, therefore, that my vacation has been principally occupied in a species of legislation—sometimes with and sometimes without the assistance of my learned Colleagues—in order to supply what was necessary to give full effect to these Acts of Parliament. My Lords, they are now in full operation; and I think I can assure your Lordships, from what I have already seen, that they will fully effect everything which the country and Parliament have had in view. And I think I may venture to assert that the celerity with which matters will be decided in Chancery will be such as to make the old proverb entirely forgotten, and to lead to the introduction of a new one. I think there is no Court in this country in which questions of property will be decided with such rapidity as there—and by rapidity I do not mean haste, which above all other things is to be deprecated in the administration of justice; I mean really good speed—speed so far as is consistent with the most mature deliberation; and that such speed can now be given to matters coming before the Court of Chancery I hope to show your Lordships before I sit down, as well as that the expense may yet be greatly diminished, so as to render that Court, and every portion of

My Lords, independently of the general objects of the Acts in question, there was a very crying evil which has been remedied by the Orders which have been issued by myself and my learned Colleagues. It is a subject which I always had very much at heart—and respecting which I carried my views into effect as far as I could in Ireland. It is this—that there should be a statute of limitations, as it were, within the Court, as well as a statute of limitations without the Court. You pass an Act of Parliament to prevent the bringing forward of old claims; but in the Court itself when once made they may be kept alive and brought forward at a period highly inconvenient and unjust. Your Lordships have an order regarding appeals, which is to this effect—that there shall be no appeal from a decree or order of the Court of Chancery after the lapse of five years after enrolment. Under the early orders of the Court of Chancery, the arrangement was such that the enrolment was intended to take place at once. The intention of your Lordships' House, therefore, at a very early date, was to compel the party to come to this House, if he wanted relief, within five years after he or the other litigating party had first actually got a decree. But, so far from this being practically carried out, the course, up to this last twelve-month, has been that parties have been allowed in the Court of Chancery to enrol nunc pro tunc, and then the party desiring to appeal to your Lordships' House himself enrols the order, though adverse to himself, and at the end of, it may be, fifteen or seventeen years, he comes to your Lordships' House, and presents an appeal to the House at that distant period; all which leads to great evils and great injustice. There should be no taking away of a man's right to appeal; but there should be no door left open to him for unnecessarily continuing a long and irritating litigation. This evil has been met by Orders to this effect, and I believe they will work most beneficially: In the first place, nobody is to have the right of appeal within the Court of Chancery itself after five years. In the next place, every man is to enrol a decree or order within six months; and after five years have elapsed he is not to be at liberty to enrol at all, except by a special order of the Lord Chancellor, so as to meet what may be a case sometimes of necessity, yet at the same time to prevent different decisions, and keep the subject closely within the time within which he ought to appeal. Therefore, my Lords, there will henceforward be a statute of limitations, as it were, within the Court, as well as one without the Court.

My Lords, the Act for the Relief of the Suitors in Chancery, as I told your Lordships, has also been followed out by orders of the Court. The fees under these Acts have been settled, and they have been greatly reduced in number, and very considerably simplified. A great burden was imposed upon the suitors in having to pay a great many fees upon every occasion at many offices. That evil has been corrected, and the parties will have fewer fees to pay, and the whole system is exceedingly simplified, which in itself will be found to be a very great benefit. I mention this, because I wish clearly to show your Lordships the state of the funds which we have in our Court, and the purposes to which they are applied.

I want to draw your Lordships' attention, and the attention of everybody in the country, to the state of our funds, the nature of the fund out of which the costs of the Court are paid, the costs of the administration of justice, and the means by which I hope still further to reduce those costs. Your Lordships must bear in mind that the additional sum of 9,000*l.* a year in the shape of compensation has been thrown upon the funds by the late improvements. You have given large compensations, and at the same time created new offices, so that, although the fees are greatly reduced, yet the immediate expenses have also greatly increased. But, notwithstanding that, my Lords, the saving to the suitors between the fees which were imposed last year, and the fees which will now be imposed under the scale which has just been issued, will be not less than 30,000*l.* a year. That is accounted for in some measure by the sum of 26,000*l.* a year, for the salaries of the several Judges of the Court, having been transferred to the Consolidated Fund, upon the ground that the Judges ought to be paid by the country, and not by the suitors. And so, unquestionably, the administration of justice ought to be paid for by the public funds, and not by the funds of the suitors. But then there is this clear distinction: the costs of the administration of justice, properly speaking, ought undoubtedly to be paid by the country; but the costs of the administration of the property of a party within the Court ought not to be paid by the public. Every man ought to have a right to go into the Court itself free from expense, if it may be, and to have the decision of the Judge. But, if he has accounts to be taken—if he has estates to be guarded and watched, and kept in order, he is no more entitled to have the expense of that paid for him in Court, than he would be if the operation had taken place out of Court. Keeping in mind that essential distinction, I must call your Lordships' attention a little to the state of the funds, as I shall have occasion afterwards to call your Lordships' particular attention to the operation of them.

There are two funds upon which the Court draws for sums for which it has occasion. One is called the Suitors' Fund, and the other is called the Suitors' Fee Fund. The Suitors' Fund arose in this way—there are in the Court sums of money sometimes of a large amount, which the persons interested in them never require to be invested. The Court, therefore, under the authority of various Acts of Parliament, has been in the habit of itself investing from time to time that portion of the Suitors' "unemployed cash," as it is called, which the Suitor has not required, or directed to be invested on his account. The consequence of the party not requiring it to be invested is, that of course he cannot be entitled to the dividends upon that which he has not had invested, and he is not liable to any loss; but he can demand the amount simply of his cash whenever he thinks proper to do so. The dividends on the stock thus procured are partly applied by the Court in payment of the salaries of officers and expenses of the Court, and the surplus of those dividends is again invested on a separate account, though as part of the same Fund. Nearly 4,000,000*l.* has been invested in this way, and the sums standing on these two accounts constitute what is called the Suitors' Fund; and the result is, that at this time there is a fund producing an income of 111,000*l.* and a fraction, which is appropriated to the payment of the expenses of the Court and of the administration of justice. Now, my Lords, the sums which by Parliament have been thrown upon this fund amount to 48,320*l.* a year. The annual dividend of the fund is 111,843*l.*; that leaves a surplus of 63,523*l.*, which by the Act of last Session—the Suitors' in Chancery Relief

Act—was directed to be carried over to the next fund, that is, the Suitors' Fee Fund. My Lords, the Suitors' Fee Fund is a fund—as the very name of it intimates—which arises from fees imposed by the authority of Parliament, and payable by the suitors. That balance of 63,523*l.* came in aid of that fund, and the sum which this year will have to be provided for as charges upon the fee fund will amount to 157,450*l.* Then, if you take the balance which is to be carried to the credit of the fee fund, 63,523*l.*, that will leave an amount of 93,927*l.*, to be levied upon all the Suitors in the Court of Chancery. Now, my Lords, I have no occasion to tell your Lordships that that is a very large sum; yet it is a small sum compared with the actual business done. My Lords, the amount of fees levied last year was 133,842*l.* The estimated amount, I have told your Lordships, of the fees this year is 93,241*l.*; that is, a saving of 40,601*l.*; and then there is to be added 3,838*l.* to that for fees hitherto received by the officers for their own use, which have been abolished, and which the suitors will not have to pay. That makes a sum of 44,439*l.*, which would be the saving in the year. But, my Lords, the Court have received copy money; they have had to copy documents, and have charged a certain amount per folio as copy money, and that sum altogether has produced 10,000*l.* a year. The solicitors have complained very much of this. They thought it was taking their own proper business from them, and that they could do it better as between themselves and their clients, if it were left to them. My Lords, it is now left to them, and they will have the benefit of it. The solicitors are themselves to furnish the copies, the expense of which will, as heretofore, amount to 10,000*l.* a year. Your Lordships will see it is not a saving to the suitors, because the suitors will still have to pay for copies; but it is not a sum raised by the Court in any manner upon fees which the Court imposes. The result is, that, taking that 10,000*l.* off the 44,439*l.*, because the suitors will still have to pay it, there is a saving of 34,439*l.* in this year's estimate between the costs to be paid in the coming year by the general body of suitors, and the costs paid in last year.

My Lords, it is necessary, in order to show to your Lordships what I propose, to state to your Lordships, in some little detail, the particulars of the management of the fund under the care and in the name of the Accountant General. In the first place, I will observe that there has been some complaint made, and justly enough—not as regards the officers, because they have been inclined to give every facility and to do more than officers generally have been in the habit of doing—but complaints have been made that the Accountant General's office is shut the whole of the long vacation, and that when there are persons who have moneys to receive, it is a great hardship that they cannot receive them. I have no doubt we shall be able to make arrangements which, without pressing—as we ought not to press—improperly upon officers who are already sufficiently worked, will enable us to meet the just demands of the public, and to clear the Court from that imputation. I must now draw your Lordships' attention particularly to the state of the Funds standing in the name of the Accountant General. The Accountant General has at this moment standing in his name the sum of 48,015,826*l.* stock—an enormous sum to be under the jurisdiction and under the care of the Court; and I have the satisfaction of telling your Lordships that no human being has a claim upon that fund which it is not fully sufficient to answer. With all the burdens thrown upon them, the funds of the Court are more than sufficient to meet them. With a view of seeing whether I could not make an arrangement which should further ease the suitors and very much simplify the management, I have taken great pains to understand the accounts, and to see what further could be done. Taking this last year, the stock and cash “turned over” exceeded 21,000,000*l.* of money, and the accounts are upwards of 17,000 in number. Your Lordships will suppose, therefore, what without great care would be the difficulties incident to the management of such vast accounts. The amount of cash which was received by the Court during last year, including that received in respect of sales of securities, was 5,973,769*l.*; the amount of cash paid by the Court, including that paid upon purchases, was 5,993,539*l.*, and I invite your Lordships' attention to the consideration how very nearly those two sums are balanced. Then we come to the stock. The stock, considered with respect to the dealings with it, is of two classes. The first class comprises stock purchased by the Court, and stock sold by the Court; the second class comprises stock accepted by the Court, and stock transferred by the Court, from or to the accounts of different parties. The result of that is as follows:—The stock purchased by the Court last year was 2,181,249*l.* The stock sold by the Court was 1,829,009*l.*, making together 4,010,258*l.* The stock accepted was 2,382,591*l.*, the stock transferred was 2,964,869*l.* Upon a comparison of these figures, you will find that by keeping that stock together in one great account, instead of keeping the accounts in the different causes separately, the Court would not have occasion to buy for the whole year more than 230,000*l.* stock to meet all those various claims; and yet your Lordships will observe that the real transactions, namely, the actual purchases and sales of stock amounted to 4,000,000*l.* and upwards. In order that I may be fully understood, I must explain to your Lordships the way in which transactions are carried on between the Bank and the Accountant General. Your Lordships, I have no doubt, are perfectly aware that certain transactions at the Stock Exchange are carried on by two descriptions of persons, the broker and the jobber. The jobber, unlike the broker, buys and sells stock the whole day long, and has what is called the “turn of the market” upon each transaction, so that buying at 1-8th less and selling at 1-8th more, in the result he makes 1-8th per cent, each way, and that is his profit. Now the Accountant General, having in his hands this vast sum of 48,000,000*l.* stock, goes every day into the Stock Exchange, and there buys in the market all the stock which he requires to buy, and sells in the market the stock which is called for, and which has to be sold. Your Lordships may guess how very expensive is this operation, if he has to pay the broker and give the jobber his profit both ways—in fact, it costs 12,000*l.* a year—and yet no individual has a right to complain, because no more is done in each particular transaction than the individual himself would have done if he were dealing with his own funds. What I hope to be able to accomplish is this, to get rid, as nearly as possible, of all sales and all purchases. I have had the scheme examined by the experienced officers in the different departments. And I may say here, with reference to this as to all the other subjects which I have to mention, that I have not had occasion to apply to any officer of the Court, from the highest in office to the lowest in station, who has not most readily afforded me every aid in his power. Now, my Lords, this subject was a few years ago under the consideration of a Committee of the House of Commons. I will quote what is said in their Report, which is called "the Second Report of the Select Committee of the House of Commons upon Fees in the Courts of Law and Equity" in May, 1848. They there recommend—

"That the system of brokerage on the suitors' fund should be discontinued, and that the Accountant General should be paid by a salary, and that only the balance of the stock required to be bought or sold in each day should be bought or sold by the broker, and that the one-eighth per cent on the funds transferred thereby saved to the suitor, and which, but for this alteration, would have been actually bought and sold, should be paid to the suitors' fee fund for the benefit of the suitors."

Now, my Lords, the Committee of the House of Commons having this subject under their consideration evidently took for their guidance the practice of the jobber. A jobber never goes home with more stock than he wishes to retain. They say, therefore, that the Accountant General should go each day, and buy or sell only the balance of the stock, and they say also that the saving thereby made ought to go to the Suitors' Fee Fund. I beg leave to differ from that Report upon both these points. I see no necessity whatever for the Accountant General so buying and selling every day or any day, unless cash is actually wanted for current purposes. If he wants cash, he must of course go and sell stock to obtain it; but with 48,000,000*l.* of stock he never can want to buy stock. The plan I propose has been fully worked out upon paper, and I have no doubt will work equally well in practice. It does not involve going to the Bank at all, nor putting the party to the expense of a broker; but, without that, everything may be kept perfectly right and regular, and there will be a saving of 12,000*l.* a year to the suitors. That is a saving which I think should go—not, as that Report proposes, for the benefit of the suitors generally, but—to the individual suitor. I cannot understand, if you can work a suit without expense, why you are to throw that saving into the general fund. Why should not the man himself have the benefit of it? You charge him dear enough for some things, and if you can let him have other things a little cheaper, why should he not have the benefit? By the plan I propose, then, upon the whole year's transactions it will probably only be necessary to sell some 100,000*l.* or 200,000*l.* stock. The transactions will, of course, vary from day to day, but not to such an extent as to create any difficulty. It is not until cash is actually wanted that there will be any sale at all. I believe the effect will be that the accounts will be simplified, vast expense will be saved, and the suitors will be benefited. I must mention to your Lordships that one difficulty thrown in the way of this arrangement was, that you would not ascertain what is the price to be paid or accepted by the different persons when there is no longer a real sale or purchase, but only one existing on paper. Fortunately, my Lords, we are enabled to meet the difficulty in the most satisfactory manner. The Bank of England takes the fluctuations every day of the price of each fund up to 1 o'clock in the day, and then it strikes the average. I propose, therefore, to take that 1 o'clock average as the price which every man who sells is to receive, and the price every man who buys is to offer. That will make it very fair as respects all parties, and it will bring this further advantage: Very often sums are ordered to be transferred at the price of a given day. For the computation the broker charges a percentage. The same 1 o'clock price will be adapted to those transactions, and so the suitor will be saved a very considerable sum.

I have told your Lordships that the fund which pays so much of the expenses of the administration of justice in the Court of Chancery consists of a sum which produces 110,000*l.* a year. That has been produced by cash paid into Court belonging to suitors which the suitor himself has not required to be invested. I confess during a great part of my professional life I have thought that that was a way in which the money of the suitors ought not to be dealt with. The Court of Chancery itself never permits the trustee of a fund to derive any benefit from that fund. If he were to say, "This money, of which I am trustee, I have invested for my own benefit, taking the corresponding risk"—the Court would, without any hesitation, declare it a breach of trust, and compel him to give up all the benefit which he might have received. Now the Court acts differently with this fund; for, being itself a guardian and trustee of these moneys, because they are not required to be invested, the Court does not therefore decline to invest them; but the Court does invest them, and the interest and dividends are appropriated to its own purposes. The argument in favour of this is of this nature, that the Court acts as banker of the suitors, and, as ordinarily bankers are entitled to employ a balance left in their hands, so the Court itself is entitled to use for the benefit of the suitors generally the money which is thus intrusted to it. There is, no doubt, something in that argument; but I propose to adopt the following plan—that for the future any unemployed cash shall be laid out by the Court when it is not required to be invested, and the Court shall have the benefit of that investment for two years, treating the Court as a banker for that purpose; and if at the end of two years there shall not be any requisition not to lay out the money, the party entitled shall have, as from that period, the benefit and risk of the past investments. Very often this unemployed cash is not invested, owing to the neglect of other parties having no personal interest in it, a neglect of which the persons having such an interest, and who are thereby deprived of dividends to which they are entitled, have cause to complain. I believe that the course which I have suggested will meet the justice of the case without any inconvenience.

My Lords, I have now reached another proposal which I hope will enable me to afford still further relief to suitors. There was an account moved for in the House of Commons in 1851, which I hold in my hand, which is called a “Return from the Accountant General, showing the amount of cash standing to different accounts in his name, and not dealt with during the periods of 10, 25, and 50 years respectively prior to the 1st day of August, 1850; and the amount of stock or other securities standing to different accounts in his name, the dividends on which have not been dealt with during the same periods respectively.” It gives the cash and stock in different columns, which have “not been dealt with,” as the expression is, during 10 years; those not dealt with during 25 years, and those not dealt with during 50 years. I have to explain to your Lordships that the first line, those not dealt with during 10 years, means not dealt with for 10 years, but within 25 years. The next line, not dealt with for 25 years, means not dealt with for 25 years, but within 50 years; and in the next line 50 years means 50 years and upwards. I wish to bring all those separate accounts together. Many of those sums are so circumstanced that the parties can never call for them—they are in the nature of unclaimed stock. The Court has dealt with them in this manner: Suppose there has been a sum invested: when the dividends are received they are carried to the dead account; so that if it should ever become a living account by a claim upon it by a person justly entitled, that man will find his original sum, with all the dividends received from time to time added to the capital sum he would be entitled to receive. But as fast as those dividends come in, they fall under the head of “cash not invested,” and therefore they are invested in a common fund, the produce of which the Court applies to its own purposes. But I propose that in ease of the suitors—and only in ease of the suitors and for no other purpose—the Lord Chancellor shall himself investigate all the accounts, and shall direct that the dividends shall from time to time, instead of being invested, be applied to the expense of the administration of justice, so as to relieve the suitors. Such an investigation I propose shall take place every five years. Independently of other circumstances, the cash was originally invested at an average of 86, and the profit, therefore, on that stock would now be very large. That will yield a large sum in relief of the suitor; and I propose that it shall be applied to his relief, and ultimately to the relief also of the Consolidated Fund.

My Lords, I cannot pass from this topic without declaring my belief, not only that it is impossible that justice can be anywhere administered more speedily than it can be, and will be, in the Court of Chancery, but moreover that the hour will come, and is not far distant, when the suitors in the Court of Chancery will have no costs whatever to pay for the administration of justice—irrespective, of course, of those costs which must always exist between solicitor and client—if it be considered expedient to wholly relieve them. I think I am entitled to say, that I have always been decidedly adverse to Government putting its hands upon this fund. I remember perfectly well in the other House, many years ago, my ear being caught by a conversation between Mr. Huskisson and Mr. Goulburn and Lord Ashburton, then Mr. Baring, the purport of which was, that the Government should, as it was said they him, shall, on the other hand, involve no danger of the infringement of the liberty of the subject in any way.

At present, with respect to Commissions of Lunacy, the course pursued is this: In the case of each person supposed to be a lunatic, a commission issues, directed to the Masters, to inquire with a Jury whether the person is of unsound mind or not. I propose to issue one standing commission, and to refer every case as it occurs to it. By that means there will be saved at once a very considerable expense. I then propose that in every case there shall be notice given to the person respecting whom the inquiry is to be made, and that he shall be at liberty to require a jury; and that unless the Lord Chancellor himself, upon personal inspection of him, shall be of opinion that his infirmity of mind is so great as to render him incapable of forming a rational wish, he shall be allowed to have the intervention of a jury. The examination by the Lord Chancellor would be analogous to that which he now makes in cases of application for a traverse. Such an application my noble and learned Friend near me (Lord Cranworth) will remember was made in the case of Mrs. Cumming, when he and I and our learned Colleague held that a party was entitled to a traverse as of right, subject to an inspection by the Lord Chancellor, the object of such an inspection being to ascertain, not whether the party is of sound mind or not, but simply whether he is so far sane as that the traverse may appear to be really desired by himself, and not merely by some other interested party. In like manner I propose that, if upon a similar examination in the case of an application for an inquiry, the Lord Chancellor sees that the party himself really wishes for it, he shall direct a jury; but that if no such requisition is made by the party, or the Lord Chancellor is satisfied, on such personal examination, that the party is not competent to express a desire upon it, and that it is unnecessary, the Master shall proceed with the inquiry without a jury—and that the finding of the Master that the party is insane shall operate as an inquisition taken before a jury. And I propose, besides, that the Master should in any case have power to summon a jury, if, on investigation, he think it necessary. In that way an enormous expense will be saved, while the rights of this unhappy class of persons will be entirely preserved. Again, my

Lords, a large expense is now incurred by the inquiry at what time the party first became of unsound mind. This originated, no doubt, in a desire to protect the rights of the Crown; but the Crown no longer takes any beneficial interest in the estates of lunatics. The result of the inquiry on this point is in nine times out of ten of no value at all, and in no case is it of any value beyond its being prima facie evidence. It very often happens that after all these inquiries have been made, and every protection has been carefully and laboriously thrown around the lunatic, you have not left him enough of his property to provide for his bare maintenance. My intention therefore is, that it should be provided that the inquiry as to the sanity or insanity should have relation only to the time present, unless under a special Order of the Lord Chancellor for carrying it back to a particular date. I propose, further, under the power given by an Act of last Session, to substitute a percentage on the incomes of lunatics for the fees now paid; and, my Lords, I think I may say that the application of that principle may be safely intrusted to my hands, because I have always been of opinion that it is most unjust to make a rich man who is afflicted with lunacy liable to pay the expenses of a poor man who is similarly afflicted, merely for that reason. I also propose to get rid of unnecessary attendances by the next of kin. The next of kin have a sort of inchoate right to look after the property of a lunatic, because if he die without leaving a will, they may be entitled to inherit. I do not mean, therefore, that the attendance of the next of kin should be altogether prevented, but that in proper cases a certain number should be allowed to appear. The next thing to be attempted is, to save those unnecessary references which I have already alluded to. The great difficulty is, to improve the working of the Masters' Office, by extending their powers without trenching on the authority of the person acting under the Queen's Sign-manual, which authority it is impossible to give up. A man petitions for an inquiry—the Lord Chancellor sends it to the Master—the Master makes a report, which goes again before the Lord Chancellor. I shall propose that, for the future, wherever the Masters are of opinion that if a petition went to the Lord Chancellor he would send it to them as a matter of course for inquiry, they shall have power to proceed with the inquiry without any order of reference at all, of allowed to continue. There ought to be one plain rule by which the proceedings of all Courts should be guided, and the Government have thought it their duty to see whether some means cannot be found of bringing more into harmony on this subject the different powers of the different Courts. It is of no use, however, attempting to disguise that a more extended investigation into the working of the Ecclesiastical Courts must follow at no distant period.

There is one short Bill which the Government will think it desirable to introduce with reference to the Patent Law. I regret to say that some of the inferior clerks in the Court of Chancery have at times received public money and have not accounted for it. This evil has been wholly obviated by the late substitution of stamps for money payments, and we propose to apply the same system under the Patent Law Amendment Act of last Session.

I will now call your Lordships' attention to a very different subject, one in which many of your Lordships, and especially my noble and learned Friend (Lord Lyndhurst) take a deep interest—I mean the subject of Lunacy. My Lords, there is a great deal of machinery at work (but perhaps not too much) on this subject. There is not only the authority of the Great Seal acting under the authority of the Queen's Sign-manual, but there are two Masters in Lunacy, and a Registrar in Lunacy, and there are three Visitors, whose duty it is, under the Act of Parliament of 1833, to visit persons who are lunatics, by inquisition. Besides that, there are, under another Act of Parliament (commonly called Lord Shaftesbury's Act), eleven Commissioners, five of whom are unpaid and six are paid, that body being presided over by the noble Earl himself (the Earl of Shaftesbury); of whose zeal and the dedication of whose time to this service it is impossible to speak too highly. Their duty is to license asylums, to visit those asylums, and generally to have the supervision of them. That system has worked well; but in the course of time has been found to require considerable amendment. Those amendments are now in progress, under my direction, with the full co-operation of the noble Earl and his colleagues; and I have every reason to believe that all the difficulties which have hitherto been found to arise in the working of the Commission will be removed by the assistance of Parliament. The Masters, who are attached to the Lord Chancellor in a more particular manner than those Commissioners are, execute all Commissions of Lunacy, and also receive orders and make inquiries. They are very fully employed, and are persons very competent to their duties. The Registrar also has important duties to perform, which he performs very much to my satisfaction. However, when the system is that the Lord Chancellor has, as a matter of course, to send everything to the Master for inquiry, and that then the Master has to inquire, and when he has made inquiries to send it back to the Lord Chancellor, and that then there is to be a hearing in Court before him, there must be undoubtedly a very considerable loss of time, and much unnecessary expense. Then, again, there are many cases in which, on the execution of a Commission of Lunacy, the intervention of a Jury is not only unnecessary but absurd. My Lords, too great anxiety cannot be felt, with regard to the liberty of the subject, not to dispense too hastily with a jury as a universal rule; but there are cases in which, upon the mere sight of a person, it is manifestly a solemn mockery to summon a jury to inquire whether he is of sane mind or not, and, for that purpose, to bring him before the jury, paining unnecessarily the feelings of relatives and friends without the slightest object. I propose to do away, as far as may be, with this evil by means which I will presently explain to your Lordships in detail. There are three classes of criminal lunatics for whose care and maintenance it is necessary to make provision: criminals who have been acquitted on the ground of insanity; criminals who are in custody, and have never been tried because they are lunatic; and persons who are dangerous and at large. I could not entirely agree with what was proposed by the noble Earl (the Earl of Shaftesbury) last Session in the Bill which he introduced for a very excellent purpose—namely, for enabling a person who was evidently insane and dangerous to be at once taken and confined, and also to provide for the maintenance of persons who were in lunatic asylums, and were left there by their friends, and who, for the want of funds, were liable to be turned out by the keepers of such asylums, even though their being at large might be attended with danger. I hope to devise a plan which, while it will save the public from the danger to be apprehended from a person clearly insane being left at large till proper steps can be taken to confine official assignees to obtain a sufficient remuneration. In the case of Manchester, one of the official assignees has been unfortunately dismissed. I have not filled up the vacancy so occasioned, because the income arising from that particular office is not sufficient to remunerate a gentleman for his labour and time; but by this addition to the remuneration of the others the difficulty will be overcome. I propose, also, that the Lord Chancellor shall be empowered to refrain from filling up vacancies which may occur in the number of Commissioners in the country, so as to bring the number more into accordance with the requirements of the district. My Lords, I have been very anxiously inquiring what can be the reason why the business in the Court of Bankruptcy has fallen off, especially when I perceive that the fees received in respect of business in that Court are insufficient to meet the expenses. At the same time, my Lords, it must be borne in mind that the payments include an amount of 18,000*l.* a year for compensations to gentlemen whose offices have been abolished by Parliament. Therefore it is not fair to attribute to the present administration of justice in bankruptcy the expense represented by the whole amount of those payments. As these compensations drop, the funds of the Court of Bankruptcy will become more capable of defraying its current expenses. One reason assigned for the falling-off of the business, has been, that the system of giving different classes of certificates operates as a stigma upon the trader. The first commercial men in the City of London, merchant princes as they are, men of the highest feelings, may fall into misfortune; but in order to obtain a first-class certificate it is requisite that nothing but unavoidable misfortune shall have contributed to the bankruptcy of the party. Now, the very heart and soul of commerce is enterprise, and it is very difficult to say where enterprise ends, and want of due caution begins. I am persuaded that one of the effects of the present system is to keep out of the Court of Bankruptcy many cases where persons would gladly avail themselves of it, were it not for fear of the stigma which might be unjustly inflicted upon those who by their instrumentality become exposed to it. The Act of Parliament enacts that "the Court, having regard to the conformity of the bankrupt to the law of bankruptcy, and to his conduct as a trader before as well as

after his bankruptcy, and whether the allowance of his certificate be opposed by any creditor or not, shall judge of any objection against allowing such certificate, and either find the bankrupt entitled thereto and allow the same, or refuse or suspend the allowance thereof, or annex such conditions thereto as the justice of the case may require." It is, therefore, impossible to say that a very large power is not here given to the Commissioner. It is enacted in the next section that the certificate shall be in the form given in the schedule, and from that schedule all the difficulty has arisen. The Commissioner is directed by the schedule to certify that the bankruptcy has arisen from unavoidable losses and misfortunes, and thereupon to award a first-class certificate; or that the bankruptcy has arisen not wholly from unavoidable losses and misfortunes, in which case he is to award a certificate of the second class; or that the bankruptcy has not arisen from unavoidable losses and misfortunes, in which case he is to award a certificate of the third class. The consequence of this is, that the Commissioners have the power to examine into all the acts of the bankrupt, including his personal conduct, and to scrutinise it in a way which has led to very great objection on the part of many persons to bring those with whom they have had commercial dealings into the Court. I propose to repeal so much of the Act as gives the Commissioners power to grant 1st, 2nd, and 3rd class Certificates, but to leave untouched the power of refusing or suspending the allowance of the certificate. The second reason alleged for the falling-off of business in the Court of Bankruptcy is, that the percentage is unduly high where the property exceeds 1,000*l.* This objection I propose to obviate, if I find the allegation is well-founded. I may mention another thing which has led to a falling-off of the funds of that Court. Parties have been in the habit of entering the Court and availing themselves of its jurisdiction up to a certain point, and then, when it was convenient to themselves, of withdrawing from it and settling matters privately. I am far from desiring to interfere with their power of doing so, but I think they ought not to be allowed to throw serious labour upon the officers of the Court, without paying a just contribution towards the expenses of the Court.

It was proposed last Session by my noble and learned Friend (Lord Brougham); that certain of the powers of the Court of Cham-

cery should be exercised by the Judges of the County Courts. I entirely agree with my noble and learned Friend that those powers may properly be given in aid of the Court of Chancery; but I propose to give them to the Commissioners of the Court of Bankruptcy instead of to the County Court Judges, because I think that the Commissioners, from the nature of their jurisdiction, will be likely to perform those duties with more satisfaction to the Court of Chancery itself. I also propose to give to the Commissioners of Bankruptcy jurisdiction under what are called the Dead Men's Clauses. Under those clauses the Court would have the same jurisdiction after the man's death as during his life, subject to this restriction, that the man had been a trader within the bankrupt laws at the time of his death, and that his debts remained unpaid for a certain time after his death. One difficulty in the way of the adoption of this course is, that I have ascertained that the costs of such proceedings in the Court of Bankruptcy would be considerably higher than the costs of similar proceedings in the Court of Chancery. Another difficulty is, that under the administration of bankruptcy specialty debts are put down to an equality with simple contract debts. This is not objectionable in the administration of bankruptcy when the trader is alive, but of course it cannot be allowed after his death. It will therefore be necessary, my Lords, to take care to reserve to the specialty creditor the rights which he would now have in the Court of Chancery after the death of his debtor.

Another point to which I would refer before passing from the subject of Bankruptcy is this: Solicitors are now permitted to appear as advocates before the Commissioners of Bankruptcy. I propose to put the same restriction as is now put upon attorneys under the County Courts Act. That is, my Lords, I object to what are called attorney-advocates. I do not object to a man's attorney arguing his case for him, but I do object to an attorney being turned into a barrister, and acting as an advocate. There is no fair play in that. I desire to see the profession stand upon its proper basis. I wish the barrister not to trench upon the province of the attorney, nor the attorney upon the province of the barrister. Let each stand in his own place. Depend upon it, my Lords, if the system which has so long prevailed be broken in upon, great evils will ensue. It will necessarily lower the character of the Bar. Whether it will elevate the character of attorneys, I will not stay to determine; but, at any rate, there must be equality. Your Lordships had, in the course of last Session, to decide whether you would continue the restriction upon counsel from acting in the County Courts without attorneys, or whether you would leave the etiquette of the profession and the honour of the Bar to maintain things as they have hitherto existed. It so happened that the decision of that question, if I may say so, devolved upon myself. My noble and learned Friends were divided in opinion, two and two, and as the matter was left by the House to the decision of the Law Lords, it necessarily fell to the fifth to give the casting vote, if I may call it so, upon the question. I did give that vote with great reluctance in favour of repealing the law which prohibited counsel from acting without attorneys; but while I did so I took care expressly to state that I gave that vote upon the distinct statement that attorneys had threatened the Bar that if they took business in the County Courts, they should not have business elsewhere. I meant to leave it, therefore, to the honour of the Bar to act as they had always acted, not intending to open the door at all, unless there be an absolute necessity for it, to the practice of barristers acting without the intervention of attorneys—a practice, in my view, highly objectionable, and one which I should be the last person to countenance. Certain barristers, however, I regret to hear, have since then taken upon themselves to decide that they will thus act without attorneys. That is a practice, my Lords, which cannot be too highly reprobated. I am far from saying that, in the present state of the law, the Bar, as a body, may not properly meet and consider what it becomes them in their station to do. But if any such serious change in the long-established usage of the Bar is to be made, it ought at any rate to be made with the concurrence of a large majority; and I entirely object to any small number, or even to any considerable number, taking upon themselves to act contrary to the general rule of the profession, now so long established. My Lords, the Bar at the present moment is in a state of transition, and I would recommend everybody having any voice or any influence in this matter to consider where—if you allow the Bar to lower its own station or dignity—you are to look for learned persons to fill your Benches and carry on the administration of justice.

With respect to the County Courts, my Lords, it is not the intention of Her Majesty's Government at present to propose any change in them. My noble and learned Friend (Lord Brougham) wished for an appointment of a commission of inquiry as to their operation; but I think so many changes have already been made in them by the Legislature that we ought now for a time to leave them alone, especially as there is so much that is useful in other ways to be accomplished.

The same noble and learned Lord will be glad to hear that it is the intention of Her Majesty's Government to proceed with what is called a "Digest of the Criminal Law." Your Lordships are aware that this is a subject which has been very much considered. Two Commissions have been appointed, whose labours have occupied, in the whole, some fifteen years, and have produced thirteen blue books, in which is to be found much valuable information. The country has already expended 40,000*l.* in the acquisition of this information; and it is desirable that that expenditure should not be thrown away. At the same time, Her Majesty's Government do not feel it necessary to renew the Commission: such a step they consider would only lead to expense, delay, and difficulty, and they therefore propose to proceed with measures founded upon the existing reports, which contain abundant and well-considered materials for legislation. I am, as my noble and learned Friend well knows, no friend to codification in general. But, if that principle can be properly applied in any case, it surely may be so in the case of the Criminal Law. Even there, however, we must proceed with much caution, with regard as well to the substance as to the form of the Digest. My noble and learned Friend, I observe from a printed letter of his, seems to think that we should not attempt to improve or alter the subject, but take the propositions as we find them. My Lords, unless we are careful, we may collect a set of bad treatises and give them a binding effect. Valuable treatises are now resorted to by the Judges for information, but they are not bound by them; they can, therefore, extract the principle, and adapt and mould the relief as justice may require. But if effect be given to like treatises as statute-law, the Judges must follow them implicitly, and thus great difficulty will arise: for it would be dangerous to allow the Judges to depart from the rule as digested, and yet without that power it would constantly be found necessary to resort to Parliament to amend the law, than which nothing can be more prejudicial. I propose, therefore, without attempting anything like the Code Napoleon—for it is impossible for us with our system of legislation to revise the law in the manner in which the laws of France were discussed and revised before binding effect was given to the Code—to correct any anomaly or error which we discover, and to make the Digest as accurate in point of law as if we were passing enactments in the ordinary way, although it is manifestly hopeless to expect the same accuracy in all the details of a vast subject as if we were dealing with only a branch of it. It may, after all, be a dangerous experiment, and it must not be considered as a pledge on the part of the Government to proceed beyond the Digest of the Criminal Law. I have, however, the satisfaction of now informing my noble and learned Friend, that, consistently with these views, the first part of such a Digest has been actually prepared in the form of a Bill relating to Offences against the Person. The subject of the Criminal Law is a very large one, and it would be a vain attempt to deal with the whole of it at once, and to pass the entire Digest in one Bill. The subject, therefore, must be broken up into parts to be dealt with in separate Bills. And we propose, as I have said, to begin with Offences against the Person. This course will have the further advantage that it will give an opportunity of introducing those amendments which will, doubtless, be found necessary from time to time, before the several Bills have been gone through. When all the Bills have been passed, I would not consolidate them into one Act, because a very long Act of Parliament is a very great evil; but, on the other hand, it is no less an evil to be obliged to search for different Acts on the same subject, scattered through many volumes of the Statute-book. Therefore, at the end, the course will be to repeal all the Bills which have been enacted, and to re-enact them at one time, with the corrections and amendments, numbering them consecutively, so that they may be found with convenience, following one another in a proper order, in the same volume of the Statutes. In that way you will gain great facility of reference, and will have all the advantages of a single Act of Parliament without its cumbrousness and inconvenience.

The only remaining subject to which I need refer, is the Patent Law Amendment

Act of last Session. Orders have been requisite for the purpose of bringing it into complete operation, and to the issuing of those Orders I and my learned Colleagues the Commissioners are now addressing ourselves.

My Lords, I know that Her Majesty's Government will have the assistance of noble Lords on both sides of the House in maturing and carrying into execution the various measures to which I have referred. Fortunately, they have nothing to do with politics, but relate only to a subject which we all must regard as of paramount importance—the administration of justice. I feel that I owe no apology to your Lordships for the length at which I have detained you, but I must express my gratitude for the patience with which your Lordships have listened to me.

LORD BROUGHAM said, he was quite sure that never was debt of gratitude less due than on the part of his noble and learned Friend; for no one could have listened to him without being fully aware that they must express their gratitude to him, not he to their Lordships. The great variety of the subjects opened, he might say largely discussed, by him, and their importance, their variety, the difficulty of some, the importance of all of them—might well be a reason for his not following him over the field which he had so ably and so learnedly gone over. He must reserve his opinion, as their Lordships also would do, on the subjects touched upon, until the Bills themselves, embodying the suggestions made, were before the House, only he could not entirely concur with his noble and learned Friend on some of the subjects, and he entertained considerable doubt in regard to others; but he would advert to one or two merely by way of sample. As to lunacy, for instance, he had no doubt that the object proposed was highly desirable, but he felt considerable doubt as to the modus operandi. He believed, in the matter of bankruptcy, that great improvement might be effected in the circumstances of those holding the office of official assignee, although it had not been stated how that was proposed to be done; but he gave his noble and learned Friend credit for the course he intended to adopt in respect to those highly useful officers in not filling up vacancies, except so far as the business of the Court required, with a view to an increase of the fund for the relief of those who remained in as official assignees. There was another instance in which he concurred in part, and as to portion differed, from his noble and learned Friend. He had great doubt as to the question respecting certificates. He admitted that the falling-off in bankruptcy business was mainly to be attributed to the establishment of three classes of certificates, and some improvement might possibly be effected in that part of the system; at the same time he affirmed that a more useful improvement never was made than that which was introduced by the establishment of these three classes of certificates in the Act of 1849. This system might be improved—abandoned it never could be. As to the Suitors' Bill which his noble and learned Friend proposed, as it would be doing for the suitor no more than the strictest justice, so it would be a great improvement generally; upon that there could be no doubt. Upon one point he felt gratitude was due from all amenders of the law to his noble and learned Friend. After his long experience of the profession, and now charged with its highest judicial duties, he had recognised the great principle in express terms, that the suitors ought to be enabled to obtain their just rights, when withheld, or to defend them when attacked, without paying taxes of any kind as suitors for the administration of the law—which it was the bounden duty of the Government to provide, not of the unfortunate suitor, it being the condition of the subject's allegiance that he should be protected. There were some other questions upon which he would have made a few remarks, had it not already been so late; but another opportunity would offer when the measures themselves were under the discussion of the House. He was sorry to find his noble and learned Friend avowing he was not a friend of codification; but he hoped his noble and learned Friend would not imagine that his objections could not be satisfactorily and triumphantly answered. He would not refer to those objections which he had urged, further than to say they were old, and had often been answered: suffice it for him to express his great satisfaction that his noble and learned Friend made an exception in favour of the criminal law, whether consistently or not was immaterial. He (Lord Brougham) thought there was no inconsistency, though he knew that some considered the criminal law less fit for a digest than any other branch. In that he did not concur. The course which the noble Lord proposed to adopt upon that, by taking the subject not as a whole but piecemeal, was the same suggested by one of the learned Commissioners, Mr. B. Ker, who some time ago convinced his noble Friend opposite (Lord Lyndhurst) and himself that it was advisable to pass the digest which he (Lord Brougham) had on the report of the Commissioners twice brought in as a Bill, in separate Bills, beginning with the great chapter of Offences against the Person, prefaced, of course, by the preliminary chapter applicable to all offences; and that Procedure should come last. The discussions they had held at the beginning of the recess had led to this opinion, and also to the necessity of having the whole statutes repealed and enacted as one digest, in the manner now proposed (with the numbers running through it). He said he did not despair of seeing his noble and learned Friend come round to the opinions which he and others held upon codification of the law. But there was another subject on which he differed, he feared, yet more widely from his noble and learned Friend—he meant Registration. [The LORD CHANCELLOR: Hear, hear!] However, even here he was not without hope. He had known instances in our history, he would not say at what period, of great changes of opinion on subjects if possible more important—certainly more interesting to the community at large. He recollected, in those passages of history, mention being made of many persons, bodies of men important both from their number and their value, holding very strong opinions on subjects still more exciting than that of cheap law; and after living some few years in these very decided, and even vehement, opinions, all at once coming round to the views he and others held, so that now there really was no difference whatever between them; and, to his unspeakable satisfaction, he found himself ranged at the same side on the very important and interesting, and even exciting, subject of cheap—he would not say what, but he might call it, for the present, cheap law, as if they had never differed about it. He hoped that a like conversion awaited his noble and learned Friend upon the subject of registration, when it should be called for by public opinion, just as the kind of cheap law had been to which he now referred. He could not sit down without expressing his opinion of the great merit of his noble and learned Friend with regard to the measures of last Session;

it would be the height of ingratitude in him, and all desirous of improving the law, were he not to recognise the extraordinary labour—the skilful and learned labour—which he had bestowed in carrying those Bills into execution, and in that labour the self-denial, as to any increase of his patronage, which had prevailed through the whole course of the last autumn's labours, in preparing the orders under the Patent Laws Bill, the Suitors' Bill, and the Masters Abolition Bill. Speaking of the Patent Laws, without the least distrust of his noble and learned Friend proceeding with the measures now announced, he proposed to pursue as to some of them the same course he had taken last Session on the Patent Laws; namely, to present his Bankruptcy Bill and County Courts Extension Bill again, while his noble and learned Friend presented his Bills on those subjects; just as formerly his (Lord Brougham's) Patent Law Bill had been presented along with the Bill of the Government; and their Lordships would see which of the two Bills was best, or prefer, as they did in the Patent Laws, a combination of both. He would therefore bring before their Lordships that part of the County Courts Extension Bill of last year and the year before, which was not passed last Session, but was postponed not to disturb the great Bill for the improvement of the Jurisdiction of the Equity Courts. He would add a third Bill, which was two years ago before them, for extending the Jurisdiction of the County Courts to equitable matters, for it was difficult to justify, and the public were ill reconciled to, a system which suffered them to obtain justice at their own door without delay and at little cost upon rights of one kind, as on one sort of debt or claim, and yet on another kind of debt or claim drove them, not only from their own door, but into the expense and delay of the Court of Chancery. And, lastly, he proposed to lay upon the table a Bill for the further improvement of the law of evidence and procedure, which would contain the following provisions upon that important subject, namely, making competent the evidences of husband and wife—competent and compellable in all cases except criminal trials and adultery, and except in matters communicated by either to the other during coverture; regulating all matters connected with the payment of money into court, and providing that the payment into court should be no admission upon the question at issue; regulating the examination and cross-examination of witnesses with respect to the objection of raising collateral issues; regulating, partly by declaration, partly by enactment, what was known as the rule in the Queen's case, the cross examination of witnesses upon the contents of written documents; depriving witnesses of the protection afforded them at present by law against answering questions where their answers might criminate themselves, and preventing any such answer being given in evidence against them in any prosecution, except for perjury upon those answers. Then as to procedure in all cases between the Crown and the subject, to place them both on the same footing with regard to the right of reply, and other privileges now claimed by the Crown; next, where a party has been acquitted, whether upon a proceeding for penalties, or a criminal procedure, that he should be entitled to his costs against the Crown, subject to the discretion of the Court; and, lastly, to facilitate under the authority of the Court, or a Judge, the change of the venue in criminal cases. He had great doubts whether he ought not to go a step further in dealing with these matters; for it was found in the County Courts that the result was that not three in a hundred of the cases were tried by jury, where either of the parties had the option; and he really felt that in cases of debt and contract, not of tort, it should be left optional with the parties in the Superior Courts, as it was in the County Courts, to try by a jury, or content themselves with the opinion of the Judge. On one subject more he must detain their Lordships. He must express his earnest hope that strenuous efforts would at length be made to prevent bribery and corruption at elections, by some other mode than that now adopted. This could not be done in the two ways proposed for effecting it; it could not be done either by the ballot or by a large increase of the constituent body. As to the ballot, he said he had, he would not say an irremovable objection, but a very great repugnance to it on various grounds. Respecting these, doubts might be entertained, but of one thing he was quite certain—the ballot was no cure for bribery. It would not prevent bribery, but it would prevent prosecution for it. The promise would be given to pay so much if a certain person was elected, and thus every voter taking the bribe would be converted into an agent for the bribing party, as well as being himself a corrupt voter. He also saw no kind of security against bribery in the increase of the constituent body. He was, and ever had been, decidedly favourable to that increase, so it were made upon safe and well-considered principles; and especially if it were so made as to improve the representative body itself; but he expected no benefit from it as regarded the prevention of bribery. It was only when parties were somewhat nearly balanced that bribery was rife—and a few hundreds turned the scale in a very large body of voters. A certain number to turn the scale would be found in a body of 10,000 as well as one of 400 or 500, and these would be the persons bribed. He was, therefore, of opinion that more stringent measures ought to be taken for the prevention of this most pernicious practice. The criminal law against it must be made more severe, and the new law of evidence would, with that increased severity, extirpate the offence, one of the most crying evils of these times. His Lordship then introduced, 1st, a Bill for further amending the Law of Evidence and Procedure; 2nd, a Bill for Extending the Jurisdiction of the County Courts to certain Matters cognizable in the Court of Chancery; 3rd, a Bill further to extend the Jurisdiction of the Judges of the County Courts, and to facilitate Proceedings in the High Court of Chancery; and 4th, a Bill to limit the Jurisdiction of Her Majesty's Court of Bankruptcy, to abolish the Courts of Bankruptcy for the County Districts, and to give to the Judges of the County Courts Jurisdiction in Matters of Arrangement and of Bankruptcy in certain cases; which were severally read a first time, and ordered to be printed.

CASE OF MR. NEWTON AT VERONA.

MR. HUME said, that seeing in his place the noble Lord the Under Secretary of the Foreign Department, he wished to ask the question of which he had given notice. Although it was most desirable that British subjects should be protected in foreign parts, they ought at the same time, when complaints were made, to endeavour to ascertain as fully as possible the circumstances that caused those complaints. In the month of June last a letter was written by the father of the individual to whom the present inquiry had reference, making certain charges against the officials in a public department at Verona; and he (Mr. Hume) begged to ask whether any inquiry had been instituted into the complaints of Mr. Henry Robert Newton, who in June last was arrested in Verona, imprisoned, and treated with great indignity, and all explanation then and there refused; and whether any apology or explanation had been offered by the Austrian Government?

LORD STANLEY: Sir, in answer to the question of the hon. Member, I have to confirm, in the first place, what he has stated, namely, that in the month of June last a British subject of the name of Newton was arrested at Verona, and detained under circumstances of considerable hardship. The circumstances of the case were these: Mr. Newton was arrested on suspicion of sketching the fortifications, he being at the time, as he stated, and as we have reason to believe, not so engaged; but it is fair to say, that the suspicion was not unreasonable, inasmuch as Mr. Newton had at the time a book and map spread open before him. I merely mention these trifling circumstances to show what, indeed, Mr. Newton himself acknowledges, that as regards his original arrest, he has no ground for making any charge against the authorities. The city of Verona was at the time in a state of siege, and there is no reason to suppose that he was treated, so far as the original arrest was concerned, with exceptional harshness or severity. Subsequent to the arrest he was taken to the guard-house, orders were given that his papers should be examined, and that if, on their examination, nothing was found tending to criminate him, he should be set at liberty. These were the orders that were given, but unfortunately they were not obeyed. The search took place, and nothing was found of a criminal character amongst his papers. When the search concluded, it was late in the evening, and by a gross neglect of duty on the part of the officer of police in whose charge Mr. Newton was, instead of releasing him, when nothing was discovered against him, he detained him all night, and did not liberate him until the following morning. Mr. Newton unfortunately, in my opinion, did not immediately proceed to put the case in the hands of the British Consul General at Venice, but preferred applying for redress in person, and without communicating with the Consul. He did not succeed in obtaining any satisfactory explanation from the authorities, and having so failed, he then put his case into the hands of Mr. Dawkins, who took it up with great energy and promptitude. Shortly afterwards complaints were made to the Foreign Office by Sir William Newton, the father of the complainant, and a letter was written by him, dated 16th July, stating the particulars which I have related. Immediately on that letter being received, a full account of the circumstances as they were stated by Sir W. Newton to have occurred, was sent to Lord Westmoreland our Ambassador at Vienna. An inquiry was instituted, and there being some discrepancy between the different accounts, a correspondence of some length took place; but the end of that correspondence has been that a full and ample expression of regret has been obtained from the Austrian Government, accompanied by a promise that, in future, care shall be taken to prevent British travellers from being ill-treated in a similar manner, and to see that the regulations in force in Austria are carried out with no unnecessary hardship on individuals. That expression of regret having been obtained—the original charge of misconduct having been against a subordinate officer, and the promise I have mentioned having been given by the Austrian Government, it was the opinion of Her Majesty's Government that, under the circumstances, nothing more could be expected or required.

THE BOARD OF CUSTOMS.

MR. W. WILLIAMS: I beg to ask the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether it is the intention of the Government to bring in a Bill to carry out the recommendation of the Committee appointed last Session to inquire into the constitution and management of the Board of Customs?

The CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: I have directed the recommendations of the Committee to be submitted to the Commissioners of Customs, and I received their Report—a very elaborate one—only last month. I have very much considered it, and it is the intention of the Government to place a Treasury Minute on the table, which I hope I shall be able to do before Christmas, indicating all those changes that we think ought to take place in the present administration of the Customs, and some of those changes will require legislative interposition.

FUNERAL OF THE DUKE OF WELLINGTON.

SIR CHARLES WOOD brought up the First Report of the Committee appointed to consider the circumstances relating to the attendance of the House and their place at the solemnity of the Duke of Wellington's funeral. It was as follows :—

" Your Committee have examined the Journals touching the proceedings and circumstances relating to the Procession of this House, and their place, on the occasion of public funerals, and they find that, in the year 1694, the House, with the Speaker, attended the Funeral of Her Majesty Queen Mary; that seats were reserved and tickets given to Members, with the Speaker's name, and that of each Member, for his admittance.

" Your Committee also find that in the year 1708 the Speaker was deputed on the part of the House, to present an Address to Her Majesty Queen Anne.

" Your Committee are of opinion, that it would be convenient, on this occasion, that the Speaker should be deputed to attend the Procession on the part of the House, and that the House should attend in the Cathedral Church of Saint Paul, and that the Speaker, when he arrives there, should take his place accordingly.

" Your Committee have examined respecting the arrangements for the accommodation of Members. They find that 500 seats are reserved for Members in front of the North Transept.

" Your Committee recommend that each Member should be furnished with a ticket of admittance with his name, and that the same should be distributed to Members, under the direction of Mr. Speaker."

Report to lie on the table.

CORONER'S INQUEST (SIX-MILE BRIDGE).

SIR JOHN F. FITZGERALD: Sir, as one of the representatives of the county where this sad event took place, I deem it a duty I owe not only to my constituents, but to the wives, children, and relatives of the unfortunate men who were slain at Six-mile Bridge, to move "for a Report of the evidence given before the coroner's inquest, held at Six-mile Bridge, in the county of Clare, in July last." I do so particularly at this moment, when I observe it is the intention of both the Attorney General and Solicitor General of Ireland to endeavour to quash the verdict of the jury, which verdict was one of wilful murder against a magistrate, and against eight soldiers who fired upon the people without receiving orders to do so, or without the Riot Act being read, and thus causing the bloody and untimely death of six of Her Majesty's subjects on the spot, and one who died subsequently of the wounds he received. This attempt on the part of the Attorney General and Solicitor General of Ireland to quash the verdict of the coroner's jury, has, I fear, an ulterior object, which is, that when the bill of indictment against the magistrate and the eight soldiers, for their trial at the next assizes of the county, is presented, it will render such presentment void, and thereby destroy the only hope of consolation left to those bereaved families, that the perpetrators of so fatal an act should be brought before the courts of justice, to answer the charge ordered against them by the coroner's jury—that of wilful murder. I understand that the plea set forth by the Attorney General and Solicitor General of Ireland, to quash the verdict, is, that the persons of the soldiers who fired the shots at Six-mile Bridge, on the 22nd of July last, were not sufficiently identified. This attempt, I must say, is a most severe and unjust reflection upon a jury, composed of men among the most respectable in the county, and who, regardless of every inconvenience they were put to in a small village, as to the accommodation, delayed their verdict till they had heard all the evidence, and the learned arguments of the counsel on both sides for nearly one fortnight. The next point of argument to which I wish to call the attention of the House is as to what business the soldiers had to be present in any shape or way at an election? The election law is clear and precise on this matter. Roger's election law on interfering at elections, says—

" ' From the first establishment of a standing army the jealousy of the House of Commons has been directed to prevent any military interference at elections, or overawing them by their presence. Thus the House of Commons resolved that all elections of any knight or shire, or burgess, to serve in Parliament be made without interruption or molestation by any commander, governor, officer, or soldier.'—17th November, 1645, 4 Journ. 316. Again, 24th, Journ. 37, 22nd December, 1741: 'That the presence of a regular body of soldiers at an election of Members to serve in Parliament is a high infringement of the liberties of the subject, a manifest violation of the freedom of elections, and an open defiance of the laws and constitution of the Kingdom.' "

This resolution was passed in consequence of the proceedings at the Westminster election in 1741. The Westminster justices were ordered into custody and reprimanded by Speaker Onslow, for unnecessarily calling in the military. The concluding part of his address was as follows :—

"What you have done is against one of the most essential parts of the law of this Kingdom. Had any real necessity been shown for it? There might be fears—there might be some danger—but did you try the strength of the law to dispel those fears and remove those dangers? Did you make use of those powers the law invested you with, as civil magistrates, for the preservation of the public peace? No; you deserted all that, and wantonly, and I hope inadvertently, resorted to that force, the most unnatural of all others, in all respects, to that cause and business you were then attending, and for the freedom of which every Briton ought to be ready to suffer anything."

See also debate on this subject, April 3, 1827, on the occasion of calling out the military at Carlisle. The whole of the proceedings of the Government in this most calamitous event have been most extraordinary, and might well cause the excitement which did prevail during the last elections in Ireland. But let me ask what raised those excitements? The illegal acts of the Government, infringing on the liberties of the subject, a manifest violation of the freedom of elections, by employing soldiers for the purpose of overawing them, in direct opposition to the law and constitution of this country. Finally, I must draw a contrast as to the manner the Government pursue in this country (England) and in Ireland, in the instance I now submit to the House. Here are a magistrate and eight soldiers, against whom a verdict of wilful murder is given by a coroner's jury. They are imprisoned to answer for so very serious a charge at the next assizes; but what do the Government legal authorities in Ireland? Bail is taken, and the magistrate and the eight soldiers are liberated. Now, mark the different line of conduct pursued here in a similar case. Two foreigners are imprisoned for being implicated in a fatal duel; their counsel makes an appeal for their being liberated on bail, and an instance is brought forward of bail being granted on similar events. What said the Chief Justice of England?—

"He was firmly of opinion that if a person of the highest eminence was found guilty of murder by a jury, no tribunal of the country would liberate him without trial."

Now, Sir, all I ask—all I pray for—is, that a trial may be granted to have this melancholy event thoroughly investigated. It is due to the people of Ireland—it is due to the bereaved families of the unfortunate men who were so inhumanly shot; and, above all, it is due to justice. I therefore move for the report of the evidence given before the Coroner's inquest, held at Six-mile Bridge, in the county of Clare, in July last.

Sir J. F. Fitzgerald

MR. NAPIER: Sir, there will be no objection to lay the evidence in this case on the table of the House when the proper time arrives; but at present the proceedings are under the consideration of the Court of Queen's Bench, and that Court has not yet given its decision. But judgment will probably be pronounced in a few days, and then the evidence can be furnished. With regard, however, to the observations of the hon. and gallant Member upon the conduct of the Government, I may be permitted to say that the Government had nothing to do with the calling out of the military. They were called out, as is usual, on the requisition of a magistrate of the county, who has shared in the fate of the soldiers, and who, by this very respectable Coroner's jury, has been declared guilty of wilful murder. Sir, before the proceedings of the inquest were laid before me, the soldiers had been committed to the gaol of the county on the Coroner's warrant, and the depositions then came up and were laid before me in the usual course; for whenever any person has been committed on a capital charge the course is to lay the papers before the Attorney General, in order to see whether he makes any objection on the part of the Crown to the parties being admitted to bail. The Crown does not interfere further than this. Whenever parties apply to the Court of Queen's Bench in these matters, the Court is always greatly influenced by the circumstance whether the Law Officers of the Crown have given or refused their assent to the motion to admit to bail. On receiving the depositions I felt it to be my duty not to lose a single moment in applying myself to them, and I read them twice over—an occupation which took me eight hours. I read them through before I went to bed, and I read them again the next morning, and having considered them, I felt it to be my duty to state my opinion that these parties should be admitted to bail. Judge Crampton, after hearing counsel for the next of kin of the persons killed, himself considered the depositions; and he, in pursuance of the authority vested in him as a Judge of the Queen's Bench, made an order admitting the parties to bail—a course for which he had, and has, my full concurrence. I may state, with reference to the case having been brought before the Court of Queen's Bench, that that Court was the Supreme Coroner of the Kingdom, and had the auperintendence of all the Coroners throughout the country. The course I took met the entire concurrence of my colleague, the Solicitor General, who argued the case in the Queen's Bench in my absence; and as the case is now pending, of course it would be highly improper for me to offer one word of comment, one way or the other. With regard to a bill of indictment, I may observe that seldom is the course, even supposing there was no objection to the Coroner's inquisition, to proceed upon that. With hardly one exception, the practice is to send up a bill of indictment, and not act on the Coroners' inquisition; for experience has invariably shown that Coroners' inquisitions obstruct rather than promote the ends of public justice. But whether the inquisition be quashed or not, that will not interfere with a bill of indictment being sent up, and a proceeding is now pending against a newspaper, in which the very question of the hon. and gallant Baronet will be settled. It is to be tried in the sittings after term, and the subject is likely to receive in the Court of Queen's Bench, and before a jury in the city of Dublin, a very full investigation. Throughout these proceedings I have endeavoured, and I shall continue to endeavour, to do my duty; and whilst I am resolved to bring to justice all who have violated the law, and against whom I can procure evidence, I am equally resolved to afford the shelter of the law and constitution to those who have, as I believe, discharged faithfully a most invidious duty under the most harassing and oppressive circumstances. When judgment has been pronounced, the evidence shall be laid on the table.

COUNTY ELECTIONS POLLS.

LORD ROBERT GROSVENOR begged to move for leave to bring in a Bill to restrict the duration of polling for County Elections in England and Wales. It would be in the recollection of the House that at the close of the last Parliament he had moved for leave to bring in a Bill to restrict the days of polling in Counties from two days to one, and that Bill had obtained a first and second reading, and had passed through Committee. The Government, however, had thrown out the measure on the third reading, not because they objected to the principle of it, but because it was contended that the time intervening before the general election was so short that opportunity could not be afforded for the new arrangements. He now moved for leave to bring in a similar Bill, not anticipating any objection on the part of the Government; but he might observe that he intended to carry restriction and reform a little further than in the previous measure. He proposed to reduce the days of polling from two days to one, and the period that elapsed between the nomination and the day of polling from two to one. He proposed also that the declaration of the poll should take place one day after the polling.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That leave be given to bring in the Bill."

MR. PALMER did not rise to oppose the Motion, but he would observe that there was a considerable difference between this Bill and the one of last year. He acquiesced in the Bill of last year with some degree of doubt. He had had some little experience of county elections, and was very much inclined to think that it would be undesirable to adopt the proposition of the noble Lord. At times it would be exceedingly inconvenient to pin down the electors to one day. He would give an instance in his own county, where a poll was demanded without any one expecting it, and it happened that on one of the polling-days an important fair was held in the neighbourhood, which many of the voters were very anxious to attend, and consequently were incapacitated from performing their electoral duties. He had conversed with many of the electors on this subject, and they were of opinion that the change might be attended with considerable inconvenience.

MR. HUME would say, that the cases mentioned by the hon. Gentleman might easily be provided for by the sheriffs not fixing upon inconvenient days. The sheriffs ought to know when fairs took place, and not fix such days for polling.

MR. WALPOLE said, he thought that, seeing leave was given by the last Parliament to bring in a Bill somewhat similar to this, and that it even went to the third reading, it would be ungracious towards the noble Lord the Member for Middlesex to refuse him leave to bring in the present Bill. There were two points, however, he wished the House to bear in mind: the first was, that the objection taken on the part of the Government to the Bill of last Session was, that a sufficient opportunity was not given to Counties to provide polling places, so that every voter should have an opportunity of recording his vote. It was a matter of great importance that provision should be made for enabling all the votes in every County to be taken. The other point was, that the noble Lord was now going to add to the Bill a new provision, namely, that the period between the nomination and the day of the polling should be reduced from two days to one. He thought that was a matter which would require great consideration. They must remember that there was a great difference between boroughs and counties in that respect. In the boroughs the voters were all living either within the bounds or in the neighbourhood; but in counties the voters had their residence sometimes at a great distance, and assuredly every portion of a County ought to have an opportunity of knowing whether more than one candidate had been put up on the day of nomination, in order that the voters might have an opportunity of coming up and recording their votes. He only pointed out these things in order that the noble Lord might have no reason to complain, should he find the Government opposing the Bill when it was brought forward.

LORD ROBERT GROSVENOR said, that he thought that, whenever the discussion came on, he should be able to satisfy the House that the further changes he proposed were necessary.

ROCHESTER CONSISTORY COURT, &c.

SIR BENJAMIN HALL said, he rose to move for a return of the appointment of Officers in the Consistory Court, Rochester, and also in the Archdeacon's Court in the same city. He apprehended there would be little or no objection to his Motion; but, inasmuch as the dignity and character of that House was in some measure concerned, he would state the reasons which had induced him to put the notice upon the paper. On the 2nd May, 1850, that House resolved that an Address should be presented to Her Majesty, praying Her Majesty that certain returns might be made in reference to the Ecclesiastical Courts; and he was informed by the officers connected with the Government of that day, that they had the very greatest difficulty in obtaining the papers from the Officers of those Courts—so much so, that thirteen months elapsed before they were presented to the House. Another Address was agreed to by the House on the 7th August, 1851, praying Her Majesty to order that certain further returns might be made in reference to the same Courts; and similar difficulties had been experienced in obtaining those returns from some of the Courts, whilst others of them had made no return whatever. The fact was that some of these returns were not made until the 10th of May, 1852, exactly nine months after they had been called for by the House. He thought that when an order was made by that House, either through the medium of an Address to the Crown, or directly by the House, the persons to whom such order was sent ought to obey it. And no return having been made by the Ecclesiastical Courts of Rochester, he had no hesitation in submitting this Motion to the House, in order that the information in question might be obtained. He would also take that opportunity of stating that should that order not be complied with, he should take further steps to compel a compliance with it.

MR. WALPOLE said, a return had been laid on the table of the House with the fullest information on the subject of the Ecclesiastical Courts of which the Government were in possession; and he could account for the absence of the returns of which the hon. Baronet complained only in this way. Several returns of that kind had been moved for by the hon. Baronet, and the officers thinking they had already made those returns in full, had neglected to continue the returns which were subsequently asked for. He was further informed that a return which had been moved for by the hon. Baronet in 1849, was presented to the House, and that the hon. Baronet never moved that it should be printed. If the hon. Gentleman would now move to have that return printed, he would gain from it fuller information than he could have from the return which he now asked for.

SIR B. HALL said, he apprehended that the right hon. Gentleman was under a mistake. During the Session of 1849, he (Sir B. Hall) was unable to attend the House except on one day; he had not made any Motion on the subject except in the years to which he had referred, and the officers of the Ecclesiastical Court of Rochester had made no return whatever to those Motions.

Motion agreed to.

DAY MAIL TO LEICESTER.

MR. FREWEN said, that the House was doubtless aware, from the statements which had recently appeared in the public prints, that great injury had been done to certain lines of railway within the last few days, in consequence of the heavy rains, and in certain districts great inconvenience was occasioned, not only by the stopping of the regular communications, but also by the delay of the usual mails. It appeared to him that there was some want of proper caution on the part of the Post Office authorities in not forwarding the mails with that expedition which they might have used; for even though some of the great lines had been damaged, the mails should have been forwarded in the old way—by the turnpike roads—until they had reached such parts of the railway as might be made available for communicating with the metropolis. During the last week several lines of railway in the Midland Counties were, he believed, stopped, in consequence of the damage that was done to them. At one place in particular within about four or five miles of Leicester a viaduct was carried away, which was not likely to be restored for about a fortnight or three weeks. The greatest inconvenience had arisen, in consequence, to the people of Leicester, from the non-adoption of proper measures for the forwarding of the mails by some other route. He knew himself of letters containing intelligence of the deepest importance and interest, posted in Leicester on Friday, not reaching London until Monday morning. The day mail, which was forwarded from London on Saturday morning, did not reach Leicester until seven o'clock in the evening. Now where there was another line open, the mails might have been conveyed at almost the same degree of speed with which they were forwarded for many years past. He was informed that the great line of communication near Tamworth had been stopped by an injury which had occurred to a bridge in the neighbourhood. He wished to call public attention to the subject, and more particularly to urge that everything should be done to facilitate the conveyance of the mails. He should conclude by moving that the Postmaster General be requested to order that the day mail between London and Leicester should be conveyed by way of Peterborough, Stamford, and Melton Mowbray, until the line of railway between Leicester and Rugby (which has been stopped in consequence of the injury done to it, caused by the late heavy rains) be re-opened.

MR. G. A. HAMILTON said, he was sure that the House would not agree in the terms of this Motion when he informed them that the fact was, the Post Office authorities had used the greatest possible exertions to expedite the conveyance of the mails. He had just received a communication which stated that the day mail from Leicester had arrived on that day without the delay of a single hour. Under such circumstances he thought that the hon. Gentleman would not think it necessary to persevere in his Motion.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

INDIAN TERRITORIES.

MR. HERRIES moved that the Select Committee on Indian Territories do consist of thirty-one Members.

SIR HENRY WILLOUGHBY begged to suggest that the name of Sir Thomas Herbert Maddock be added to the Committee, as the hon. Member was thoroughly conversant with the subject, having resided for several years in India.

MR. JOHN MACGREGOR said, he had intended to move the addition of two or three names to the Committee, in order that the great commercial ports might be represented; but when he saw the names of the eminent persons nominated, he thought it unnecessary to persist in that intention.

MR. HUME said, he thought that all the new Members of the Committee should be put into possession of the whole evidence which had come before the former Committee on this subject. He wished to know whether any steps had been taken by the Government towards effecting this object?

SIR THOMAS MADDOCK said, he would also beg to suggest that natives of India capable of affording valuable information to the Select Committee should be summoned to give evidence before it. He was aware that among the educated inhabitants there was a large proportion of Hindoos who were precluded by the prejudices of caste from undertaking a sea voyage. But there were many who would not be so precluded could give evidence before the Committee; and he imagined with respect to the others that there could be no serious difficulty in obtaining the testimony of those Hindoo gentlemen of attainments and qualifications on the spot in India. That was the more important, because the evidence that had already been given, and the evidence which would in all probability be taken by the present Committee, had been and would be derived from persons who had been officially engaged in the administration of the affairs of India, whether in this country or in that. It might be very useful that the evidence of all experienced persons should be made available for laying down the plan so far as concerned the machinery of Government; but in reference to all those matters which had regard to the welfare and happiness of the people of India, on which it was really the great primary duty of the Government in this country to legislate, their legislation could not be either complete or satisfactory unless the class of natives of India to whom he had referred were furnished with an opportunity of giving evidence before the Committee.

MR. HERRIES said, with reference to the suggestion of the hon. Member for Montrose (Mr. Hume), the best mode of proceeding would be to leave the matter to the Committee themselves, who would know what was necessary for the requirements of the House; and with regard to the observations which had fallen from the hon. Member for Rochester (Sir T. Madock), it would be the duty of the Committee to determine what witnesses they should bring before them, and what evidence bearing upon the inquiry it would be desirable to have.

Motion for nominating the Committee was then agreed to.

FUNERAL OF THE DUKE OF WELLINGTON.

On the Order of the Day for going into Committee of Supply,

MR. HUME said, before the Order of the Day was proceeded with, he wished to state that he had made a request on a former night, that some estimate of the expenses of the funeral of the Duke of Wellington should be laid upon the table of the House. He found, upon referring to the journals of the House, that an estimate was laid on the table by Mr. Vansittart of the expenses of the funeral of Lord Nelson, and also of that of Mr. Pitt. The House was not sitting at the time of Lord Nelson's funeral, and therefore the estimate was not laid on the table until after the occasion; but as the House was now sitting, they ought to have an estimate laid before them. Not that he was desirous to abridge or to throw any difficulty in the way of a public demonstration, but they ought to relieve and disabuse the public mind of the extravagant ideas that had been formed as to the amount of the expense. The department upon whom the trust was devolved should be prepared to lay before them an estimate in some degree approximating to the amount.

The CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, he had not forgotten the intimation given some days ago by his hon. Friend the Member for Montrose, but, from the pressure of circumstances connected with this solemnity, it was quite impossible to lay an estimate before the House.

MR. HUME said, that if the public money could not be accounted for, it appeared to him there must be great blame somewhere.

The CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, his hon. Friend had greatly misconstrued what he had stated, in supposing that the public money could not be accounted for. If the public money were expended in this manner, it would be accounted for to the last shilling; but, from the pressure of circumstances, it was impossible at the present moment to lay an estimate before the House.

LORD DUDLEY STUART thought the House had heard a most extraordinary statement from the Chancellor of the Exchequer, and that they had been treated in a most extraordinary way by the refusal given to the request of his hon. Friend that an estimate should be laid on the table of the House. With regard to the expenses of the funeral of the late Duke of Wellington, all persons in the country were unanimous in wishing, by every possible means, to testify their respect for the memory of that great and illustrious man; but he did not think that respect would in any degree be diminished by the constitutional course of giving to that House, who held the purse strings of the country, an estimate of the probable expense attending the solemnity of Thursday. They all recollected the letter addressed by the Prime Minister to the Home Secretary on the occasion of the death of the Duke. In that letter, which he thought most admirable, and he believed was generally so considered, the reason given for delaying the funeral from what appeared to be the natural time, shortly after the death of the illustrious hero, was, that it would be better and more constitutional to delay it until Parliament should be assembled, in order that Parliament might give its consent and approbation to the manner in which it was to be performed. He was sorry to see that the proceeding of the Government on this occasion appeared to be like some other of their modes of proceeding—not characterised by much sincerity, but to be something of a deceptive character. ["Oh, oh!"] The Prime Minister was for waiting until Parliament could be consulted, and express its opinion on the subject. But had Parliament been consulted as to the arrangement or expense of this great national solemnity? On the contrary, everything had been done by prerogative. All the orders had been given and the expense incurred, and now the House of Commons, after being thus bamboozled—["Oh, oh!"]—was left without information, and had no alternative but to wait until after the expenses were incurred. ["Oh, oh!"] It was all very well for the adherents of the Ministry to cry "Oh, oh!" but he was sure the people were with him, and having to pay the bill, they would say the Government had done wrong in not being prepared to answer the appeal so properly made by his hon. Friend.

Mr. S. CARTER said, he should be wanting in his duty to his constituents if he did not protest against the doctrine of the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer. The right hon. Gentleman had delayed the funeral solemnity for more than two months for the purpose of consulting Parliament, and yet was not now prepared to say whether the expenses would be 10,000*l.* or 100,000*l.*, or whether, as some people said, they would amount to a quarter of a million. It seemed a somewhat invidious and ungracious task to address the House on that subject. But he was bound to say he felt last night he had not done his duty to his own conscience, in not having stood up when the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer poured out, in well-turned periods, his eulogium on the Duke of Wellington, and resisted that which he (Mr. S. Carter) felt to be a national folly—for he could only term a national funeral a national folly. The right hon. Gentleman said the feelings of a great people could only find vent in a splendid pageant. If that was the only way in which they could express their feelings, it would be far better, in his opinion, not to express them at all. He thought it would have been much more to the credit of that House and of the country if the money expended on that funeral had been applied to some object of public usefulness, rather than for the pageantry, parade, and pomp of a public funeral. He thought all this wore the aspect of impiety—it was man paying almost idolatrous worship to the clay of his fellow worm. He had availed himself of his privilege as a Member of that House to witness the ceremony of the lying in state. He did so from no idle curiosity, but for the purpose of observation and reflection; but he confessed, when he looked upon all its pomp, the feeling in his mind was only one of deep disgust, to see the clay of a departed man hung round with all those emblems of heraldry, with jewellery and emblazonments, as if in mockery, and all to do honour to a being who was placed beyond the honour of this world, and could receive it no more, but who, perhaps, had received more in his lifetime than any man of this or any other age. It was nothing more than a solemn mockery. The late Duke was now beyond the power of praise or the incense they might choose to bestow, therefore the pageant was a mockery, and ought to be put down. [Cries of "Oh!"] Gentlemen might cry "Oh!" but they would find it impossible to oh him down. The pageant could only be justified on one of two grounds: first, upon the plea that it was a tribute to the dead; and, secondly, upon the allegation that it would be a benefit to the living. Now, he denied that it was in the power of that House to confer any honour upon the dead, and he also denied that it was likely to confer any benefit upon the living. The eulogists of the Duke of Wellington told them that his virtues were too great for imitation. They told them that he was the greatest man of a great age, and to a certain extent debarred emulation. The only thing which the pageant would do, in his opinion, would be to stimulate the military spirit of the people, and make militiamen come forward, and also foster in the minds of the poorer classes the love for expensive funerals, a folly to which they were already too prone. He must again protest against Government taking a carte blanche for the expense, and then coming to the people and saying the bill must be paid, as the debt had been incurred. He had not that confidence in hon. Gentlemen opposite; he had not that confidence in any Government, and although they might not spend more money than the Whigs, if in power, his want of confidence was an additional reason for this protest.

Motion agreed to.

SUPPLY.

House in Committee of Supply.

The CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER moved that Mr. Wilson Patten take the Chair of the Committee.

MR. HUME seconded the Motion. He was not aware that there was any person better qualified for the office than the hon. Gentleman, whose devotion to the business of the House had been unceasing; and although he (Mr. Hume) regretted the loss from that House of his hon. Friend the late Member for Rochester (Mr. Bernal), still he did not consider that they could have a better chairman than Mr. Wilson Patten.

MR. WILSON PATTEN (having taken the Chair), read the following extract from the Queen's Speech:—

"The advancement of the Fine Arts and of Practical Science will be readily recognised by you as worthy of the attention of a great and enlightened nation. I have directed that a comprehensive scheme shall be laid before you, having in view the promotion of these objects, towards which I invite your aid and co-operation."

The hon. Gentleman then read the following from the Address in reply:—

"To assure Her Majesty that we readily recognise that the advancement of the Fine Arts and of Practical Science is worthy of a great and enlightened nation; and to thank Her Majesty for having given directions that a comprehensive scheme shall be laid before us, having in view the promotion of these objects, to which Her Majesty invites our aid and co-operation."

The CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER then moved that a Supply be granted to Her Majesty.

MR. HUME would remind the Committee that they were not bound by the passage of the Royal Speech just read, to the adoption of any specific scheme for the purpose mentioned; for when the question should come before the House for discussion, it would be his duty to submit a plan for their consideration very different from that which he had understood was suggested, and which, he thought, would be the means of their availing themselves of public property for the purpose, without coming unnecessarily upon the public funds.

The CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, due notice would be given for taking that paragraph of Her Majesty's Speech into consideration.

COLONEL SIBTHORP wished to express, on the part of some hon. Gentlemen connected with the militia, their discontent that some measures had not been adopted for their attendance, by a deputation, at the solemn ceremony of Thursday next.

Motion agreed to; Resolution to be reported To-morrow. House resumed.

MR. VILLIERS' MOTION.

The CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, he did not know whether the hon. Member for Wolverhampton (Mr. Villiers) was present, but if he was not, perhaps some hon. Friend of his was who could give him an answer. He (the Chancellor of the Exchequer) had yesterday expressed an opinion that it would be convenient to the House that the terms of the Motion of which the hon. Member had given notice, should be communicated to the House at as early a period as possible. He had expected that yesterday they would have been furnished with its terms; but they had not, and now another day had elapsed and the terms of the Motion had not been placed before the House. To-morrow (Wednesday) the House would only meet for a morning sitting, when it was not usual to communicate such Motions of importance to the House. On Thursday the House would not meet at all, and unless they were furnished that night with the terms of the Motion, they could not have them before Friday, if even then they might count on possessing them. He was sure the hon. Gentleman or some of his Friends would answer this inquiry. But hon. Gentlemen must feel that a Motion of that kind ought not, as far as its expressions were concerned, to be kept from their knowledge.

MR. SPEAKER then put the question that the House do now adjourn.

SIR ROBERT H. INGLIS said, that before the House adjourned he begged to take the occasion of his hon. Friend the Member for North Lancashire (Mr. Wilson Patten) being placed in the Chair of the Committees of the House, to advert to a subject which he had on a former occasion brought before the House. The House had enjoyed the services of its Speakers for an unusually long time without a single day's interruption of the proceedings. During the last seventy years, there had been but two occasions on which the illness of the Speaker had caused an interruption to the proceedings of the House, and then two subsequent occasions on which the Speaker, on account of the death of a near relative, had been obliged to absent himself. But, with these exceptions, the attendance of the Speaker had been unin-interrupted. However, they could not always rely upon the continuance of such unbroken services; and it was obvious that the absence of the Speaker from illness or any other cause, without there being any person to supply his place, might occur at a crisis of our history when it might be of vital importance to the constitution of the country that the House should be sitting. It was in the recollection of many that the suspension of the Habeas Corpus Act being deemed necessary, that measure was on one occasion passed, he believed, through all its stages on one day. If, at the period of such necessity, Mr. Speaker had been ill, there could have been no House; and a Bill essential to the welfare, and even to the safety, of the State, could not have become law. No provision had been made for the appointment of a Speaker under those circumstances, and he now submitted both to the present leader of the House, and those hon. Gentlemen on the opposite side who had lately formed the Administration, whether it were not expedient to provide for such a contingency. The details of such a provision he would not presume to specify; but he thought they might obviate the difficulty by appointing two Privy Councillors on each side of the House, who, in case of any contingency such as he had referred to, might supply, as far as it was in the power of man to supply, the loss which the House and the country would sustain by the absence of the right hon. Gentleman in the Chair. If that were a fit suggestion to make, he thought it better to make it at a time when there was little likelihood that they would be deprived of the advantages of the Speaker's presence.

The House adjourned at half-after Six o'clock.

HOUSE OF LORDS,

Wednesday, November 17, 1852.

EXTENSION OF THE SUFFRAGE.

LORD BROUGHAM said, that he was under the necessity of setting himself right with their Lordships respecting what he found some of them had misunderstood in his observations last night upon the extension of the suffrage. One of his noble Friends supposed that he had expressed his opinion against all extension. Most probably he had made his statement indistinctly. He had, as his noble and learned Friend the Lord Chancellor was aware, been fatigued by attending a very important meeting respecting the commercial laws, and had come to the House thence. His noble Friend, not now present, who misunderstood him (being of a different opinion) expressed his satisfaction. But he (Lord Brougham) had said the very reverse of what he was supposed to have said. He had said that he was for an extension of the suffrage by all safe and expedient means, but that his reason for it was not because it would prevent bribery and corruption. He held that it could have no such effect, because, however numerous the constituents of any place were, there would be found among them a certain number capable of taking bribes when the contest ran near, which bribery supposed it to do—a number sufficient to turn the election, and so there would be bribery. As to the ballot, he had still an opinion against it on other grounds; but on one ground, usually given in its favour—its tendency to prevent bribery—he saw no benefit whatever that could result from it. It would prevent prosecution for bribery; but it would lead to bribery in another form—namely, promises to pay on the event of the election, and thus convert each person bribed into an agent of bribery. He wished to add, respecting one of the Bills presented by him last night—the only one entirely new, that on Evidence and Procedure—that he should, before he went abroad, leave not only an abstract of it carefully prepared, but also a full note of all the cases at law referring to the matter of each clause, which would be found convenient in the examination of the various proposed alterations of the law.

FUNERAL OF THE DUKE OF WELLINGTON.

LORD REDESDALE brought up the Second Report of the Select Committee appointed to consider the circumstances relating to the attendance of this House and their place at the solemnity of the funeral of Field Marshal the late Duke of Wellington:—

“That the Committee had again met, and further recommend, That the Lord Chancellor, as representing this House, do attend in his Parliament Robes.

“Arrangements have been made by which the Departure of the Lords who propose to proceed to the Cathedral by Water may be deferred to a later hour than that mentioned in the First Report.

"The Committee recommend that such Lords should come to the House at Ten o'clock, as the Steamboat must leave the Esplanade at half-past Ten o'clock precisely. Arrangements have been made with the City Police to keep the Passage clear from Paul's Wharf to Paul's Chain; the Lords to enter at the Southern Door of the West Front of the Cathedral. The Steamboat will be in attendance at the Close of the Ceremony, and every Facility will be afforded to enable the Lords availing themselves of that means of Return to leave the Cathedral early.

"The Lords who desire to come to the House in their Carriages will proceed by Stanhope Street Gate, or Gates North of it, into Hyde Park, through Albert Gate and by Belgrave Square and Victoria Street, to the House of Lords. Lords on Foot will have every Facility afforded them by the Police in approaching the House on producing their Tickets.

"The Committee recommend that Seats in the back Row of the Lords Gallery be reserved for Peers eldest Sons."

Ordered to be printed.

Moved to resolve—

"That the Lord Chancellor, as representing this House, do attend in his Parliament Robes."

On Question, agreed to.

Then it was moved to resolve, "That Seats in the back Row of the Lords Gallery be reserved for Peers eldest Sons."

On Question, agreed to.

House adjourned to Friday next.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

Wednesday, November 17, 1852.

MORTALITY ON THE COAST OF AFRICA.

MR. H. HERBERT said, that a report had appeared in a newspaper stating that all the officers on board the ship Dover on the African station had been carried off by disease. He wished to know whether the Admiralty had received any intelligence on the subject?

MR. STAFFORD said, he was happy to state to the House that no confirmation of the report in question had reached the Admiralty, and, indeed, the advices which had been received from the African station would lead to the belief that the rate of mortality was below the average. Admiral Bruce had sent a report to the Admiralty on the mortality prevailing on the African station from the 1st of July, 1851, to the 30th of June, 1852, from which he would take the liberty of reading the following passage:—

"Their Lordships will observe, that among the squadron on the west coast of Africa, from July, 1851, to June, 1852, the ratio of mortality from disease has been 16.2 per 1,000 of the mean force employed, an average which, judging from previous years, is below what we might have anticipated, particularly when we consider the arduous nature of the service performed on the station for the twelve months embraced in the return. I cannot help thinking that the fortunate result is, under Providence, in some measure owing to my having made it a rule to change the stations of the ships whose crews were subject to any extraordinary exposure, but more particularly is it attributable to the use of quinine wine, the skill of the medical officers, and the careful attention of the commanders to the general sanitary condition of their respective ships."

MR. VILLIERS' MOTION.

MR. WILSON said, he had been requested by his hon. Friend the Member for Wolverhampton (Mr. C. Villiers) to lay before the House the precise terms of the Motion which he intended to make on the 23rd instant. The Motion would be as follows:—

"That it is the opinion of this House that the improved condition of the Country, and particularly of the Industrious Classes, is mainly the result of recent Commercial Legislation, and especially of the Act of 1846, which established the free admission of Foreign Corn; and that that Act was a wise, just, and beneficial measure:

"That it is the opinion of this House that the maintenance and further extension of the policy of Free Trade, as opposed to that of Protection, will best enable the property and industry of the Nation to bear the burthens to which they are exposed, and will most contribute to the general prosperity, welfare, and contentment of the people:

"That this House is ready to take into its consideration any measures consistent with the principles of these Resolutions which may be laid before it by Her Majesty's Ministers."

CORONERS' INQUESTS (IRELAND).

SIR JOHN YOUNG said, he begged to address a question to the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General for Ireland. In the course of his observations on the previous evening, that right hon. and learned Gentleman had made some remarks upon the course of public justice. Now, he (Sir J. Young) believed there was a general opinion abroad and in that House that the office of Coroner in Ireland required an entire remodelling, and he wished to ask whether it was intended to put this office upon a new footing?

MR. NAPIER: Sir, with regard to the subject matter of this question, and with regard to other matters also, I may state that at the request of the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland I have had under my consideration the various matters which it is conceived offer an obstruction to criminal procedure in that country. The subject of Coroners' Inquests is an important one; and upon that question I may state that I am preparing measures which I intend to submit to his Excellency. With regard to any immediate measure in connexion with Coroners' Inquests, I think it would be more correct not to bring forward any measure until proceedings which are now pending are brought to a close. But it is my intention to submit a very definite plan for correcting the evil, and which, I trust, will be found satisfactory. I think, with others, that these Coroners' proceedings entail a large expense on the country, and at the same time obstruct the course of public justice.

FREIGHT MONEY (GREENWICH HOSPITAL).

SIR GEORGE PECHELL said, he felt himself called upon to condemn the practice of allowing officers in the Navy freight-money for bringing bullion from South America; and as a preliminary to an alteration of the present system, he would beg to move for a Return of the several sums of Freight Money received by the Treasurer of Greenwich Hospital since the 17th day of February, 1851, with the date of such payments, and whether on public or private account; also the name of the ship or vessel in which the treasure was conveyed, and of the captain or officer commanding the same.

MR. STAFFORD said, that the proposition of the hon. and gallant Member was one that would go to diminish the emoluments of the naval service. The hon. and gallant Member's plan, he understood, was to the effect that the senior officers should be passed over, and a portion of the freight given to their juniors in the service. This, he believed, would have the effect of taking away a source of ambition from the senior officers. The present system worked, on the whole, well; and he might state that the present Government had not received a single complaint as to the freight since they came into office. He would not, however, withhold the Return which the hon. and gallant Member asked for; but he thought it would be more satisfactory that he should bring forward some substantive Motion on the subject, than merely asking for Returns which could lead to nothing.

Motion agreed to.

FUNERAL OF THE DUKE OF WELLINGTON,

SIR CHARLES WOOD brought up the Second Report of the Select Committee appointed to consider the circumstances relating to the attendance of the House at the solemnity of the funeral of the Duke of Wellington. The Committee reported that they had proceeded further to inquire respecting the most convenient mode by which Members could proceed to St. Paul's Cathedral, and they stated that arrangements had been made for steamboats to be in waiting at the river esplanade in front of the House at half-past ten o'clock in the morning of Thursday, to convey Members to St. Paul's Wharf; that the city authorities had undertaken that a passage should be kept clear from that place to the great western entrance of St. Paul's Cathedral, where Members could enter the cathedral by the northern door of that entrance, and proceed to the seats allotted them; that steamers would be in waiting at St. Paul's Wharf from three o'clock P.M., and that a passage would be kept clear from the cathedral to the wharf to enable Members to return. The Committee, therefore, recommended that the Members should assemble in the House at ten o'clock on Thursday morning; that they should be called over by counties in the usual way, the names of the counties being drawn by lot; that they should proceed to the steamboats, as far as possible, in the order in which such counties were drawn; and that the clerks and officers of the House, not exceeding thirty in number, should be permitted to accompany them.

MR. WALPOLE said, that in order that a record of these proceedings might be inserted in the journals of the House, he would beg to move a Resolution to the following effect:—

“That on the occasion of the Public Funeral of Arthur late Duke of Wellington, Mr. Speaker be deputed to attend the Procession on the part of the House; and that this House, on the same occasion, do attend in the Cathedral Church of St. Paul, where Seats have been provided for its Members.”

CAPTAIN SCOBELL said, he thought there was one omission in the arrangements, inasmuch as no deputation from the Navy was appointed to attend the procession. It was true that the First Lord of the Admiralty would attend; but he would have gone whether he had been a naval man or not, and so with respect to the different Orders of the Bath; though there would be a naval man in each class, they would represent the Order of the Bath, and not the Navy. Considering that much of the military proceedings of the great man whose memory they were about to honour were conducted in conjunction with the Navy, he thought that there ought to be a distinct deputation to represent that branch of the service in the procession; and, as a hasty mode of remedying the defect, he would suggest that the Board of Admiralty, being composed entirely of naval men, should be a deputation to represent the Navy.

MR. WALPOLE said, it was far from the intention of those who had the regulation of the proceedings to omit that most popular force from being represented on the occasion of the funeral, or to show the slightest disrespect to the Navy. The hon. and gallant Member would observe that throughout the procession it was considered necessary to have deputations representing a great many public bodies. The difficulty was to prevent the procession being inconveniently long upon a winter's day. The Navy he conceived to be fully represented in the person of the First Lord of the Admiralty. He could also inform the hon. and gallant Gentleman, that 200 tickets had been placed at the disposal of that noble Lord for the use of naval officers. He was not aware of any other mode by which Her Majesty's Navy could be represented except by adding one more carriage for the conveyance of four admirals.

MR. MONCKTON MILNES said, he would refer to an Order issued that morning, which stated that all naval officers should appear at the funeral in their uniform. He thought it important to ascertain whether officers of both services being Members of that House were expected to appear in their respective uniforms or in their senatorial character.

MR. HUME hoped, that the respect due to the Commons of England would be considered, and that all Members of that House would appear at the funeral in their ordinary dress—being plain black, and suitable to the solemn occasion.

MR. STAFFORD said, there was no wish on the part of the Admiralty to require naval officers being Members of that House to attend the ceremony in uniform.

Ordered, That the Report, together with the Report made yesterday, be printed and delivered forthwith.

The House adjourned at Two o'clock till Friday.

THE SANITARY CONFERENCE—QUARANTINE REGULATIONS.

The EARL of ST. GERMANS rose to put to his noble Friends the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs (the Earl of Malmesbury), and the President of the Council (the Earl of Lonsdale), the questions of which he had given notice with respect to the quarantine regulations. It would be in the recollection of their Lordships that in the last Session of Parliament [3 Hansard, cxxi. 1267], he moved for the production of the minutes of proceedings of an International Sanitary Conference that met at Paris in the years 1851–52, and to which assembly many most eminent medical and scientific men were sent by the principal maritime and commercial States of Europe, for the purpose of considering and reporting upon the quarantine regulations now in force throughout Europe. His noble Friend the Foreign Secretary replied to him that the Government had no objection to give the information for which he had asked, but that they could not then lay upon the table the papers relating to the convention by which it was proposed to give effect to the recommendations of the Conference, because the precise terms of the convention were not yet agreed on. He (the Earl of St. Germans) at once acquiesced in the decision of the noble Earl, and left it entirely to his discretion to lay upon the table such extracts from those minutes and other papers as he could produce without detriment to the public service. At the same time, at the suggestion of the noble Earl the Chief Commissioner of the Board of Health (the Earl of Shaftesbury), the report of that body on the subject of the Sanitary Conference was also ordered to be laid on the table. That was on the 28th of May last; but up to that day, the 19th November, none of these papers had, as far as he knew, been laid on the table. He wished, therefore, to know, in the first place, what was the cause of the delay which had taken place in the production of these papers, and whether there was any prospect of their being soon laid upon the table? He next wished to know whether the convention by which it was intended to carry into effect a portion at least of the recommendations of the Conference had been ratified, and, if not, what were the obstacles which prevented such ratification? He believed that he was justified in saying that for the last sixteen years such a measure had been strongly desired by the noble Earl's predecessors in office—not only by the noble Earl's immediate predecessor (Earl Granville), but by the noble Viscount who had presided over the Foreign Office for so many years (Viscount Palmerston), and also by that noble Viscount's predecessor (the Earl of Aberdeen); and it would be a matter of great regret to the country at large if his noble Friend could not hold out to them some hope of the ratification of the Convention at an early day. An impression (which, indeed, he sincerely believed to be erroneous) prevailed abroad that persons interested personally in the retention of the quarantine system had prevailed upon Her Majesty's Government to recede from the position occupied by their predecessors; and that, instead of aiding that onward movement which would have swept away those vexatious restrictions, they had been induced to incline towards their retention. He did not himself believe this to be the case; but he thought it would be satisfactory to the public to hear an assurance to that effect from the noble Earl. His next question would be addressed to his noble Friend the President of the Council. On the 2nd of September last, a letter was addressed by order of the Privy Council to the Commissioners of Customs directing that all vessels arriving from foreign countries having persons on board "actually suffering from cholera, or who had been suffering from that disease within five days previous to the arrival of the vessel in port, should be detained under a precautionary quarantine for such period as might be deemed necessary." Now he wished to ask the noble Earl (the Earl of Lonsdale) on whose advice and authority that letter was written? It was well known that the Board of Health, the tribunal specially charged by Parliament with the administration of the laws for the prevention of disease, not only utterly disbelieved in the efficacy of the system of quarantine regulations, but believed, on the other hand, that they were productive of serious evil in a sanitary point of view. The College of Physicians, also, although in 1831 they recommended the adoption of the most stringent measures for the prevention of the spread of cholera, and even went to the extent of proposing to isolate infected districts of the country, yet, in 1848, declared their conviction that all attempts to prevent the spread of cholera by means of cordons or quarantine regulations had utterly failed. On what medical or scientific authority, then, did the noble Earl rely when he issued these instructions? He wished next to ask the noble Earl what was the meaning of that passage in the letter which related to "persons on board in the enjoyment of good health?" His want of apprehension of the meaning of that passage might arise from his own incapacity, but, at any rate, he found his doubts shared by a very intelligent body of men; for shortly after that letter appeared, a memorial was addressed to the Lords of the Treasury by the Manchester Chamber of Commerce, putting the very same question which he was now asking. Whether the Treasury had replied to that memorial he did not know, but certainly no reply had been published. He wished to know whether, by the "free communication with the shore," which it was stated would be allowed to persons in the enjoyment of good health, it was intended that they should be allowed to leave the vessel, or whether it was intended that they should be detained on board, and merely permitted to have intercourse with those on shore? Whatever might be the meaning of this passage, it altogether abandoned and relinquished the only principle upon which the quarantine system could be maintained; because if persons in good health having come to England with a vessel having cholera patients on board were permitted either to land or even to have free intercourse with the shore, it proclaimed to the world at once that we had no faith in the principle of contagion upon which we acted; and, therefore, this arrangement of the noble Earl was altogether inconsistent with the view which those must be supposed to entertain who enforced even a precautionary quarantine. The last question he had to ask was, whether any measures had been taken to ensure proper medical attendance being given to the persons who might be attacked with disease while they were detained in quarantine? We had not in this country, as was the case in the maritime States of Italy, lazarettos or hospitals for the reception of the persons on board ships declared in quarantine; but all ships coming to our ports must perform quarantine, with the crew and passengers on board, at certain stations or grounds. The principal of our quarantine stations was that at the Motherbank; yet we were told by the superintendent-general of quarantine that he ordered the Eclair to Standgate Creek, because intercourse with the shore was absolutely impossible at Motherbank in stormy weather. Standgate Creek, on the other hand, had been pronounced by Sir William Burnett, director-general of the medical department of the Navy, to be the most unhealthy spot on our shores. Then again, at the mouth of the Humber, where the northern ships performed quarantine, the quarantine station was several miles distant from Hull, and if the weather was rough, or the wind and tide were unfavourable, it often required six or seven hours to communicate with that town. If hospitals and lazarettos, well aired and ventilated, were provided, persons who were attacked had a reasonable hope and chance of recovering; but let the House consider what was the position of an unfortunate man suffering from disease, and yet cribbed and cabined between the decks of a merchant vessel riding in one of these quarantine grounds, and without the reach of the medical care or nursing that a person in such a state required. Such were the questions of which he had given notice to his two noble Friends opposite; but he also wished to put another, of which he had not and could not give notice. Their Lordships would, he was sure, have seen with deep pain and sorrow the announcement in the papers of that morning of the arrival of one of Her Majesty's mail steamers from the West Indies with the yellow fever on board, several fatal cases having occurred in the course of the voyage. The question which he now wished to ask was, whether La Plata—for that was the name of the steam-packet—had been relieved from quarantine; and if not, whether any accommodation had been provided, or any precautions taken, for the reception of the unfortunate men on board? Look at the case of the Eclair, which was long detained in quarantine, and in which disease prevailed and increased with the continuance of the quarantine, and contrast it with the case of the Arethusa in December last, which, having landed its crew at Plymouth attacked by smallpox, had no fresh instance of disease afterwards; while in the Eclair, from which no person was permitted to land, the ravages were frightful. These were the questions which he had to ask; and he would express his unfeigned hope that the answers which he was about to receive would give satisfaction to the House and to the country, and would convince both that the Government was not clinging pertinaciously to a vexatious and expensive system, which experience and science had proved to be utterly worthless.

The EARL of MALMESBURY said, that without subscribing entirely to the notion which his noble Friend seemed to entertain, that contagion was altogether impossible, he must assure him that Her Majesty's Government was not less anxious than its predecessors to bring the convention to which his noble Friend had referred to a satisfactory result. He was sorry to have to inform his noble Friend that at that moment the negotiations for the conclusion of the convention were not terminated; and, therefore, he was obliged to tell his noble Friend that he could not, with due regard to the public service, lay on the table of the House the papers respecting which he had asked. They were excessively voluminous, and he did not think that any extracts that could be given from them would give his noble Friend the satisfaction which he expected to derive from their perusal. Indeed, if he were to lay those papers on the table, he should only be delaying the progress of the convention. While he had to regret that the negotiations for the convention had not arrived at a successful result as yet, still, although they might not terminate, as he hoped at one time they would, in the general consent of the twelve Powers to one formal convention, he had a confident expectation that seven or eight of the principal maritime States would sign such a convention. It was naturally desirable that the principal Powers with ports in the Mediterranean should agree to such a measure: but at this moment some of the States of Italy, Spain, and Austria, either refused their signature to the convention, or else put forth such difficulties in the way of signing it as they had not been able to overcome; on the other hand, Portugal, Sardinia, France, England, and, he believed, he might say, Russia, did not object to sign such a convention as Her Majesty's Government had proposed. He hoped that before long it would be signed by some of the Powers of Europe, although he could hope to have it signed by all. When that event took place, he should have great sa-

The EARL of LONSDALE said, that with respect to the question the noble Earl had addressed to him he should be happy to give his noble Friend all the information in his power on this subject. The circumstances connected with the letter of the 2nd of September to which his noble Friend had referred were these: It was represented to the Council by official authority that malignant cholera was raging at Dantsic and several of the principal ports in the Baltic, and the advice under which the Council acted in issuing the letter to which reference had been made, was given by one of the most skilful physicians of the present day. His noble Friend had complained of the letter of the 2nd of September as an act of severity and restriction on the part of the Privy Council; but his noble Friend was under some misapprehension in this respect, for if he would take the trouble of referring to the Act of the 6th Geo. IV., he would find that the Board of Customs had the power to send to any quarantine station any vessel arriving from a foreign port with any infected person on board. The late Quarantine Act allowed the Privy Council to give in each case such orders to the Board of Customs as the case might require; and the letter of the 2nd of September mitigated several provisions of the existing law. His noble Friend said that he could not understand that letter. He was surprised at such an assertion, for to him it appeared that its meaning was clear enough. The letter mitigated the Act of George IV. very considerably, as it ordered those only who were actually attacked by cholera to be detained on board. He would not enter into any discussion with his noble Friend on the subject of contagion and non-contagion, for he knew that eminent physicians had not only differed from one another, but, at different periods, even from themselves, on these points. [The noble Earl here read, in a low voice, several conflicting extracts from the reports of the College of Physicians and of the Army Medical Board on the subject of contagion; and, in reply to a question of the Earl of St. Germans, said, that there were some physicians who denied contagion, but he believed that not merely three-fourths but nine-tenths of the profession advised all who consulted them to avoid contagion.] With regard to the news respecting La Plata, that vessel had only arrived that day, and the intelligence had only reached him that morning through the telegraph. He had immediately consulted with the physician attached to the Board of Privy Council, Sir W. Pym, and had given orders that the parties should be relieved from quarantine. The physician had gone down himself, and would communicate such orders as were necessary to the quarantine station.

The EARL of ST. GERMANS: Has any accommodation been provided for the parties on shore?

The EARL of LONSDALE had already stated that he had sent down orders that the parties should be relieved. He also repeated his statement that he had sent down the physician of the Board to the quarantine station to give the proper directions.

LORD STANLEY of ALDERLEY was understood to remark upon the inconsistency of our sending a representative at the Sanitary Conference at Paris, to impress upon the other deputies that cholera was not conveyed by contagion, while we were renewing our quarantine restrictions in our own ports. The members of the Conference were of opinion, that cholera could not be conveyed by contagion, and a report had been made by a congress of American physicians, and had been recently published by the Board of Health in this country, in which it was stated to be their unanimous opinion that no quarantine regulations were of any avail in preventing the entrance of the cholera, if the atmospheric and other causes necessary for its production were present. It was not likely that we could make satisfactory progress with the Convention, if, while our representative at Paris was urging these views on the one hand, on the other the President of the Council was enforcing more stringent quarantine regulations with respect to cholera.

The EARL of LONSDALE said, that the regulations issued by the Privy Council were not more stringent, but were in fact a relaxation of the powers with which the Council were invested by the Act of George IV.

LORD STANLEY of ALDERLEY remarked, that it seemed very extraordinary that our representative at Paris, instructed by the Foreign Secretary, should there maintain views on this subject quite different from those entertained by the President of the Council.

The EARL of MALMESBURY also protested against the idea that the reprerepresentatives of the British Government had been instructed to abolish all regulations of quarantine; they had only been instructed to mitigate and regulate them, and to render the burden of them less intolerable; and that was their object in attending the Sanitary Conference at Paris. If his noble Friend fancied that he could persuade the representatives of foreign countries to believe that cholera and other diseases were not contagious, he believed that his noble Friend, on trying it, would find that he was very much mistaken; nor would any convention ever be concluded if we were to wait until we had brought them to that conviction. Whether diseases of this kind were infectious or contagious, he did not know; but foreign countries were convinced of this—that they were catching.

LORD STANLEY of ALDERLEY said, he did not suppose that the different nations of Europe could be induced to forego all quarantine regulations; but the greatest number of medical opinions were certainly against the contagious character of cholera.

LORD WHARNCLIFFE was understood to say, that nothing could be more preposterous than to subject a vessel to quarantine for yellow fever in our latitude, and in the month of November. The yellow fever depended on the thermometer. It was never known to exist when the thermometer was below a certain point. It was well known in tropical climates it ceased its ravages with colder weather. In New Orleans it was well understood that the first frost put an end to the yellow fever. When we were pressing upon other Governments the propriety of relaxing their quarantine laws, it placed us in an awkward position to be found enforcing our restrictions with respect to a disease so unlikely to spread as the yellow fever.

RAILWAY LEGISLATION.

LORD REDESDALE wished to ask his noble Friend the Vice-President of the Board of Trade (Lord Colchester), whether there was any intention on the part of Her Majesty's Government to bring in any Bill for the regulation of railways. He believed that there was an almost universal opinion amongst persons in this country, with the exception of those personally interested in railways, that some further regulations should be adopted, and some further control exercised in regard to matters connected with these concerns. The accidents which had lately occurred, and which had certainly been more than usually numerous, had drawn the attention of the public to this matter; and he believed that the safety as well as the convenience of the public really required some attention on the part of the Government, and the adoption of some regulations which might enable them to interfere a little in these matters. He knew that there was some little difficulty in moving in this matter; because, whenever any attempt was made by the Government to interfere with them, it was urged that to interfere with the railway companies would diminish their responsibility. But he was convinced that there were many points in the management of railways on which the interference of the Government would be most useful. His reason for drawing the attention of the House to this subject, arose partly from the responsibility which the House had cast upon him in the office in which they had placed him as their Chairman of Committees. It was supposed that that functionary should exercise an almost complete control over the regulations to be enforced with regard to Private Bills. Now, unquestionably from the manner in which the House had always supported the Chairman of Committees, he had considerable power; but still no Chairman of Committees, and certainly not he, for one, could presume to lay down on matters of this kind a code of legislation which he would feel justified in imposing on all railways whatever. This could only be done by Parliament itself acting legislatively at the instance of the Government. To him it appeared that all the railway companies stood in a position which rendered such a course of legislation justifiable—because for the last thirteen years a clause had been inserted in every Railway Act subjecting the companies to the operation of any general Act which might be introduced with respect to railways. No railway company, therefore, would have any right to complain, whatever the interference of the Government might be. He thought that advantage should be taken of the present Session for the introduction of a measure of the kind to which he had referred; for if it was allowed to pass without this being done, their power of obtaining a control over railway companies would be materially diminished. It was also most important that such a measure should be introduced on account of the character of many of the Bills likely to be introduced—Bills to effect important amalgamations. Now, it was impossible for any person to look to a great extension of amalgamations without some apprehensions as to the consequences that might arise from them to the public interests. To a certain extent he entertained no objection to the amalgamation of companies, but he thought that proposals for that end should be taken up only with the greatest caution. Measures should be taken to protect the public against the consequences which might naturally be expected to follow from some of these amalgamations, if they should be carried out, for they would certainly partake in a considerable degree of the nature of monopolies. It was only, therefore, in proceeding by a general measure, assuming the necessary powers of control, that they could expect to give the public confidence in the administration of railway business. He had to the last opposed the abolition of the Railway Commissions; and he hoped to see them re-established with more extended powers, and properly supported by the Government of the day, which they never had been before. There were many points as to which he thought it highly expedient that some power of control should be taken. For instance, there should be some authority able to regulate the proceedings of the railway companies in putting on and in taking off trains from different lines, for at present the conduct of the railway companies in regulating such matters was in many cases opposed to the convenience of the public. You found that when there were two railway companies conflicting with each other, you came by one to a point from which you must travel by another, and that the train by which you wished to proceed on your journey had started just ten minutes before your arrival by the train of the other company, and that you must wait three or four hours until you could start by another train. It could not be productive of any mischief to vest power in a general Board to correct such abuses on receiving a representation from the inhabitants of a district, or from another railway company; and it would be just to enforce such arrangements, for the lines were given to the companies by Parliament on the faith of their giving that accommodation to the public. There was another point on which he thought it necessary that Government should interfere with the management of the railway companies. There should be some stringent regulation to exact from them punctuality in their times of departure and arrival. Almost every accident on the railways arose from want of punctuality. A reform in railway management, by which punctuality should be enforced, would be more beneficial to individuals, and would even affect a greater number of persons, than the reform recently introduced by his noble and learned Friend on the woolsack into the Court of Chancery. In a new Parliament, like the present, it would be difficult to obtain that attention in the other House to the many Railway Bills which would come before them in the course of the present Session which their importance required, on account of the number of election petitions, which would necessarily occupy the time of many of those who were best qualified to act as Chairmen of Committees; and the consideration of these matters must consequently not only be more hurried than usual, but also in many cases be left to the decision of new and less experienced Members. It was on that account that he had drawn the attention of the Government to the subject thus early. If the Government were not prepared to introduce a general measure for the better regulation of railways, he trusted that, at least, they would frame beforehand some clauses, directed to the purposes he had specified, and to other matters of importance to the safety and convenience of the public, to be inserted in all Railway Bills in the present Session; but he believed they would find that proceeding by a general Act would be the least trouble to them, and more effective.

LORD COLCHESTER was ready to acknowledge that this was a matter which the noble Lord had done well in bringing before Parliament, for it was one of great importance to the public safety and the public convenience. He was afraid the answer he had to give to the questions put might not be quite satisfactory to his noble Friend. The attention of the department to which he had the honour to belong was constantly devoted to this subject, but no new measure was at present in preparation. With respect to the number of new Railway Bills that might be expected to be introduced in the present Session, their information was at present necessarily very imperfect. They had only the official notices inserted in the Gazette by which to judge of the probable number, and the entire number would not be known until the 30th of November, the last day for depositing the notices, and even then it must be remembered that many intended undertakings probably would not be carried out, and perhaps the Bills not even introduced into Parliament. At present the number of Bills for which notices had been given was forty-two, fifteen of which were for the incorporation of new companies, thirteen for the construction of new works, eight for continuations, five for amalgamations, and one for extension of powers. The whole subject, in the opinion of Government, was of such difficulty and importance, as only to be adequately dealt with by a Select Committee, and, therefore, Government had come to the determination of moving the appointment of a Select Committee to consider it. At present he was not able to give a more decided answer to the questions, than that the subject was engaging the earnest attention of Government.

LORD BEAUMONT observed, that in his opinion, the necessity of an Act respecting the management of railways did not depend upon the number of Bills which in the course of the present Session would be introduced into the Legislature. What they wanted was this, a code of laws—a general code of laws—respecting the management of railways, which should apply equally to all railways, both those that might obtain Bills in future, and those that had already obtained them, and had consequently now no occasion to come before the Legislature. A Bill might be framed so as to prevent the vexatious proceedings which now so often take place between conflicting railway interests, and which always result in inconvenience to the passengers, and loss to one or other of the parties. What they wanted was such a general Bill as would lay down a rule to enable persons who had grounds of complaint to right themselves. Of course such a Bill could alone properly emanate from Government; and he (Lord Beaumont) thought, therefore, he might ask his noble Friend if, in the Office of the Board of Trade, this question had been considered, whether in consequence of the numerous accidents which had recently occurred on railways, and the enormous loss incurred by the necessity of applying to Parliament for amalgamations and other desirable objects by separate and special Bills, the Government intended to introduce any measure of a general nature which would put an end to this state of things, by an enactment in the nature of the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, which would be of general application?

The EARL of DERBY thought, however

desirable theoretically it might be that there should be one code of regulations which should guide and govern all railway companies, past, present, and to come, and that Parliament should, by an ex post facto regulation, lay down rules for the guidance of a railway company, thus interfering with its internal management, not only would it be impossible for Government to carry any measure through Parliament, but, if it were possible, it would be an extraordinary interference with the internal regulations of railway companies, which were most of them much better judges of what was conducive to their own and the public interest, and much more capable of attending to it than any Government Board could be. He could not, therefore, hold out to the noble Lord who had just sat down any expectation that it was the intention of Government to introduce any measures of railway regulations which might tend, according to the sanguine views which the noble Lord took, to render impossible the occurrence of inconveniences and accidents to the public, or which would amount to any serious interference with the powers and privileges conferred by Parliament on the existing companies. He would not, however, hesitate to say that, as experience showed from day to day the necessity of legislation for particular purposes, and as opportunities arose for dealing with particular questions, he thought it exceedingly desirable, and indeed necessary, that they should avail themselves of the fresh references to Parliament that would become requisite on the part of the companies, for the purpose of introducing such modifications of the existing system as experience had shown to be necessary or desirable for the public interest. One question raised by his noble Friend in which Parliament might probably interfere with advantage, was in the connection of different trains with different railways communicating with each other. In such cases there might usefully be given some power of arbitration or arrangement under a Government Board to prevent the inconvenience now inflicted upon the public, for the purpose of making them travel the greatest length possible upon the respective lines of the different companies. But any measure of that kind would require much care, because it might involve an interference with the details of management; and their Lordships must recollect that in every case where Parliament insisted on particular times being observed, Parliament must become responsible also for the inconvenience and danger which might be introduced by running corresponding trains on other lines, and which, if great attention were not paid, might be of a very serious description. There was another subject to which he wished to call the attention of the House, and with respect to which he considered that a great mistake had been made by neglecting it at an early period of the existence of the railway system—he meant the making provision for the conveyance both of mails and troops by the different companies. He believed that at present Government was absolutely and entirely in the power of a railway company as to the terms—not on which the mails would be conveyed, indeed—but on which other conditions most essential to the public service, in the conveyance of troops and similar objects, would be performed. Therefore, when railway companies came to Parliament for new and amended Bills to extend the powers they already possessed, he thought the opportunity should be taken of introducing such fresh regulations for the furtherance of the public service by facilitating the conveyance either of mails or troops, as might be found expedient. His noble Friend the Postmaster General (the Earl of Hardwicke) had very carefully considered this subject, and prepared clauses which would be submitted to Parliament for its approval, and which, if adopted, would provide greatly increased facilities for the transmission of mails and troops by railway companies. He differed, however, from the noble Lord as to the extent to which Parliament ought to legislate for the regulation of existing railways.

The MARQUESS of CLANRICARDE said, he had heard with great satisfaction the remarks of the noble Earl; because he was fully aware of the great inconvenience to which the Post Office and other departments were put by the present system. The sum paid by the public for the conveyance of mails was now of an enormous amount, and exceeded, when he left office, 400,000*l.* a year. He was sorry the noble Earl had not held out greater hopes that the subject would be considered by Government. He did not approve of ex post facto legislation. It would be very unfair to resort to any measures of that kind, except when railway companies came to ask for some boon. He thought, however, there would be no hardship whatever in taking measures by which redress would be afforded in case of the breach of public engagements. It was very desirable that consideration should be given to the sub-

The EARL of HARROWBY denied that in any contract the Government were at the mercy of the railway companies. It ought to be remembered that the public required from the latter a vast amount of duty. Look at the vast bulk of newspapers and books which the railways conveyed, and for which the means of transit were never required under the old system. This should be remembered when noble Lords were told of the large amount of payment to railways by the Post Office. All experience showed that railway amalgamation, under wise and proper regulations, was the best system. Parliament might order trains to be run at particular hours, but they could never regulate the action of hostile parties. Companies with rival interests always began with extravagant competition, and then combination eventually followed, to cover the expense of all the losses caused by competition. It would have been much better if Parliament had carried out properly the scheme of Lord Dalhousie. If they had not left the construction of lines to the mad speculation of private parties, they would have had a much more economical and efficient service. The best remedy was, to keep in view the original views of Lord Dalhousie, and to assign somewhat of a monopoly to each railway company over their respective districts, under proper regulations for the protection of the public. Monopolies on railways were, and must be. Let Parliament avow that they were, and deal with them as such, and all would be easy. But if they treated railways as undertakings to which the ordinary law of supply and demand was applicable, causes of complaint against railway management would always exist.

EARL GRANVILLE doubted whether so many towns would be now connected by railway, or whether so many trains would be run, if the Government had originally assumed greater responsibility, or had been intrusted with the management of railway matters. He thought it desirable that a Parliamentary Committee should be appointed. In many instances the railway companies would be grateful to have some of the questions between them settled by the superior authority of Parliament.

LORD BATEMAN said, that a passenger in Yorkshire ought to have the power of booking himself through to London without being compelled to change his carriage when he came upon the line of any other company. On some matters of this kind legislative interference would be desirable.

The DUKE of MONTROSE thought co-operation between railway companies hardly to be expected, unless a controlling power were vested in Government. To show the necessity of an improved system, they had only to look to the frequency of accidents at present. He remembered on one occasion travelling to Scotland by express train. An accident occurred; but as no lives were lost, he supposed for that reason the circumstance was not noticed in the newspapers. The cause was, that trains of several different railways passed along one line; and while such a state of things existed, it was fraught with the greatest danger. He understood that an inspector from the Board of Trade went down to examine the line, and that he recommended the erection of a bridge; but the recommendation was disregarded by the railway, and the Board had no power to enforce it.

LORD COLCHESTER, alluding to the case referred to by the noble Duke, said that it was but just to the engineer of the railway, Mr. Stephenson, to state that when the matter was represented to him, he undertook to make a bridge sufficiently wide to prevent accidents.

FUNERAL OF THE LATE DUKE OF WELLINGTON.

The EARL of DERBY: My Lords, I will, by moving the adjournment of the House, put myself strictly in order in addressing a few observations to your Lordships on a subject to which I am anxious to call your Lordships' attention. My Lords, I desire to express the deep satisfaction and the deep thankfulness which I have experienced, and which I am sure your Lordships will have experienced, at the more than satisfactory result which attended the great solemnity of yesterday. My Lords, I think it is matter of humble thankfulness to Almighty God that an event which brought together such masses of persons as never before have congregated, under any circumstances whatever, in this great metropolis, should have passed over, not only without any signal calamity, but without being attended by any—or rather attended by so few—of those casualties which are contingent upon every great congregation of persons, even upon a much smaller scale, but which in this case were rendered more probable by the necessarily hasty and hurried manner in which many of the preparations were made for the accommodation of that great multitude. My Lords,

I think that I may even say that the providential change in the weather in the course of yesterday was no light circumstance, not only in adding to the comfort of the vast multitude assembled to witness that solemnity, but also in diminishing, to a great extent, the amount of risk, of confusion, and of danger which all ceremonies of this kind must necessarily more or less involve. But it would be most unjust if I were to withhold—and if I did so your Lordships, I am sure, would consider that I was committing an injustice—if I were to withhold the tribute of my applause and satisfaction at the perfect organisation, the admirable arrangements, the entire discipline with which the whole of that great ceremony was marshalled and conducted, and at the discretion and the judgment which were manifested by all those civil and military authorities who took a part in carrying out this national testimonial. My Lords, nothing could have been more admirable than the temper and the patience with which both the troops and the police conducted themselves—the troops under arms, and the police on duty, for a period of at least eleven or twelve hours, and engaged during the whole of that time in unremitting exertions in preserving order. But, my Lords, we must not omit to do justice also to another class, without whose signal co-operation and admirable conduct the best arrangements might have been marred—I do not say that the efforts of the military and the police would have been unavailing—but which doubtless rendered that task, arduous as it must have been under any circumstances, a matter of comparative ease and safety. My Lords, I allude to that upon which we may look with pride and gratification—I mean the admirable temper, patience, forbearance, and good conduct which was manifested by the whole of these incredible masses. When we consider how large a proportion of the population of these United Kingdoms was for that single day crowded together in the streets of this metropolis; when you remember, as those at least remember to whose lot it fell to take part in the procession, and who saw it throughout its whole length and breadth—when you remember that on a line of route three miles in length, extending from Grosvenor-place to St. Paul's Cathedral, there was not a single unoccupied foot of ground, and that you passed through a living sea of faces, all turned to look upon that great spectacle—when you saw every house, every window, every housetop loaded with persons anxious to pay their last tribute of respect to the memory of England's greatest son—when you saw those persons (those, at least, within the streets) remaining with entire and unflinching patience for many hours in a position in which movement was hardly possible, and yet that scarce a single accident occurred to the most feeble woman or child amid that vast mass—when, throughout the whole of that length, not only was a perfect decorum preserved, and a ready assistance given to the efforts of the police and the military, but there was exhibited no unseemly desire merely to witness that magnificent spectacle, no light and thoughtless applause at the splendour of that spectacle; when you saw how the people of England, in the awful silence of those vast crowds, testified in the most emphatic manner the sense in which every man among them felt the public loss which England had sustained—I know not, my Lords, how you may have looked upon this manifestation of public feeling and good sense and order, but I know this, that as I passed along those lines it was with pride and satisfaction I felt that I was a fellow-countryman of those who knew so well how to regulate and control themselves; and I could not help entertaining a hope that those foreign visitors who have done us and themselves the honour of assisting at this great ceremonial night, upon this occasion, as upon the 1st of May, 1851, bear witness in their own countries how safely and to what extent a people may be relied upon, on whom the strongest hold of their Government is their own reverence and respect for the free institutions of their country, and the principles of popular self-government controlled and modified by constitutional monarchy. My Lords, when we had passed over the long line of the procession, and had entered into that magnificent edifice, I think that few who were present can, to the latest moment of their lives, forget the scene which they witnessed there. Who will forget the effect when, throughout the length and breadth of that vast cathedral, the pealing anthem swelled the note not of praise, but of sorrow? Who will forget the effect when, in ready acquiescence to the request publicly communicated, within that immense edifice 16,000 voices joined simultaneously in the responses to the common prayer of every Christian man? And, my Lords, when the close of that impressive solemnity approached—when, amidst solemn and mournful music, slowly, and inch by inch, the coffin which held the illustrious dead descended into its last and honoured resting-place, my Lords, I was near enough to see the countenances of many of the veteran companions of his labours and of his triumphs—near enough to hear the labouring breath which scarcely checked the tears which would not have disgraced the cheek of England's hardiest warriors, as they looked down for the last time upon all that was mortal of their late mighty leader. Honour, my Lords, to the people who so know how to reverence their illustrious dead! Honour to those friendly nations who, renewing their old companionship in his triumphs and his glory, joined in the general tribute of respect to him whose renown was not English, nor European, but world-wide, and who associated their own countries for the last time with the name and the glories of Wellington! And, my Lords, honour—let me say it also—to that great and friendly nation, our relations with whom in times long gone by, and I trust never to return, incapacitated her from participating in the national triumph with which we celebrated his military fame, but who yet, my Lords, in joining in the public mourning over the departed hero, forgot for a time their old national prejudices, and by the presence of their representative testified their respect and their veneration for his memory! If they thought of him as a foe at all, it was as one who had been so in the discharge of his duty to his country—it was as a foeman worthy of their steel; and they remembered, perhaps, with pardonable pride, that never were his military talents and abilities more highly tested, and more severely tried, than when opposed in the field to the valour of their troops, and the science and the skill of their commanders. My Lords, we have paid the last tribute to our illustrious hero's mortal remains; we have consigned him to the grave; but in so consigning him, I trust we shall not forget, in the burial of our greatest warrior, that we have buried perhaps the man among us who had the greatest horror of the miseries of war:—that every effort, every energy of his mind, in the field, in the camp, and in the senate, was directed not to the mere attainment of victory, of fame, or of glory, but that the hope to which he always looked forward was, that the victories for which he struggled would be the means of securing to his country and to the world the blessings of lasting peace. My Lords, I trust that in burying him we have not taken leave of and buried the recollection of the principles which he supported and advocated. I am sure that I am speaking in the spirit of him whose loss we all deplore when I say (and I feel confident your Lordships agree with me), that I look upon war in itself as the greatest curse with which a country can be afflicted, and upon unnecessary war as the greatest crime of which a statesman can be guilty. I am sure, my Lords, that the great and paramount object of this country is the maintenance of a firm and honourable peace; but I am no less convinced of the necessity of that principle which it was his constant duty to inculcate upon successive Governments—namely, that in order to maintain the security and permanence of peace, every nation must have within itself those means of self-defence and self-dependence which should not provoke aggression by its weakness, more especially if to that weakness be added the possession of unbounded wealth. My Lords, I trust that we shall bear this in mind, not in words only, but in our actions and policy, and that setting aside all political and party considerations, we shall concur in this opinion—that, in order to be peaceful, England must be powerful; but that she ought to be powerful, only to be more securely peaceful.

THE TURKISH LOAN.

Mr. LAYARD begged to ask the noble Lord the Under Secretary for Foreign Affairs the question of which he had given notice. The public was aware, though not through any official source, that a loan effected by the representative of the Turkish Government at Paris was either rejected altogether, or not ratified, and that repayment of the money advanced, with a certain amount of interest, was offered. He did not desire by anything he said to encourage British subjects in speculating in foreign loans. But he wished to ask the noble Lord if he had any objection to state to the House the information that had been received by the Government as to the repayment of the loan, or whether there was any objection to lay the papers before the House?

LORD STANLEY said, the subject to which the hon. Gentleman alluded had attracted much attention, but he thought the House would agree with him that it would not be expedient to lay upon the table papers relating to it at a period when it could hardly be said that the proceedings had terminated. He had no objection, however, to state in a few words a general outline of the case. It was well known that the Turkish Minister charged with the negotiation of the loan in question had departed widely from the instructions he had received, and contracted in the name of his Government a loan which no judicious adviser of the Porte could have recommended the Porte to ratify. The consequence was, that, after a trifling delay, the Porte refused to ratify the loan, and at the same time immediately announced its intention to repay the portion of the loan already received, together with interest thereon. Further than that, he could only state that from all the information the Government possessed, it appeared that the Turkish Government were acting in a most fair and honourable manner; and they entertained a confident expectation that the affair would be speedily and satisfactorily dealt with.

THE MARITIME LAWS.

Mr. J. L. RICARDO: I beg, Sir, to ask the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Board of Trade, whether any despatches have been transmitted to that Department from the Foreign Office containing information or statistics bearing on the working of the Maritime Laws of the United Kingdom, and if, so, whether he will have any objection to lay them on the table of the House; also, whether any inquiries have been made by the Board of Trade of the British Consuls through the Foreign Office?

MR. HENLEY: I think, Sir, I had better answer the last question of the hon. Gentleman first. There was a letter addressed from the Foreign Office to the several Consuls, directing them to make returns in the form suggested. Returns from some of those Consuls have been received. There have not been many received in reference to 1850; those received have reference principally to 1851, therefore they do not contain much information that would enable us to make a comparison with respect to what the trade has been at different periods. The hon. Gentleman applies, I suppose, to the indirect trade that has grown up since the repeal of the Navigation Laws, and the returns do not afford much information on the subject. In a portion of the despatches some of the Consuls give an opinion one way, and some another; but they do not contain any facts of importance so far as the returns at present go. If the hon. Member wishes to see them, there is no objection to put them on the table of the House; but perhaps he would be good enough to look over them first, and see if they are worth printing.

AMALGAMATION OF RAILWAYS.

MR. LABOUCHERE: I wish to ask a question in reference to those Bills for the amalgamation of Railways, several of which, of great importance, are expected to come before the House at no distant period. The question I wish to ask the right hon. Gentleman is, whether he has given this subject his consideration, and whether he will be prepared at the proper time to recommend to the House the course best calculated to enable the House to consider the subject with a view to protect the interests of the public and the parties concerned?

MR. HENLEY: The question that has been addressed to me by the right hon. Gentleman can hardly be overrated in importance. I have not had an opportunity, nor has the Department with which I have the honour to be connected, had an opportunity, of knowing anything of those Amalgamation Bills except through the means that are open to the public at large—the Gazette notices. It is from that source alone that I have derived any information. It is quite clear from the notices that many large schemes of amalgamation are contemplated. I have given as much attention to the subject as I have been able, and I think it will be the duty of this House, as far as I can see at present, to appoint a Committee to inquire into the whole subject in a very large and wide manner, and to adopt such measures, either by Standing Orders or otherwise, as will best enable them to meet the urgency of the case. I think, for the sake of the public as well as for the sake of the parties themselves, some means should be adopted to take care that those great steps should not be taken unadvisedly.

THE DIPLOMATIC SERVICE.

MR. EWART: I beg, Sir, to inquire of the noble Lord the Under Secretary for Foreign Affairs, if any steps have been taken for the examination or other test of fitness of candidates for the Diplomatic service of the country; whether there will be any objection to lay a statement of the examination or qualification required before the House; and also whether any qualification will be required from candidates for the Consular service?

LORD STANLEY: The hon. Member for Dumfries, in June last, put to me a question similar to that he now puts, and I then did hope that I should by this time have been able to give to that or a similar inquiry a more satisfactory answer than I am afraid I shall now be able to give. This subject of education for the diplomatic service has engaged the attention of Government for some time past, and a plan has been prepared, which I trust, with some modification, will be adopted, but which is not yet in a state to lay before the House. In drawing out the plan, it was found necessary, or at least desirable, that some other changes should at the same time be made in reference to the junior members of the Diplomatic service, and as those changes involve some increase of expenditure (though not, perhaps, a large increase), it was determined not to include them in the arrangements of the present year. I can assure the hon. Member that the Government have not lost sight of the subject—that it is even now engaging their attention, and that they hope to be shortly able to lay before the House and the country such a plan as I have referred to. With regard to the second part of the hon. Gentleman's question, as to whether it is intended to apply any test of qualification to candidates for the Consular service, I beg to say it is not the intention of the Government to apply any such test. To do so would involve an entire change in the system under which Consuls are now appointed. The majority of those persons who entered the Consular service, entered it late in life, or at any rate at an age when it would be difficult to subject them to such a general examination as might be highly proper for young men who had just left school. Many of the British Consuls have been officers in the two services; some have been Members of this House, others are persons engaged in trade: and in none of these cases, but especially the last, would such an examination as the hon. Gentleman proposes be possible. A practical knowledge of commercial affairs, and an acquaintance (which ought always to be required) with the language of the country in which he exercises his office, are sufficient qualifications for a Consul.

NATIONAL SYSTEM OF EDUCATION (IRELAND).

MR. BERNAL OSBORNE : I beg, Sir, to ask the noble Lord the Secretary for Ireland whether it be the intention of Her Majesty's Government to propose any alteration in the system of national education at present established in Ireland ?

LORD NAAS : I was certainly not aware, Sir, that any intimation had been given by any Member of Her Majesty's Government, that it was their intention to propose any alteration in the system of national education in Ireland, and I am bound to say that it is not the intention of the Government to propose any such alteration. I have further to state that they would view with considerable regret any alteration in that system that would interfere with its efficiency, and deprive the people of Ireland of the benefits of education, which are now so largely extended amongst them. If it shall seem to any hon. Gentleman on either side of the House, either that the object for which that system was originally established has not been fully carried out, or that by an addition to, or the amendment of, any of the existing rules, conscientious scruples might be avoided, and extended spheres of usefulness given to the system, it would be the duty of Government not only to acquiesce but to assist in such an inquiry to the utmost of their power, and to give any proposal that was made of that nature all the care and consideration which the difficulty and delicacy of the subject demand.

CONVOCATION.

SIR JOHN SHELLEY : I wish, Sir, to put a question to the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for the Home Department, with reference to an observation which fell from him on a former occasion as to the sitting of Convocation not being continued with the sanction of the Government. The question I have to ask is, whether, as we perceive the Convocation is postponed to February next, the sitting is then to be resumed, or whether it is adjourned in the usual way ?

MR. WALPOLE : I am much obliged to the hon. Gentleman for asking the question, because I think a misunderstanding has prevailed with reference to the conduct of the Government as regards the Convocation, and the mode of proroguing it. Now I may, perhaps, be allowed to say that the usual course observed with reference to the Convocation is to leave it, not to the Crown, but, according to law, to the Archbishop of Canterbury, either with or without the consent of his brethren (for that is a question that is not yet determined) to prorogue Convocation when the Address is presented. That course the Government has not interfered with, nor could the Government be required to interfere at all unless the licence of the Crown was required, permitting them to meet to make canons or ordinances, or continue their sittings for such a purpose as that. What I said the other night was, that the Archbishop of Canterbury had never made any application with reference to this subject, either to me or the other Members of the Government, and, as far as I am aware, that statement is perfectly correct. Until to-day I never saw the Archbishop of Canterbury on the subject. I stated, also, what is perfectly true, that, as far as I am concerned, I was determined never, on the part of the Government, to allow any deviation from the usual course relative to the sittings or powers of Convocation. The Government has strictly and steadily adhered to that determination. I have taken no part whatever in the matter, nor was I likely to be called upon to do so unless the Convocation required the licence of the Crown, or unless I had reason to believe that a different course of conduct was about to be pursued from that which was pursued on previous occasions. The only deviation that has taken place on the present occasion is this—that the Address has been debated upon three days instead of upon one, and that a Committee has been appointed. The Government had nothing to do with the appointment of that Committee. The Government could not interfere. [Sir JAMES GRAHAM intimated dissent.] My right hon. Friend shakes his head. But I think I am right. If I am wrong, it is from some misconception of the power of the Government which the novelty of the subject may have thrown some doubt upon. To the best of my belief, however, the Government has no power to interfere at all until it comes to a question of prorogation. That question could not arise before the Address was answered, and the Address, as yet, has not been presented. Great interest has been manifested on this subject; and, therefore, perhaps I may be permitted to add, that after much thought I have formed a deli berate opinion upon it, and I can assure the House that, so long as I have the honour to hold the office I now hold, nothing will induce me to advise the Crown to grant a licence to Convocation to make canons. I have never made that declaration before, because I have never been called upon to make it; but I make it now, that there may be no misunderstandings, for I entertain that opinion in the strongest manner, firmly believing that nothing would be so detrimental to the Church of England, or so likely to create divisions in that Church, as to revive Convocation for such a purpose.

THE GOVERNMENT AMENDMENT ON
MR. VILLIERS' MOTION.

The CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: I beg to give notice, Sir, that on Tuesday, the twenty-third, on the Motion of the hon. Member for Wolverhampton, I will move a Resolution by way of Amendment, expressed in this language:—

“That this House acknowledges with satisfaction that the cheapness of provisions, occasioned by recent Legislation, has mainly contributed to improve the condition and increase the comforts of the working classes; and that unrestricted competition having been adopted, after due deliberation, as the principle of our Commercial System, this House is of opinion that it is the duty of the Government unreservedly to adhere to that policy in those measures of Financial and Administrative Reform which, under the circumstances of the Country, they may deem it their duty to introduce.”

CAPE OF GOOD HOPE—KAFIR WAR.

LORD JOHN RUSSELL: Sir, the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for the Colonies stated, at the commencement of the Session, that no recent information had been received from the Cape of Good Hope; but that he expected to receive information of a favourable nature, and gave us hopes of a termination of hostilities. I perceive that more information has since been received, and no doubt despatches have been received by the Colonial Secretary. I therefore venture to ask the right hon. Gentleman what is the nature of those despatches, and how far they support the hopes he held out to the House? I perceive, likewise, by the intelligence from the Cape, that some dissatisfaction has been caused by the non-arrival of the Constitution; and if it be convenient to the right hon. Gentleman, it would be desirable if he could now make an explanation regarding it.

swer to the first part of the question of the noble Lord, I am very happy to be able to say that the recent intelligence from the Cape has very much, if not entirely, confirmed the favourable view I held out at the commencement of the Session, and to which the noble Lord has just referred. Perhaps I cannot better put the House in possession of the extent to which the information is really favourable than by reading a few words from the despatch of General Cathcart conveying the intelligence:—

“I might now almost report that the war is at an end; but, although characterised as a war, it has been, in fact, a rebellion. A war may be terminated by the surrender or capitulation of the hostile sovereign or chief, who answers for his people, but in the suppression of a rebellion the refractory subjects of the ruling Power must all be chastised and subdued. This has nearly been accomplished, and military occupation must keep them in subjection; but as it is difficult to define the origin or nature of this war, if it be considered as a war, so it is difficult to define the time when peace may be considered to be restored.”

In confirmation of that report of General Cathcart I may mention that Macomo, one of the principal chiefs, has been expelled from the Waterklooff, and though he has not yet surrendered, he has been driven to the Amatola mountains, with Colonel Eyre in pursuit of him. The Hottentot leader Uithalder, is, I believe, still in the Amatolas, where his followers are reduced to a very few in number, and that he is in a difficult position, though the latest accounts do not refer to him in any particular manner. I hope this intelligence will be satisfactory to the House, and that the House will see that I was not too sanguine in my recent anticipations. I shall proceed now to answer the second part of the noble Lord's question respecting the dissatisfaction which he says is felt at the Cape in consequence of the non-arrival of the Constitution. I feel that this question is one of interest both in this House and in the Colony, and I hope the House will indulge me if, in answering the question, I enter into some explanation as to the conduct which the Government has pursued, and their reasons for that conduct. Up to this time Her Majesty's Government have not thought it to be their duty to confirm the Constitution; but I beg to add when I say that, that I feel extreme regret that they felt themselves obliged to take that course. I think the conduct of the Government in the last Session, with regard to New Zealand and Australia, proves that we have no indisposition to trust our colonists with the power of self-government to which Englishmen are accustomed, and to which they have a right to look. On the contrary, they are most anxious to see the principle extended; and with regard to the Cape of Good Hope, I most distinctly admit that the faith of the Imperial Government has been so strongly pledged to grant free representative institutions to that Colony, that the question of granting those institutions must be only regarded as one of time. The House, however, at the same time must admit that, considering the particular position of the Cape Colony at this time, and the great changes that have taken place in the state of that Colony since the free Constitution was proposed and decided upon, it is a case in which it is the duty of the Government to exercise great caution and deliberation. We might, no doubt, have caught a passing cheer from this House by coming down last July and stating that the Constitution, from the state of that Colony, should be at once conceded; but, irrespective of other considerations to which I must hereafter briefly advert, we found that in the Constitution which came over from the Cape last July, the important question of the franchise was surrounded with new and unexpected difficulties. The House is aware that the Constitution ordinance was sent out by Earl Grey, and that the Council at the Cape was called upon to decide on that Ordinance. The House is also aware that when the Council at the Cape took that Ordinance into consideration last February, an Amendment was moved and carried very much raising the proposed franchise. Of this the House is aware; but the House is not aware that subsequent to the passing of that Ordinance of the Council, it was discovered, from the opinion of the Attorney General of the Cape of Good Hope, that the franchise sent out by Earl Grey in the Constitution ordinance, instead of being, as it was supposed to be, a very liberal, comprehensive, and widely-extended franchise, restricted in fact the elective franchise more than the Amendment that was carried. When the question of the Constitution was discussed by the Council at the Cape, it was proposed that every person occupying property of the value of 25*l.* for twelve months should have the franchise. A secession from the Council took place, and the four seceding Members drew up a plan of Constitution. In their plan of a Constitution

it was laid down again that there should be a property franchise of 25*l.*; and in illustration of the light in which the franchise was viewed at the Cape, they stated that it was intended to extend the franchise to every coloured man at the Cape that was neither a vagrant, a pauper, nor a criminal. It was intended for a very extensive franchise—it was regarded universally at the Cape as a very extended franchise, and that the object of it was to embrace the coloured population; but the franchise sent out by Earl Grey, instead of being a property qualification of 25*l.*, required the occupation of buildings of the value of 25*l.* Last February the Council discussed the question on the understanding that it was an extended franchise; and it was only after the Amendment was proposed and carried, that on the construction of the Attorney General at the Cape, it appeared that it was not so liberal a franchise as was supposed. The Attorney General was called on to put his opinion in writing, and he did put the opinion in writing, that it was a very limited, instead of a very extended, franchise. The House will perceive that the Government thus found themselves placed in an unexpected difficulty; they had three questions regarding the franchise before them—the original franchise, the amended franchise as altered by the Council, and the Attorney General's construction of Earl Grey's franchise, differing from the others. Looking to the extent of the population at the Cape, and the peculiar state of the Colony, I very naturally inquired for some statistical information under these circumstances. I naturally inquired what would be the effect of the franchise on the population, and I found there was no statistical information in existence. I found no person could tell me how many persons would be admitted to the franchise under the various denominations, and with regard even to the population the greatest difference of opinion existed. I wrote, therefore, to Lieutenant-Governor Darling for information, and from him I have received an answer, dated the 9th of October last. He says—

“Your observations with respect to the 25*l.* franchise are undoubtedly just. I believe that the limitation which the Attorney General, when called upon for his written opinion by me, assigned to that franchise, is not generally received, or by any means known, in the colony. But it is the view which, if words have any meaning at all, must have been attached to it by all who have paid any attention to the language of the clause. So inaccurate is our statistical information, so various the tendency of that which I obtain from individuals, that I cannot as yet come to any satisfactory conclusion as to which franchise would, upon the whole, admit the greatest number of the labouring population."

This state of things involves us in considerable difficulty. We have further to consider the character of the population at the Cape, and here, again, we have no statistical knowledge; but I observe, from an approximation to it, that if the population were divided into six parts, it would be found that one-sixth were British, two-sixths Dutch, and three-sixths, or one-half of the whole, coloured people. Since it was determined to grant this Constitution, a considerable number of those coloured people were in arms against the Crown. Under these circumstances we must exercise the greatest caution in deciding the important preliminary step of the settlement of the franchise. We must either alter the Ordinance so as to bring it back to the original property qualification, or confirm Earl Grey's plan, which would be, in fact, a delusion on the Colony, or adopt the Amendment. We, therefore, experience considerable difficulty in establishing free institutions in a Colony where there are various races and a large body of people. I think the House will admit that this ground alone affords sufficient reason for hesitation on the part of the Government; but, in addition to this, I must beg the House will recollect that, by the occurrence of late affairs at the Cape, most important questions have arisen, and wait for discussion, with regard to the future government of that Colony. We shall have to decide whether the Orange territory shall be retained; we shall have also to decide as to the eastern boundary of the Cape, as to the whole state of the Government, and as to whether the Colony shall be divided into two Governments. On this subject I thought it to be my duty to communicate with the Governor of the Colony, and I have only received an answer by the late mail. The House will recollect that every one of those questions bears closely on the question as to the shape in which the Constitution should be granted. I have further to remind the House that the Governor of the Colony is engaged in prosecuting the war; and I have the authority of the noble Lord himself in 1851, when referring to Sir Harry Smith, that while the Governor is employed in performing his duties as a general, it is impossible for him, as Governor, to assist in bringing the Constitution into operation. For these reasons, and as the Governor has not sent the report which Earl Grey called for, we thought it our duty to pause for further information; but I beg distinctly to say that we are prepared to grant a free Constitution to the Cape Colony as soon as we think it can be done with a due regard to the interests of the Colony and our duty to the Crown.

LORD JOHN RUSSELL: After the statement just made by the right hon. Baronet, I feel it necessary to ask some further questions. The first question I have to ask is, whether that opinion which he has stated with regard to Earl Grey's proposed Ordinance has been given only by the Attorney General of the Cape, or whether that opinion has been confirmed by the law officers of the Crown in this country; secondly, whether there was not reserved in the Ordinance sent out to the Cape a power to alter the original Ordinance, or the Ordinance that came from the Cape after the Constitution had been received here; and, lastly, whether, in the present state of affairs, the right hon. Gentleman has any objection to lay the papers relating to the Constitution before the House?

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON: Sir, my answer to the first question of the noble Lord is, that I have not taken the formal opinion of the law officers of the Crown, but I have submitted the question to the highest law authority in the country, who states he has no reasonable doubt that that is the proper construction of the clause. In reply to the second question, the Ordinance does, I admit, contain that power; but I think the explanation I have given must show the noble Lord that until we have more statistical information, and are better prepared for the whole policy we should adopt, it would not be well to exercise that power. In answer to the third question, I have no objection to lay the papers on the table.

THE DERBY ELECTION.

SIR ALEXANDER COCKBURN was about to rise to bring under the consideration of the House the petition of the Electors of the Borough of Derby, when

MR. SPEAKER: I think it right to direct the attention of the House to what I consider an informality in this petition, and if the House shall be of the same opinion, it will not be competent for the hon. and learned Member for Southampton to proceed with his Motion. I wish, in the first place, to call its attention to a clause in the 11th and 12th Victoria, which declares what shall be deemed an Election Petition. This clause enacts that every petition presented to the House of Commons within the time from time to time allowed by the House for receiving Election Petitions, complaining of an undue election and return of any Member of Parliament, or that no return had been made, and which petition shall be signed by some person who had voted, or had a right to vote, at the election to which it related, shall be deemed an Election Petition. Now, this petition begins by stating—

“That your petitioners are electors of the Borough of Derby, and voted at the last election of Members to serve in this present Parliament for the said Borough.”

It contains another allegation, namely—

“That the return of the said Thomas Berry Horsfall was procured by illegal and corrupt means, and by an organised system of bribery, which was resorted to, and successfully carried out, for the purpose of procuring, and which did procure, the said return.”

And the prayer of the petition is as follows:—

“Your petitioners therefore humbly pray your Honourable House to institute a full and searching inquiry into the allegations of this petition, and into the proceedings of the said Right Hon. William Beresford, with reference to the last election for the Borough of Derby.”

Now the question is, whether this allegation—

should not be considered as an allegation complaining of an undue return for the Borough of Derby, in which case the petition would be an Election Petition, as defined by the Statute.

SIR ALEXANDER COCKBURN: Understanding, Sir, that you entertain a strong opinion upon the point of formality, which you have stated to the House, I should not be inclined to struggle against that opinion; but it strikes me that inasmuch as the prayer of the petition is not to make void the return, and inasmuch as the bribery that is alleged is not stated to have been committed by the sitting Member, or by any person for whose acts the sitting Member would be responsible, this petition, it strikes me, does not come within the clause of the Act. At the same time, I think it will be a great pity to take up the time of the House in discussing a question of that kind; and if, Sir, you entertain that view, I will withdraw my Motion—for I have not the slightest wish to press it forward against your opinion—and will leave the petitioners, if they think proper, to present another petition.

SIR JOHN YARDE BULLER said, he begged to state, on behalf of his right hon. Friend the Secretary at War, that he (Sir J. Y. Buller) was quite prepared on his part to go into the case now, unless Mr. Speaker ruled that the Motion of the hon. and learned Gentleman (Sir A. Cockburn) could not be entertained by the House.

MR. SPEAKER: If the House allows the debate to proceed on this petition, it will really have received a petition which it ought not to have received at all, because the Act states that no election petitions can be received by the House unless they are endorsed by the officer of election recognizances, who must state that the recognizances had been properly entered. Now, if this petition comes within the definition given in the Act of an election petition, then it ought to have been endorsed by the officer of election recognizances; and as it has not been so endorsed, I do not think it ought to have been received; and I am of opinion that the House cannot proceed with the debate.

SIR ALEXANDER COCKBURN: This, then, being your view, Sir, as I said before, I will not struggle against it, but will withdraw my Motion. But I do think these petitioners are bound to give the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary at War an opportunity of clearing himself of the charges that have been brought against him; and, therefore, I hope the parties who presented this petition—having failed from the informality which you have pointed out—will not hesitate to come before the House again with the least possible delay.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: It is unnecessary for me, after what the hon. and learned Gentleman has said, to add a word. I merely rise to say, I think it would be inexpedient to act contrary to the regulations of the House on such an important subject. But I think there will be no difficulty in devising some means by which a full and speedy inquiry shall be given to it, and I think that must be the wish of every Gentleman on both sides of the House.

Order that the Petition do lie upon the table, read, and discharged:—Petition withdrawn.

LAW PROCEDURE (IRELAND).

MR. WHITESIDE moved for leave to bring in a Bill to amend the procedure in the Superior Courts of Common Law in Ireland. The Preamble of the Bill recited—

"That it was expedient to simplify and amend the course of procedure as to the process, practice, pleadings, and evidence in the Superior Courts of Common Law in Ireland, so as to make the same less dilatory and expensive, and to prevent substantial justice from being defeated by reason of the variety of forms of action, the technicalities and prolixity of pleadings, and the unnecessary length of records; and to consolidate the provisions of several statutes and rules of Court relating to such proceedings, and also to enable the Superior Courts of Common Law to give effect to certain legal rights and just defences, so far as might be, without the expense and delay of a resort to a Court of Equity."

The necessity for a reform like that proposed by the Bill he now had to ask permission of the House to bring in, was obvious and pressing. The Legislature, in its wisdom, had created County Courts throughout England and Ireland, and made the procedure in those Courts short and inexpensive. Now, in his humble judgment, the reform of the Courts of Law had begun at the wrong end; but as the County Courts were established, and had distributed justice to the satisfaction of the public, our duty was to preserve, and if necessary to improve, them for the purposes to which they were designed. The great fact was, that at present there were two classes of tribunals in Ireland—one administering cheap justice, with a jurisdiction extending to 40*l.*; and the other set of tribunals, of superior structure and excellent design, administering justice in cases involving the amount of 4*l.*, at comparatively a dear rate, and in comparatively a cumbersome method. It appeared to him that these two systems, acting on opposite principles and practice, could not exist; and nothing remained to be done but to reform the Superior Courts of Common Law on a comprehensive plan, and in accordance with the wants of the public and the spirit of the age. The House was aware that in the County Courts the question at issue between the parties was brought to a hearing by a short and simple plaint. But the case was far different with respect to the proceedings in the Superior Courts of Common Law. There we had the writ, which gives the defendant no information; and the appearance, which gives as little to the plaintiff; then the plaintiff's declaration, which must be adapted to a particular form of action, told the defendant nothing; and, next, the plea of the general issue by the defendant told the plaintiff nothing; and other proceedings followed, which left the parties as little acquainted with the case as if there had been no pleadings at all. Sometimes there was what was termed in law a replication; then there might be a rejoinder, and afterwards in succession a surrejoinder, rebutter, and surrebutter. At any part of the series of proceedings a demurrer might be put in, which would have the effect, as classically expressed, of hanging up the suit for twelve months. But, supposing the issue of fact to be joined by the parties, the whole of the proceedings must then be transcribed on a formidable, roll of parchment, which was called the record, although all the pleadings were recorded already; and this record was stamped, tied up, and despatched to the Judges' Registrar before the trial. The Registrar never looked at it, the Judge followed the same course, and the counsel on either side never read it; the ends of justice being satisfied by a short and simple abstract of the proceedings, which was prepared by the junior counsel, and handed to the Judge for his information. If the counsel adverted to it, he did so only for the purpose of tripping up his adversary on some formal and technical point. One question, then, to be decided was, what was the use of continuing this costly and utterly abortive proceeding? Lord Brougham, in his speech on Law Reform, delivered in that House, and which led to so many important and valuable results, truly said—

"I regret to say that the last century and a half has witnessed great and prejudicial alterations in the original plan of pleading, so that the record, in the great majority of cases, instead of exhibiting a plain view of what each party is prepared to prove, contains an endless multitude of words, from which, if the real matter in dispute can be gathered at all, it is only by guesswork, or by circumstances out of the record, relating to things of which he gives not even a hint."

He then added—

"Of the circumstances peculiar to the transaction, the pleadings tell the defendant nothing, they tell the counsel nothing, they tell the Judge nothing. It may be said that the defendant must know the cause of action himself; but that does not always follow, especially if the allegations are groundless. There is, however, one person who must know the cause of action, and that is the plaintiff. He ought, for the satisfaction of all concerned, to state it distinctly."

It sometimes happened even that this expensive record was framed and drawn up on a wrong issue, and the Judges could then do nothing but direct a re-pleader. In addition to this, there was, moreover, a large class of minor evils—uncertainty in pleading and other matters—all leading to great expense, and consequently to a denial of justice; and it must be remembered, that the plaintiff is compelled to select at his peril a particular form of action, and to describe it by the right name. His purpose on the present occasion was, if possible, to reform these abuses. He objected to the present system, because the steps in the cause were too many, and he thought they ought to be made fewer, and the proceeding rendered cheaper. He objected, next, to the falseness of pleas—injurious alike to morality and justice—to a lengthy record of matters already recorded, to the triumph of form over substance, of technicality over truth. He objected also to a suitor being driven like a shuttlecock from a Court of Law to a Court of Equity, and being sent to Chancery to be enabled to go to Common Law. He objected to the anomaly that some debts were assignable at Law, others only in Equity, and insisted that a remedy should be applied to these abuses, and that to be satisfactory, the remedy should be searching, cheap, and comprehensive. He had now sketched the evils which existed, and his objections to them. What were the remedies? He first wished the House to consider the principle of this Bill, and then to see what difficulty there would be in carrying it out. Its leading principle was to assimilate the procedure of the Superior Courts of Common Law in Ireland to that of the County Courts, so that justice might be done simply and cheaply; and, if that end were attained, it would recommend the venerable tribunals of the country to the confidence of the people. Now, there was an ample supply of materials for a measure of practical Law Reform. 1st, There was the procedure of the County Courts of England; 2nd, the procedure of the County Courts of Ireland; 3rd, the Act for the Regulation of Civil Procedure in Scotland; 4th, the Report of the Commissioners on the Common Law Procedure of England; 5th, the Act for the Amendment of the law in England passed last Session; and, 6th, he was not afraid to add, the American Code and the Report of the Commissioners of the State of New York. The first head of any great measure of reform was to abolish all distinctions as to the form of action. At present there were eight or nine different forms of action. For instance, Breach of Duty might be converted into Breach of Covenant, and Breach of Covenant into Breach of Duty. The value of retaining these forms would be discovered by the recollection of the great case of the squib. A party at a fair fired off a squib—it fell on some gingerbread. Another party near at hand took it up, and threw it at a third; it struck him in the eye, and he lost his sight. He brought his action of trespass against the party who fired off the squib. The jury gave him a verdict for damages; but a question arose on the form of the action. A reasonable person would have supposed that the substantial question was whether the plaintiff had lost his eye by the act of the defendant. But, no, said the lawyers, that is immaterial; the real question is, whether it should be called an action of trespass vi et armis, or an action of trespass on the case, and it was contended that it must be an action on the case, because the squib had first touched the gingerbread. Sir William Blackstone exhausted his learning in proving that the unfortunate man who had lost his eye was entitled to receive nothing, because his action was brought in an improper form. The learned Commentator failed in his attempt; but his argument [ought to have mitigated his eulogium upon pleading. That was an English case. He would now give an Irish one of the same nature. A priest was travelling outside a stage-coach; a race took place between that and a rival coach, and the horses ran away. The priest was alarmed—he threw himself off the coach, and broke his leg. He brought his action for the injury; but the pleader unluckily called it by a wrong name—he called it trespass. It was argued that it was an act of necessity—that the priest threw himself off to save his life. On the other side it was said he had not been struck—that the act was his own; and, because he would not remain on the coach and lose his life, to settle the point of law, his action was held to be wrong; and he not only lost his leg, but his damages also. These cases might be multiplied, and showed the mischievous effects of retaining technical distinctions in forms of action. The Commissioners for the Improvement of Common Law Procedure had recommended their abolition, and a clause to that effect had been introduced into the Bill for England. The House of Lords, however, struck out that clause; and although, when the Bill came to this House, the hon. and learned Attorney General had done all he could to improve it, yet that portion of it had been lost to the public. Possibly their Lordships preserved the forms of action, because the English Bill preserved the system of special pleading with which those forms were interwoven. To meet this difficulty he proposed to abolish both. The next step of reform, therefore, after abolishing the distinction in forms of action, was to abolish what was technically called special pleading. He wished to have distinctly stated the ground of action on the one hand, and on the other the ground of defence; so that each might be intelligible to every man—stated in the language of the people—who ought to understand the language of the law. For that purpose forms of plaint were given in this draft of a Bill; but a literal adherence to them was of no consequence, provided the substantial ground of action were stated. This was the principle acted upon in the County Courts of Ireland every day. The great end of all special pleading was to eliminate an issue—to ascertain the true question to be tried in the fewest words; and this valuable principle was carefully preserved by the proposed measure. The Bill further provided, that the plaintiff should supply an abstract of the issue to be tried. If his adversary disputed the form or substance of the issue proposed, he might take the opinion of a junior Judge of the Court, at the risk of costs, if his objection was frivolous, and the question stated in the abstract was to be taken as the question to be tried. A simple question was now buried under a mass of papers which might be stated in a very small compass. They had an instance of this in the books of 2,000 folios of pleading, irritating the Judges so that they asked counsel in Court to settle the issue. They did so on a quarter of a sheet of paper; and he believed that almost every question to be tried might be as concisely stated. What was the use of a record except as stuffing for the attorneys to make their brief? Again, he objected to the number of steps in a suit, and he proposed that process should not only call upon the party to appear in Court on a certain day, but should also tell him why he was so called upon, and should state concisely the cause of action. The declaration as a separate step was useless. So, on the other hand, he proposed that the appearance and the defence should be combined in one. The next important question was whether or not the pleadings should be verified, and how? This Bill contained a new principle, and that was that the plaintiff should verify his plaint by a short affidavit to the effect that he believed what he had stated was true; and that the defendant should in like manner verify his pleading in defence. At the present day there was no check or limit to false pleading. Suppose an action were brought for payment of a bond. The pleas set up might be that the bond was not given—that was lie the first; that the bond was paid on the day required—that was lie the second; that the bond was paid after the day—that was lie the third; that a release was given—and that was lie the fourth. All that was the flourish of the pleader; but he proposed that the pleading now should be tested by the oath of the defendant. It was nothing but a revival of the ancient system of pleading in this country, which was bottomed on truth (formerly if a man denied his deed falsely, he was fined and imprisoned); and it had been recommended and adopted in the Code of Civil Procedure in New York. Upon that subject the Code contained the following admirable passage:—

“Ought these solemn allegations of the parties, which are called pleadings, and which set forth the cause of action and defence, to be verified or not? The solution of this question depends upon two others—first, whether a party should be allowed to aver what he does not believe; and, second, whether there be any better test of his belief than his own affidavit. Both questions admit of easy answers. There are several reasons why a party should not be permitted to aver in a court of justice what he does not believe. First, the courts are, or should be, schools of morals. It becomes them to set virtuous examples. Of all the institutions of society, Courts of justice should be the most sacred to truth. Whenever, therefore, they sanction, connive at, or open the door to untruths, they falsify their own professions, and become the corrupters rather than the teachers of mankind. Second, men should be protected, as far as possible, against false charges. It is signally unjust that any person should vex another with a claim founded upon statements which he does not believe. . . . What sort of protection does it afford if it allows these rights to be assailed by every adventurer, even though he furnishes not only no security against his misconduct, and no proofs of his charge, but no test of his sincerity—not so much even as his affidavit of belief in it? Third, lawsuits are a disadvantage to society at large. They require a large array of public officers. They require the attendance of citizens, either as jurors or as witnesses, to the detriment of their own affairs. It seems, consequently, most fit that a check, at least as great as this, should be interposed to the prosecution of frivolous or factious lawsuits. Fourth, if the party be not confined in his pleadings to what he believes, no adequate reform in pleading can ever be effected. . . . If, then, it be clear that no party should be allowed to aver in a court of justice what he does not believe, the remaining inquiry is, whether there be any better test of one's belief than his affidavit? Here there seems no room for question. The oath is the universal test applied to the consciences of witnesses. If it be good for the witnesses, it is equally good for the litigants."

He would now explain why it was that this Bill contained 274 clauses. The Bill brought in for England by the hon. and learned Attorney General, who had bestowed on it all the care and anxiety possible, had been considered defective in some respects by certain Societies in the metropolis for the amendment of the law. In order that the present measure might obviate one of those objections, it was a measure of codification and condensation. All the Acts which had been passed for the amendment of the law as to pleading, practice, and evidence in Ireland, had been condensed and concentrated into this Bill; and if Parliament should accept the new procedure contained in it, the new procedure was made to apply to all those useful statutes which previously existed. Another reform proposed was, to abolish the necessity of personal service of process. By the County Courts Act of Ireland, service was not required to be personal on a debtor; it would be sufficient if process were served upon any member of his family, as pointed out in the Act, and a similar rule prevailed in the Court of Chancery. Why, then, should they insist on a different rule in serving process of a Court of Common Law? By this Bill the system of substituted service was adopted without the expense of applying to the Court to allow it. He now approached a subject of some importance—the equitable jurisdiction of Courts of Common Law. He was quite aware of the distinction that existed between the Courts of Equity and the Courts of Common Law; that the former dealt with complicated questions, arising between many parties, while in the latter the simplicity and directness of the ancient Common Law were applied to determine a precise question arising between the plaintiff and defendant upon the pleadings. But while he admitted that it was impossible to unite Law and Equity with the present systems of procedure, yet, on the other hand, he thought it was perfectly possible to remove many obstructions that now prevented the free action of the Superior Courts of Common Law, and the necessity of applying to the Court of Chancery for the purpose, so that one tribunal might do complete justice between the parties. First, then, he proposed that choses in action should be assignable at law. He proposed to make every form of debt assignable at Common Law as they were in Equity. Assignments, he proposed, should be registered in an Office. He was not without an authority, and a strange authority, upon this subject—that of Oliver Cromwell. In 1654 a Commission was appointed by the then House of Commons to consider the best mode of reforming our laws; and on that Commission sat Mr. Oliver Cromwell and Mr. Mathew Hale. He trusted that what had been recommended by such great authorities would not be considered as a rash innovation. He next proposed to deal with cases of lost bonds and lost bills of exchange or other instruments. At present a person losing a bill of exchange had to go to a Court of Chancery to settle an indemnity. He proposed to give to Courts of Common Law all the powers of Courts of Equity in deciding on the sufficiency of any indemnity for a lost bond or bill of exchange, or other instrument of a like nature. The Court of Chancery now must also be applied to by a person who had a contract for the possession of premises but not a legal title. In the County Courts of Ireland the existence of such an agreement for a lease would prevent the landlord from ejecting the tenant, and the Judges in the Superior Courts would on appeal confirm such a decision. He now proposed to give the Judges in the first instance the power they at present possessed after the decision of the inferior Courts, and to make a contract of that nature a good defence to an action of ejectment in a superior Court, thus saving the party from the necessity of a Chancery suit. Another part of the Bill applied to the removal of obstructions from the trial and ascertainment of a legal right in reference to a legal matter. A party now desired to dispute the will of his ancestor, who had disinherited him, and wanted to try its validity. If it affected real estate, it must be tried according to Common Law by a Judge and Jury; but when the party began to try the validity of the will, he was threatened with "temporary bars," and he could not go on with his action without going into the Court of Chancery for their removal. It was now proposed that the Courts of Common Law should exercise a jurisdiction without the aid of Equity in these cases. Lastly, there was one other subject which he submitted might be made the subject of a legal defence in a Court of Law. There were cases in which a person sued, had, according to the strict letter of the Common Law, no defence, but had equity, conscience, reason, and justice with him; and when he went to a Court of Equity, it would grant a perpetual injunction against his adversary, so that he could never move against him in a Court of Common law. To give Common Law Courts a right to decide nice questions of complicated equity, would be impossible; but in such a case, why should a party when he was persecuted wrongfully, be also vexed by a suit in a Court of Equity? If a party could set forth facts which would entitle him to a perpetual injunction in Chancery, it was proposed that such defence should be available at Common Law. These were the principal reforms adverted to by this Bill. They were large and comprehensive, and, in addition to their value in that respect, he thought it would be found, when the table of fees and costs were added, that, in ordinary cases, the costs would be reduced nearly one-half, and certainly one-third, so that failure in a lawsuit would not entail ruin upon the plaintiff or defendant. These propositions, he ventured to hope, would not meet with much opposition, or at least would only be opposed in a friendly spirit—as they were calculated, he firmly believed, to give satisfaction to all classes of the people. He could not conclude without returning his thanks to the Lord Chancellor of Ireland, who had clearly and decidedly expressed his approbation of these measures of reform. The Bill had also received, in reference to the verification of pleadings and other important provisions, the sanction of the Lord Chief Justice of the Queen's Bench in Ireland, and of his right hon. and learned Friend the Attorney General for that country. The object of the measure was to make justice easier, cheaper, and more accessible; and, presenting it in that character, he respectfully solicited for it a favourable reception on the part of the House. It was offered as an instalment of the series of legal reforms which the Government intended to submit, and as such he trusted it would be graciously accepted.

Motion made, and Question proposed—
“ That Leave be given to bring in a Bill to amend the procedure in the Superior Courts of Common Law in Ireland.”

MR. HUME said, that he, for one, heartily thanked the hon. and learned Gentleman for the measure he had thus introduced; and which, he concluded, would have the cordial support of the Government. The reform of the law, on either side of the Channel, was essential, not merely for the removal of delay and uncertainty, but, practically, as an important relief from taxation.

Leave given.

Bill ordered to be brought in by Mr. Solicitor General for Ireland, and Mr. Attorney General.

CALL OF THE HOUSE—MR. VILLIERS' MOTION.

MR. HUME said, he had no desire to detain the House long with his Motion for a call of the House on Monday; but as there were many Members who had never been present on occasions when a call of the House had been enforced, he wished briefly to state the nature of his proposal, and why he considered it expedient. It was the theory of the Constitution, that the Members should be always in attendance when the House was sitting, and it was in conformity with this doctrine that, when a Member died, a Motion was immediately made for a writ to empower the election of a new Member to take his place. His proposal, he was aware, might occasion some trouble to those Members who were not in the habit of attending the House, or who desired, just now, to be in the country; but the duties of Parliament should be attended to by those who accepted its honours. It might be that, as a general rule, the actual business of the House was better done when but comparatively few Members were present; but there were, from time to time, great occasions on which solemn questions vitally affecting the whole Nation were at issue, and upon such occasions it was of vast importance that the entire body of the Representatives of the Nation should be present to record their judgment. Such an occasion was this, on which he now proposed that the House should be called upon to give its complete attendance. Never, in fact, throughout his long Parliamentary experience, had an occasion more essentially requiring the solemn attendance of the universal body of the representation of the people occurred, being, as this was, an occasion on which the Government of the country, unable to form any opinion on the particular subject in question — [“ Oh, oh ! ”]—or, if they had formed an opinion, being ready, in deference to the House, to do this or that—ready, as he understood his right hon. Friend's Resolution, announced that evening—if the House would do so and so, to do so and so too—[The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER: No !] Well, at all events, in Her Majesty's Speech from the Throne there was this paragraph :—

The solemn judgment of the House being thus required on this most vital subject, he considered that the judgment of the whole House should be delivered, and therefore it was that he proposed a call of the House should take place. It would not do to go on shilly-shally, one day this way, another day that; they must come to a clear, solemn, and general decision on the matter once for all. Hon. Gentlemen who desired to have a full knowledge of the occasions on which the House had directed such calls to be made, would find an accurate account of them in a work which had been laid on the table of the House, by Mr. Speaker, and which ought to be printed at the expense of the House, and placed in the hands of every Member—he referred to Mr. May's talented work on the constitution, powers, and privileges of Parliament. There was, some fifty years ago, a sort of manual of the Rules and Orders of the House, and such a work ought now to be placed in the hands of each Member, with the more recently elected, among whom it was no easy matter to understand the usages and regulations of the House. However, in Mr. May's book would be found all the information requisite on the subject of calls of the House. Upon reference to that work, he found that there had been, in the course of the last thirty-two years, since 1820, forty-three calls of the House, the intervals between the order and the call itself having varied from one day to six weeks and one day; the last call of the House had been in 1840 on the subject of the Corn Laws. In March, 1822, for example, the present noble Member for the city of London moved for a call of the House on the subject of Parliamentary Reform, and in that case the interval between the order and the call was six weeks; on the 5th of May, 1829, Sir Robert, then Mr. Peel moved a call of the House on the subject of Roman Catholic disabilities; on the 18th of May, 1832, he himself moved for a call of the House on the subject of Reform and of Ministerial arrangements, and in that case the interval between the order and the call was three days. In 1833, on Lord Althorp's Bill for the Suppression of Disturbances in Ireland; in 1834, on the Motion of Mr. Spring Rice, now Lord Monteagle, on the subject of Mr. O'Connell's Motion for a Repeal of the Union. In 1835 a call took place, on the Motion of Lord John Russell, on the Irish Church, at thirteen days' notice; on the 19th of April, 1836, upon the Motion of Mr. Daniel Whittle Harvey, on the State of the Nation; in 1838, upon the subject of Canada; in 1838 again, after twelve days' notice, upon the Motion of Sir William Molesworth, on Colonial administration; in 1839, after three days' notice, upon the Corn Laws; and in 1839 again, after ten days' notice, upon the Motion of Lord Stanley on National Education in Ireland. He admitted the importance of the topics which were discussed on all those occasions; but he would not admit that they were of superior importance to the question which was about to be submitted—a question in which the fate of Free Trade was involved. He had obtained these precedents with the assistance of Mr. Erskine May and the librarians of the House; and he wished to assure new Members that, if they were desirous of obtaining any information upon such subjects, they would always find the utmost courtesy and attention from the librarians. Upon all these occasions the principle laid down had been that the House should be fully attended by Members. In the present instance the constituencies of many places had great doubts as to the principles on which their Members had been returned—whether as Free-traders or Protectionists. He thought it, therefore, of importance for the final settlement of this question that the greatest possible number of Members should be present. He begged to move, in the usual form, the Motion of which he had given notice.

MR. EWART seconded the Motion.

Motion made, and Question put—

“That the House be called over on Monday next the 22nd instant:—That such Members as shall not then attend be sent for in custody of the Serjeant at Arms.”

MR. ROBERT PALMER did not know whether it was the intention of any hon. Member to oppose this Motion. So far as he was personally concerned, it was a matter of perfect indifference to him whether the House was called over or not, because he was not generally absent from his post on such important questions as that to be discussed on Tuesday next. But, as the hon. Member had stated that the object of a call of the House was that every Member should be present, he would beg to ask the hon. Member what power he had to insure the attendance of Members except at the call of the House? If he could insure their attendance at the debate, that would be something; but the fact was, that he could neither ensure it at the debate nor the division. There was no such power; and half those who attended on Monday and answered to their names might, if they chose, be absent on Tuesday. He merely threw this out that the hon. Member might see whether any useful object could be gained by this Motion; because, if not, it would hardly be worth while putting people to the inconvenience which it would occasion.

MR. HUME said, the House had the power of enforcing the attendance of Members on Monday; and if they attended on Monday and absented themselves on Tuesday, that would be a question between them and their constituencies.

MR. EWART said, that, although there was no security for the attendance of Members on Tuesday, yet there was a strong probability that if they attended on Monday they would do so on Tuesday. There must, moreover, in his opinion, have been some good reason for the adoption of a rule by the House which had been so frequently acted upon.

VISCOUNT BERNARD said, he wished to point out to the hon. Member for Montrose (Mr. Hume) the great inconvenience and injustice which he might occasion to some Members if he persevered in this Motion. He was there prepared to vote; but if he had been at home in the south of Ireland it would have been utterly impossible for him to arrive at the House in time after being made aware of the decision of the House.

MR. S. CARTER said, that when Parliament was called together by the Queen's proclamation it was the duty of all Members to attend; and if, instead of being there they were in the south of Ireland or the south of France, or anywhere else, they had no right to plead such absence from their duty as an argument against a proposition of this nature.

The CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, he perceived that Mr. Erskine May, the gentleman whom his hon. Friend (Mr. Hume) had so very justly and properly praised, observed in his work upon The Law, Privileges, Proceedings, and Usage of Parliament, “If it be really intended to enforce the call, not less than a week or ten days should intervene between the order and the day named for the call.” He thought it always expedient to take as great care as possible that when there was a call of the House there should be very ample time between the order and the day named; but certainly, as a general rule, he should be very sorry to oppose a Motion of this kind; and, as he gathered from the feeling of the House that there was a desire to make the Motion of the hon. Member for Wolverhampton (Mr. C. Villiers) more or less a Motion of confidence in the Government, he should wish to see as large an attendance upon the occasion as possible; and certainly he should not himself oppose the Motion of the hon. Gentleman.

MR. SHEE said, he wished to state the case of some hon. Friends of his, Members for counties in the south and west of Ireland, who he knew could not by possibility be present. Having had no reason to suppose that any business would so soon come before the House on which any great difference of opinion could arise, they had not yet attended the House; and it was impossible that they could now arrive in time; that being so, he thought it would be very hard upon them that they should be taken into the custody of the Serjeant-at-Arms. Unless the House had the power, therefore, to make exceptions in such cases, the Motion would be calculated to inflict a great injustice.

LORD JOHN RUSSELL said, he thought it would have been much better if the hon. Member for Montrose, immediately after the announcement of the hon. Member for Wolverhampton that he intended to bring forward his Motion, had given notice of his intention at an early day to make a Motion for a call of the House. [Mr.

HUME: I did so the very next day.] As it was, the time at present was certainly very short. However, according to the practice which he had always seen adopted when the House had been called over, if any valid excuse for absence were given, such, for instance, as being abroad, and unable to arrive in time, that had always been taken by the House, upon the allegation of any hon. Member, to be sufficient. He presumed his hon. Friend intended to pursue the same course in the present instance, and that on any Member not appearing, the question would be asked whether there were any ground or excuse for his absence. Having said thus much, he must say that he did not see any great advantage in the Motion. Certainly it had been practised upon former occasions when any questions of great importance were to be discussed, and, as the Motion of the hon. Member for Wolverhampton was one of that nature, it was unquestionably of great importance that it should be known whether they had adopted Free Trade and renounced Protection, or had returned to Protection and renounced Free Trade: he thought then, in this instance, the practice of former years might very well be followed.

MINUTES.] Sat First in Parliament.—The Duke of Brandon, after the Death of his Father.
Took the Oaths.—Several Lords.

THE EXHIBITION (SYDENHAM).

LORD PANMURE having presented a petition from the Free Synod of Aberdeen against the opening of the Exhibition (Sydenham) on any part of the Lord's Day,

The EARL of DERBY said, he was glad to have the opportunity of calling their Lordships' attention to the subject to which the petition had reference, and respecting which he had not had a previous opportunity of giving an explanation. He begged to be permitted to state how the case stood with respect to the proposed charter which was sought to be obtained for the Crystal Palace, because misapprehensions had arisen concerning it which had taken a great hold on the public mind, and he should be gratified if the explanation he could give would relieve any of the parties from their apprehensions, and relieve him from the vast number of memorials which were presented to him almost every day of his life. When first it was determined to form the Crystal Palace Company, it was a great object with the Directors to have a charter of incorporation—not to give them any powers which the law did not give them before, but for the purpose of securing to the shareholders the advantage of a limited liability, which would afford great facilities for carrying into effect the objects they contemplated; and a memorial was presented to the Government accordingly. His right hon. Friend the President of the Board of Trade (Mr. Henley) was not in this country at the time the Company made their application; but he (the Earl of Derby) saw the Directors of the Company; and when they had stated their views to him, he stated to them that he thought the most convenient course they could pursue was to put down in the form of a draught Charter the objects they had in view, and the restrictions to which they proposed to submit, in regard to the opening of the building on the Sunday, in order to obtain the countenance of the Government. He had since been in communication with his right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Home Department (Mr. Walpole), and the parties were informed that they were to consider the conversation that had taken place as merely an explanation of the views of the Government with regard to restrictions as to the opening on Sundays; but as to the issuing of any charter at all, that was a subject for consideration on the part of the proper authorities. They had proceeded on the assumption that there was nothing in the law which prevented the opening of the Palace on Sundays, and thought they had only to consider what clauses it would be necessary to introduce on granting the charter. He had no hesitation in saying, for his own part, that (subject to the restrictions which the Company had declared its willingness to submit to), the opening of the Crystal Palace on the Sunday, far from being a desecration of the Sabbath, would be a great benefit to the people of this overcrowded metropolis, by enabling them to avail themselves on the Sunday afternoon of the innocent recreation and amusement provided for them by the building and the beautiful grounds attached to it. If this scheme had involved an exhibition of articles of manufactures, machinery, and commerce, within the walls, and the attendance of the exhibitors to explain their inventions in arts, science, and manufactures, or if it had required the presence of a numerous body of attendants to guard and protect them on the Sunday, he might have taken a very different view of the subject. But the representatives of the Company had stated to him that their object was to close on the Sunday all the exhibition of machinery, manufactures, and commerce, and merely to throw open their beautiful park, garden, and conservatory, setting aside for that purpose certain hours, which would not interfere with the attendance of the population of London at Divine Service in the morning. It was further intimated to him by the Directors that it was their intention to run trains to the building itself, to issue return tickets, and to carry their visitors direct from the locality to London; they would thus be prevented from being scattered over the vicinity, and from being accumulated in the public-houses in the evening. It was also stated to him that it was the intention of the Directors to prohibit the sale of spirituous liquors in the precincts of the building and in the building itself. Subject to those restrictions, and to the risk of violating them, he still continued to be of opinion, notwithstanding the remonstrances that had been addressed to him, that, far from desecrating the Sabbath, the opening of the Crystal Palace on the Sunday would be useful to the population in giving them fresh air and amusement, and in promoting moral and social improvement among the working classes. Since these arrangements had been spoken of, a question had arisen as to whether the opening of the Crystal Palace could not be prohibited under the existing law, and whether under a certain statute—passed for a very different purpose, and enacting that the payment of money for admission into any place of amusement on a Sunday should be deemed an illegal offence—it could be opened at all. If that should be the case, he need not say that no clause inserted in the charter could render that legal which was declared illegal by law; and if such were the law, it could only be altered by the authority of Parliament, and they would not attempt to mislead the public opinion by giving a sanction which they could not really give. The alteration could only be made with the consent of Parliament; and he hoped that he might be permitted to say, on the part of Ministers, that if the payment for admission into the Crystal Palace on the Sunday were found to be contrary to the law, they would be the last persons to ask for the enactment of such a provision as would legalise it, however advantageous they might think it for the health, comfort, and morality of the population. When the clause to which he had referred was proposed to be introduced into the charter, it was looked upon by the Government, and by the promoters of the project, as a restrictive clause; but if the opening of the Crystal Palace should be illegal—a point which was then under the consideration of the law officers of the Crown—no clause authorising it would be inserted in the charter. In that case, the clause must be inserted, not by the consent of Her Majesty's Ministers, but by the authority of Parliament.

The MARQUESS of CLANRICARDE said, he had listened a few nights previous with great gratification to the speech of the noble and learned Lord on the woolsack, in which he referred to four or five subjects of legal reform; but he was disappointed at finding no mention whatever of an amelioration or amendment of the law of partnership. Under the present state of the law it was impossible for persons who had moderate means to associate their capital together, whereby their earnings would fructify in a laudable manner. Why should they not be permitted to associate together under the limited liability which the directors of the Crystal Palace Company were now so anxious to obtain? The consequence of the present state of the law was that they had to go to the Board of Trade for a charter, and the granting of that charter was regulated by no fixed rule whatever. That was a great grievance, because it gave to large capitalists the power to enter into speculations such as this; whereas a large number of small capitalists who were inclined to invest their money in such an undertaking were unable to do so. He would suggest to those who were much more competent to deal with the subject than he was, that it would be a most useful and acceptable reform, if a law of partnership were passed something like that in operation in France, or like that in force in Ireland, which had been found to work most beneficially in that country.

LORD CAMPBELL rose to express the high satisfaction with which he had heard the statement of the noble Earl at the head of Her Majesty's Government, and he trusted that statement would be satisfactory to the great majority of the country. Their Lordships would recollect that he had been no friend originally to the Crystal Palace in Hyde Park, but since it was transferred to Sydenham he was the warm friend of it, as conducive, not only to the recreation of the people, but to the cause of morality and religion. Under the restrictions which the noble Earl had stated, he believed the opening of it on the afternoon of Sundays, would not only be a recreation, but of the greatest advantage. There was an Act of Parliament in force, which prevented the taking money for admission into any place of public amusement or recreation on a Sunday; but he trusted that Parliament would relax that law in favour of the Crystal Palace Company, in consideration of the restrictions mentioned by the noble Earl opposite, and assented to by the Company.

MEETING OF CONVOCATION.

The EARL of SHAFTESBURY wished to put a question to the noble Earl opposite on a subject of great interest. He alluded to the sittings and to the proceedings of Convocation. Many petitions had been, or would be, presented on the subject. He wished to know what were the intentions of the Government with respect to Convocation? It now stood adjourned to the 16th of February; he wished to know whether it would then be allowed to assemble again and proceed to business? He also wished to know whether, during that interval, the Committee appointed by the Lower House of Convocation would be permitted to sit?

The EARL of DERBY: As far as Her Majesty's Government are concerned there is no intention of making any deviation from the customary and ordinary course that for many years has been pursued with respect to Convocation; nor do I understand that there has been any deviation from the ordinary practice, although undoubtedly the meeting of Convocation in the course of the present year has been accompanied with considerable excitement, and has led to long discussion; but the proceedings of Convocation have gone this year no further than they have gone in all the preceding years—that is, they moved and voted an Address to the Crown at the commencement of the Session. It is true that the discussion upon that Address to the Crown—previous to which it would not have been decorous or proper that any power over Convocation should be exercised—lasted for a period of three days; but though it lasted for three days, this is not the first occasion on which there has been a discussion, or on which an Amendment has been moved in Convocation. In the year 1847 the discussion lasted through the whole of one day, and an Amendment was moved, praying the Crown to revive the active powers of Convocation. The power of proroguing Convocation, undoubtedly in the last resort, rests with the Crown; but I believe there has been no instance in which that power has been exercised by the Crown, at least for many years, the power being usually exercised by his Grace the Archbishop of Canterbury, either acting (for that is a doubtful point) upon his own authority, or with the advice of the other bishops, consensu fratrum. On the present occasion I understand that the usual and ordinary course has been adopted, and that the noble Earl is mistaken in speaking of the adjournment of Convocation, for I am informed that the usual course has been pursued, not of adjourning, but of proroguing Convocation in the usual form. The Address having been voted to the Crown, the Convocation has been prorogued by the Archbishop to a period not far from being coincident with the time of the meeting of both Houses of Parliament after the recess. There is nothing unusual in the prorogation of Convocation to a distant day for the purpose of receiving the answer of the Crown to its Address—it is not usual to receive an immediate answer—there is always a prorogation for the purpose of receiving the answer. I have not had the opportunity, since my noble Friend gave notice of asking the question, of communicating with his Grace the Archbishop of Canterbury; but I have no reason to suppose that when Convocation meets again he will depart from the practice that has hitherto universally prevailed, nor do I apprehend that he will do more than lay before Convocation the answer to the Address, and then in the usual form prorogue

the sitting of Convocation. I will not anticipate that the Archbishop will depart from the usual course, or that the intervention of the Crown will be in any respect necessary; but this I have no hesitation in saying, that the Ministers of the Crown have no intention to advise Her Majesty to depart from the ordinary course, or that they are prepared to sanction the revival of the active powers of Convocation. One word as to the committee to which my noble Friend has referred. Officially, I know nothing of the committee. I know, officially, no more than this—that Convocation is prorogued, and that it has appointed a committee to investigate certain matters which had come before it. It is a question of law on which it is not fit that I should pronounce an opinion; but I confess I don't understand myself how a body that is itself prorogued can give any official powers to any other body during its prorogation. I would venture to give an opinion on the point with great diffidence; but if I did, my opinion of the committee is, that the powers of that committee are null and void, and that, on the other hand, there is no power on the part of the Crown, as they have no official cognisance of the committee, to prevent a number of gentlemen meeting together as a private body to consider what will be for the advantage of the Church. That is a question of a legal nature, on which I don't think I ought to pronounce an opinion. It will be seen that from the body of gentlemen meeting, no official communication has been made to the Crown; and, therefore, I do not see how any interference can be made on the part of the Crown to interrupt their sittings.

BUSINESS OF THE SESSION.

The MARQUESS of CLANRICARDE said, that in rising to make the inquiry of which he had given notice, he did not wish to urge on prematurely any debate, or to ask any question which it might be inconvenient for the Government to answer; but he thought it would be for the advantage of public business, and for the private convenience of their Lordships, that the House should know the nature and character of the public business to be proposed before the recess, and of that to be proposed during the remainder of the Session—in fact, generally, what course of public business the Government intended to pursue. He thought that the meeting of Parliament before Christmas did little to lighten the business or to shorten the duration of the spring and summer Session; but it was notorious that Parliament was assembled at the present period of the year, in order that the great commercial principles of the country might be brought to a full, and, he hoped, a final and satisfactory settlement. At the opening of the Session, it was the duty of Government to frame a Speech from the Throne applying to the whole of the business which would be brought forward during its continuance; and certainly the House had had an intimation of a variety of measures which would be laid before it, but it had no definite knowledge either of the nature of those measures or of the precise time at which they would be brought forward. There was no need that he should enumerate what those measures were; but, in his opinion, there could be no objection to the noble Earl opposite telling their Lordships what were the measures, if any, which he intended to introduce before Christmas. The real fact was, that their Lordships were assembled for deliberation on one great subject only, and he thought that it was most wise to avoid any discussion on free trade and protection on the first day of the Session, for their minds were then overwhelmed with sorrow, and were engaged in reflecting on the mournful duty which had devolved upon them, and on the proceedings in preparation for the approaching funeral of the Duke of Wellington. He understood that the noble Earl at that time had postponed all discussion on free trade and protection till after the 26th, when his right hon. Colleague the Chancellor of the Exchequer was to make his statement of his fiscal and financial policy in the other House of Parliament. Since that time he had seen that Her Majesty's Government had announced its intention of proposing an abstract resolution, embodying their views on our commercial policy, previously to the 26th instant; but he thought that the noble Earl would have no objection to state to their Lordships what he intended to propose to that House on this subject before Christmas; for, as it was notorious that their Lordships were met for the purpose of considering what was to be the great basis of our commercial policy, it must have been within the contemplation of the noble Earl to take the sense of the House upon it previously to the recess; for it was not to be supposed that when Her Majesty said that "if we should be of opinion that recent legislation, in contributing, with other causes, to the generally improved condition of the country, and especially of the industrious classes, had, at the same time, inflicted unavoidable injury on certain important interests, we ought dispassionately to consider how far it might be practicable equitably to mitigate that injury"—it was not, he said, to be supposed that that question would not at once be submitted to their Lordships. The speech of the noble Earl was of the same nature as the Speech from the Throne, but it touched upon the same subjects lightly. The question of free trade and protection rested on a great and firm principle, and not on the discovery of gold in one part of the world or another, nor on the sudden impulse of emigration in one year more than another—it was a question to be settled, he hoped finally and satisfactorily, on a firm and sound theory. He hoped that the noble Earl would have no objection to state what measures it was proposed to bring forward, and whether he intended to bring that question under consideration before the 26th instant?

The EARL of DERBY: My Lords, the question which has just been put to me by the noble Marquess is one of considerable importance. I shall endeavour to make my answer satisfactory; but, in answering the question as to the intentions of Her Majesty's Government—which I have not the slightest difficulty in answering—I must call your attention to the general circumstances under which we are now met together. I will not call to your recollection the circumstances under which Her Majesty's present Government accepted office, nor the species of understanding on which the business of the last Session of Parliament was conducted—when we thought it right to refuse an immediate appeal to the country, which would have interrupted the ordinary business of the Session, and when we further expressed our opinion that at the earliest possible period an appeal ought to be made to the country at large. My Lords, reference to the country at large will and must undoubtedly and immediately decide whether Her Majesty's Government is or is not in the enjoyment of that amount of the confidence of the country and Parliament which will enable it to administer satisfactorily the affairs of this great nation. There was one important question on which undoubtedly reference to the country was made—namely, on what principles the commercial and fiscal affairs of the country were to be managed. Those principles have been matter of controversy for many years, and all parties, whatever their opinions may be, must agree in this, that it is most desirable that at the earliest possible period they should be definitely and finally settled. My Lords, on the great question involved in them, without disguising my opinions, I declared last year, for myself and for those who did me the honour of acting with me—I will not say whether the declaration was wise or unwise, worthy or unworthy of a British Minister—but I declared I should be guided by the sense which the community at large might express through its representatives, and that I should not bring forward any measure in accordance with my own views if I found that those views were not supported by a large majority of the country, for I thought that the question ought to be finally closed at the earliest period; and therefore, my Lords, though I resisted the applications for an immediate dissolution of Parliament, and for its being summoned to meet again in July, I gave a solemn pledge that before the autumn was at an end Parliament should have an opportunity of deciding on the future fiscal and commercial policy of the country. My Lords, it was in the fulfilment of that pledge that Her Majesty was advised to summon Parliament to meet early in November for the purpose of laying before it the views which were entertained by Her advisers. A further pledge was also given by me in the course of last Session, that, in order to prevent any interference with the ordinary business of the Session, an opportunity should be given to the country to decide on any measures which Government might think it desirable to introduce for the purpose of reversing or modifying that policy. My Lords, it is always unpleasant and mortifying to any public man to have to confess that his sentiments on any subject of great importance are not in unison and accordance with those of the great body of his fellow-subjects; but, mortifying as it may be, I have no hesitation in now saying, that the result of the late general election has been such as to convince me that, although a number of the constituencies and their representatives are desirous of giving their support to Her Majesty's present Ministers, a very large number, some of whom might be desirous of giving their support to Her Majesty's present advisers on other subjects, are determined not to assent to any alterations in our present commercial system; and that, in consequence, any alteration in that system, so far from being called for by a large majority, would, on the contrary, be negatived by a very large portion of the community and their representatives in Parliament. I therefore did not hesitate to advise Her Majesty, in the Speech from the Throne, to declare, in terms as explicit as I thought it proper and fitting as a Minister to place in the mouth of the Sovereign, not, indeed, any opinion as to the policy to be pursued, but only an expression of fact, that the principle of unrestricted competition was one which the wisdom of Parliament had decided should be adopted. If, my Lords, there was any ambiguity in the tone of that Speech, I think it must have been removed by the declaration which I made in the House myself on the night of the Address, and by the speech which the leader of the House of Commons made elsewhere, to the effect that, whatever we might think or desire, we were willing and ready to act on the principle of unrestricted competition, which it had been decided should guide our fiscal and commercial policy, and that, my Lords, as frankly and unreservedly as if we had ourselves been the authors of it. I doubt much, whether language could be framed pledging the Government more explicitly to any line of policy, or giving a more satisfactory assurance to those Gentlemen who were apprehensive of our tampering with or altering the existing system. But, my Lords, we went further; for, although we thought that those who differ from us might have rested fully satisfied with those expressions—and we know that many were satisfied—and agreed with us in postponing the declaration of our financial policy until the ordinary period of laying it before the country; yet with a full sense of the disadvantages arising from the imperfect calculations which must attend measures brought forward in so short a space of time, we thought the more honest and upright course was, not to confine ourselves to vague expressions, but to lay before Parliament in full detail those measures of commercial and fiscal policy which we were prepared to recommend to the adoption of Parliament, and by which Parliament would be able to judge at once of the sincerity of our professions and the wisdom and policy of our performance. On the very first day of the Session I took the liberty of informing your Lordships, and I believe a formal notice was given to the same effect in the other House of Parliament, that within the period of one fortnight—namely, on Friday next—my right hon. Friend and Colleague the Chancellor of the Exchequer would, in detail, lay before Parliament those measures which he thought necessary to propose, in order to carry out the policy which Her Majesty's Ministers had decided upon adopting. I was rather surprised, I confess, at the language used by the noble Marquess opposite. He said, that after making that declaration, the Government had thought it desirable—I beg pardon—that the Government had, in the meantime, given notice of their intention to move, previously to the 26th of November, a specific Resolution affecting the principle in question. The noble Marquess will forgive me for saying that that is neither a candid nor a correct statement. Her Majesty's Government gave no such notice. They were perfectly satisfied to rest until the 26th, when facts, and not words, would give proof of the sincerity of the course they intended to pursue. However, my Lords, another Gentleman in the other House, unconnected with the Government and opposed to it, did think fit to anticipate that, which would have been much more satisfactorily discussed after the commercial policy of the Government was before the country, by giving notice of an abstract Resolution, which he proposed to submit to the consideration of the House of Commons; and so far from the Government giving notice as the noble Marquess has assumed, the fact was, that that hon. Gentleman was appealed to on behalf of the Government, not to withdraw any notice of Motion he might think proper to give, but to postpone the debate on his abstract proposition until the House should be in possession in detail of the intentions and measures of the Chancellor of the Exchequer. So far, my Lords, with reference to an abstract Resolution proceeding from the Government. Now, my Lords, as I have touched, I will say one word upon the Resolution proposed by that hon. Member in the other House of Parliament. It was couched—and, I presume, intentionally—in language and terms which the framer of it must have known it was impossible for the Government or their supporters to accept. It was not confined to expressions as to the policy which was necessary to be pursued for the future, but contained reflections and opinions in which the Mover must have known it was impossible for us to agree.

For my own part, I must confess that, after the declarations made by the Government on the first night of the Session, and after its announcement that it would proceed to an immediate promulgation of their measures, I think there was no necessity for proposing any specific resolution on the subject. But granting that there was such a necessity, I think that any Gentleman who has at heart the real interests of the country, and the affirmation of the principles he advocates, should so frame the Resolution as to omit everything unnecessary, and to affirm the principle which he sought to support by the largest possible majority, if not the unanimous vote of the House of Commons. That Resolution, however, as I before stated, is couched in terms which the honour and credit of the Government rendered it impossible for them and their supporters to give an assent. So far as regards the affirmation of a principle, it goes no farther than pledging Parliament, so far as any Resolution can pledge Parliament, to the adoption of a principle for the future; it goes no farther than that Amendment, which, for the purpose of recording the opinions, intentions, and principles of the Government, my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer has placed on the notice paper of the other House of Parliament. Therefore, for the affirmation of a principle, that Motion was and is unnecessary. I know not, of course, what other views may be in contemplation by those who instigated the Motion. If their intentions be to overthrow the present Government before the period at which they shall have an opportunity of developing and explaining their policy, I only hope, if that be the case, that the hon. Gentleman who moves the Resolution, and the heads of those various sections into which the Opposition in the House of Commons is divided, have well considered the full amount of responsibility which they take upon themselves—that they have considered, not how they may combine the largest amount of force for overthrowing the Government, but, having regard to the interests of the country, they will also consider, the Government being overthrown, whether they possess among them the materials, and that uniformity and unity of action and intention which are necessary to form another, and to preserve the country from the inconveniences of a Ministerial interregnum. It may be that they have no intention to take upon themselves such responsibility, or of seeking to overthrow the Government; and if that be so, then, considering that this Motion can do nothing towards affirming a principle further than we are ready and willing to affirm that principle ourselves, where is the utility of it? And if it be not intended to overthrow, but only to weaken and discredit the Government, by forcing on them a Resolution in terms which are offensive to them and their supporters—if that be the only intention which the movers have in view, my Lords, I have then great confidence in the House of Commons and the country, and I believe that they will not sanction and support a proceeding which, if that be the intention, must be purely factious, and, if successful, must involve very serious difficulties in its train. Thus much, my Lords, in regard to the course which we are about to pursue, and which we have announced the intention of pursuing, and the impediments that have been thrown in our way. My Lords, I have already said that I concur with the noble Marquess opposite that we meet together at this unusual period for the purpose of discussing any alterations which it may be intended to make in the existing commercial system, for the purpose of closing at once and for ever the controversy on the subject of protection and free trade. My Lords, if it had been the intention of the Government to offer any proposition for the purpose of reversing or altering the system as established, due notice of such a proposition would have, at a very early period, been given to this and the other House of Parliament; but, on the contrary, both here and there the most distinct intimations have been given that we had no intention of proposing measures founded in such a spirit, and that our commercial and financial policy would be based on a different system. It, therefore, does not occur to me, nor is it desirable, that your Lordships should be invited to pronounce a distinct and positive opinion on that which is not threatened by any one of us—unless, indeed, a controversy be raised on the part of those who dissent from the course which the Government has thought it necessary to pursue, or are desirous of submitting to Parliament the propriety of deviating from that course. The noble Marquess has said, and with truth, that in opening this Session of Parliament the Government ought to advert to those various measures which, in the course of the Session, they feel it their duty to submit to both Houses of Parliament. But, my Lords, we have done somewhat more. We thought it advisable to summon together the present Session for the purpose more especially of dealing with that commercial and financial question; and although we are prepared in the other House of Parliament, in which such questions must arise, to deal with that commercial and financial question—that policy by which we intend to stand or fall—before the Christmas recess, and to take the opinion and judgment of that House on that policy, and on those measures which we may submit to it; though we have thought it expedient in this House to avail ourselves of the unexpected time given for renewing our inquiries into that preliminary legislation which must take place on the subject of the East Indian territory at a very early period; though my noble and learned Friend the Lord Chancellor, in a speech full of the most lucid and clear argument, has submitted to the House an outline of those great measures of legal reform which he desires to have an opportunity of submitting to Parliament; though the principles of legal reform dealt with by the introduction of Bills into the other House of Parliament, not for the purpose of immediate discussion, but for the deliberate consideration of that House; and though my right hon. Friend the Attorney General for Ireland is possibly at this very moment engaged in laying before the other House of Parliament measures of the utmost importance in regard to the social condition of Ireland; it is not the desire or the intention of the Government to introduce at this unusual period of the year, or to call for the decision of Parliament upon, any measures except those which are strictly necessary for the purpose of giving entire fulfilment to the understanding which prevailed, and the pledges which were given; but, beyond that, it is not our intention to submit any important measures for the consideration of Parliament; nor do I think it is likely that your Lordships' House will be called upon by Her Majesty's Government to pronounce a decision on any important subject.

The MARQUESS of CLANRICARDE confessed he was not entirely satisfied with the answer of the noble Earl, which he thought was not sufficiently explicit. He begged, with all deference to the noble Earl, to repel the charge that he was actuated by any factious motives. He thought he had said that the resolution of which the Government had given notice, in the other

House, was by way of amendment; but even supposing that he had not, was it not monstrous to suppose that he intended to deceive any one as to the mode in which the resolution appeared on the Votes of the other House of Parliament? It was not true, accurately speaking, that the Ministers were at all driven by the resolution proposed to embody their views in another resolution, and moving it as an amendment; for it was perfectly competent for them to have accepted the resolution proposed, to have negatived it, or to have avoided a decision by moving the previous question. The Government had, however, decided on taking a different course, and (whether wisely or unwisely he did not say) upon embodying their views in a counter resolution; and he was, therefore accurate in saying that, since he had given notice of his question, Government had placed before the House of Commons a resolution embodying their views upon the commercial policy of the country.

The EARL of DERBY remarked that, without wishing to prevent the noble Marquess from making any observations which he might wish to lay before the House, he would suggest that, in order that he might place himself in conformity with the rules of the House, he should propose some substantive Motion to the House upon which the discussion might be carried on.

The MARQUESS of CLANRICARDE said, that he would conclude by moving that the Clerk should read that portion of Her Majesty's Speech relating to the commercial policy of the country. He did not think that the noble Earl had a right to assume that this passage of the Speech from the Throne, or the speech which he himself made on the first night of the Session, was a sufficient record of the deliberate opinion of that House on this great question. But if the noble Earl thought so, then he (the Marquess of Clanricarde) must say that nothing could be more insignificant or unworthy of the occasion than the noble Earl's treatment of this subject on the first night of the Session. This great question was founded on principles that had not been discussed only since 1846 in England, but which had been discussed in Europe for centuries, and also very much in America of late years. Protection had been maintained by many writers and statesmen of great eminence in other countries as well as in this; but, on the other hand, those on that side of the House contended that free trade was the sound doctrine; that it was one that had the best authorities in its favour; that the experience of the last few years had conclusively proved its truth; and that it was the principle upon which the commercial policy of the country should rest. Was he then to be told that when a Government—composed of noble Lords and right hon. Gentlemen, whose lives had been passed in opposing it—had at last accepted it in the qualified way to which the noble Earl had referred, that a speech from the noble Earl, and the passage from the Speech from the Throne, was sufficient to bind the House of Lords on this great subject? He maintained that it was not. Whatever might be the vote of the House of Commons on this subject, it did not bind that House; and if Parliament was assembled to decide this question, it should have been submitted to that as well as to the other House of Parliament, and determined upon broad and comprehensive principles, without reference to the stream of emigration which had gone forth from the country, or the amount of bullion that had come into it. He knew not what effect the noble Earl's threat of resignation might have upon the country. He did not know whether he thought that because he was able to go down to Windsor and swear in eighteen Privy Counsellors in one day, and to form a Government consisting of Three Secretaries of State, a Chancellor of the Exchequer, and a First Lord of the Admiralty, not one of whom had ever held office before; or whether he thought that they had displayed such wonderful abilities during the time they had been in office that the Houses of Parliament would be debarred from a hostile vote by the impossibility of selecting adequate successors from the Privy Councillors on either side of the House. But without wishing to say anything uncomplimentary, he must remark that when Parliament was told, "Take care what you do, for possibly we may resign, and you will have to concoct a Government without us;" he thought that they had only to look round on the benches of either House of Parliament, in order not to be frightened by such threats. Of this he was perfectly assured, that not only the Members of that House, but the country, entertained a sincere conviction that free trade had been explicitly and firmly adopted, and that the recorded opinion of both Houses to that effect ought to be obtained before the recess. The noble Marquess concluded by moving that the paragraph in Her Majesty's Speech relat-

LORD WODEHOUSE said, that he was struck with the mode in which the noble Earl opposite, after discussing the general policy of the Government in a manner calculated to produce a great effect, had endeavoured to stop the noble Marquess when he sought to make a few observations. As the noble Earl had used the word "factious" in reference to the Resolution which had been brought forward in the other House, he wished to say a few words in defence of its mover. The noble Earl had tried to persuade them that there was no difference between the original Resolution and the Amendment of the Chancellor of the Exchequer; but he apprehended that the difference was this, that the original Resolution said that the adoption of free trade was a just, wise, and necessary measure, and the Amendment said nothing at all of the kind. The noble Earl was very fond of accusing those on that side of the House of adopting factious courses; but he could not discover anything extraordinary in the course pursued by the Opposition; for when he looked at the equivocal line of conduct which had been pursued by the noble Earl and his friends since 1846, he thought it was necessary to extract from them pledges of a stronger character than were usually sought from Ministers of the Crown. The noble Earl had convicted himself in that respect by the very language he had used. The noble Earl said that he went to the country prepared to bring in protective measures if he found the country prepared to support him, but, on the other hand, prepared to adhere to a free-trade policy if the country was in its favour. Now, he (Lord Wodehouse) must confess that it was utterly inconceivable to him how, with any regard to political morality, such a course could be adopted by a Minister of the Crown. If the noble Earl, as he gathered from his speech, still thought that protection was the policy which should regulate the commercial and financial affairs of the country, he should, in justice and in honour, either resign office, or endeavour to induce the country to adopt measures founded upon this principle. If he still believed that it would be beneficial to carry out those principles, he should stand or fall by them. But what was the course which he had adopted? Living in an agricultural district where nearly all Members of Parliament supported his Lordship's Government without knowing what his principles were, he (Lord Wodehouse) had a good opportunity of knowing what the feeling amongst his supporters was; and he knew that they expected that if the noble Earl could not carry out protection, he should give them something as nearly equivalent to protection as he could; that he would somehow enable them to regain the money they had lost in 1846. Now, he apprehended that was precisely the point upon which the Opposition were at present at variance with Her Majesty's Government. The former wanted, not only that the principle of unrestricted competition, "which in its wisdom Parliament has been pleased to adopt," should be adopted by Her Majesty's Government, because the country had not given them a majority to adopt other measures, but they also wanted to know whether Her Majesty's Ministers adopted that policy as being conducive to the prosperity and to the interests of the country, and whether they did not rather intend to propose the measures nearest to protection which they could consistently with retaining their places. If free trade or unrestricted competition was the policy which had conduced to the general prosperity of the country, then that principle should be applied as far as the condition of the country, the taxation of the country, and all the other circumstances in which we were placed, would admit; but if the principle of the present Government were affirmed—that, the policy of 1846 having been adopted, it was not desirable, under all the circumstances, to change it, but rather to mitigate the injury inflicted as far as possible, not for the benefit of the whole country, but of certain classes supposed to be injured—then, so far from that controversy being closed, we had only, in truth, arrived at another stage of it; it would still be carried on with the same vigour as before, but in the end it must result in the signal defeat of the Government. When the noble Earl applied the term "factious" to the conduct of those opposed to him, he (Lord Wodehouse) would remind him (without any intention of imputing motives) that his own conduct since 1846 would bear that interpretation as well as that of any man in the country. When they considered the way in which he broke up the Ministry of Sir Robert Peel in 1846, and remembered his declarations year after year to the farmers that he would stand by protection, and then saw the manner in which, when he was called upon to take office in 1852, he declared that he would bow to the feelings of the country, he thought he had the same right to stigmatise his conduct as factious, as the noble Earl had to apply the same language to the Opposition. He (Lord Wodehouse) would not have risen to say a single word had not the noble Earl made, what seemed to him, a most deliberate attempt to take all the advantage of the discussion to himself, and to prevent any one else having an opportunity of speaking. Considering the immense amount of abilities which all were perfectly aware was concentrated on the Government benches in both Houses of Parliament, but particularly in that, he must say that he thought it was extremely remarkable that they so seldom heard the sweet voices of the noble Lords opposite. It was curious that the noble Earl opposite should always get up to take all the debate upon himself, not only to reply to the speech of the noble Lord who might have immediately preceded him, but also to the speeches of all the noble Lords on the opposite side of the House who had spoken before him in the course of the discussion: that, he thought, scarcely consistent with one of the principles held by the disciples of free trade—he meant the division of labour.

The EARL of DERBY: My Lords, I do not rise to answer the speech of the noble Baron who has just resumed his seat. It is unnecessary for me to make any observations on the temper, the language, and good taste of that speech. My conduct has been before the public for—I am sorry to say—nearly thirty years; and I am not now going to defend myself against imputations which I feel to be utterly unworthy of further notice. The noble Baron may be a competent judge of what is due to his own personal honour; I claim to be the best judge of what is due to mine; and I want no advice from him as to the mode in which I should maintain it. One word as to the charge of my having endeavoured to prevent the noble Marquess from addressing the House. I am sure the noble Marquess himself will acquit me of such a design. It appeared to me, from the turn which the discussion was taking, that it was likely to run to a considerable length, and I interrupted the noble Marquess merely for the purpose of suggesting that he should place himself within the rules of the House, and not with the remotest intention or wish of preventing him from addressing to your Lordships any observations

he might think proper to make. The noble Marquess, as I gathered from his remarks, seems to think that I have not fairly described the course which the Government have taken in submitting a Resolution to the House of Commons previous to the 26th instant. The noble Marquess speaks of this step as being a spontaneous one on the part of the Government. Surely the noble Marquess must know that it was not a spontaneous step, but one rendered necessary in consequence of a notice of Motion given from the side of the House opposed to the Government; and we thought it the best and the most conciliatory mode of meeting that Motion. I have no wish to enter into irrelevant discussion at this time. I have stated frankly and plainly the course which Her Majesty's Ministers intend to pursue; and all I ask is, that before pronouncing condemnation on our measures, Parliament will wait to see them.

LORD WODEHOUSE begged to state, in explanation, that if he had said anything, without intending it, to reflect upon the personal honour of the noble Earl, he withdrew it.

The EARL of DERBY, after the handsome apology of the noble Lord, should cease to remember a single word of what he had said.

On Question, agreed to; and the said paragraph was read as follows:—

"It gives Me Pleasure to be enabled, by the Blessing of Providence, to congratulate you on the generally improved Condition of the Country, and especially of the Industrious Classes. If you should be of opinion that recent Legislation, in contributing, with other Causes, to this happy Result, has at the same Time inflicted unavoidable Injury on certain important Interests, I recommend you dispassionately to consider how far it may be practicable equitably to mitigate that Injury, and to enable the Industry of the Country to meet successfully that unrestricted Competition to which Parliament, in its Wisdom, has decided that it should be subjected."

House adjourned till To-morrow.

CASE OF MR. PAGET.

MR. MONCKTON MILNES said, he wished to ask the noble Lord the Under Secretary for Foreign Affairs a question of which he had given him notice. It appeared that on the 2nd of September last the apartments of Mr. Paget, an English gentleman residing at Dresden, were entered by a large body of police, who insisted upon the delivery of his private manuscripts and papers; that these were forcibly seized and carried off, and that, on a representation being made to Mr. Forbes, the English Minister at Dresden, application was made by him to the Government of Saxony, who disavowed all knowledge whatever of the occurrence. It afterwards transpired that this outrage had taken place by an order of the Austrian Government, communicating their desire to the police acting in Saxony. He (Mr. M. Milnes) wished to know whether Her Majesty's Government had received any communication on this subject; whether any redress was demanded, and had been given; and also whether the Government had any objection to lay on the table the papers connected with this outrage upon an unprotected and unoffending English gentleman?

LORD STANLEY: I think my hon. Friend has been greatly misinformed in the details of the subject to which he has just called the attention of the House. It is true that Mr. Paget, a British subject, who for about two years has been residing at Dresden, had his house entered and his papers seized by the police; but it is not true, at least no information of that kind has reached Her Majesty's Government, that his papers were seized by the Austrian authorities. They were seized by the police of the country in which he resided. The British Minister at Dresden, Mr. Forbes, at once remonstrated with the proper authorities, and the result of his remonstrance was, that after a short interval Mr. Paget's papers were returned to him. I should state that the first answer that was made by the Government of Saxony to the remonstrance of Mr. Forbes was, an admission that Mr. Paget's papers had been taken from him, and a justification of the act, on grounds which proved to be utterly erroneous. But to that reply a second note of remonstrance was sent by Mr. Forbes, which appeared to have produced its effect, for very shortly afterwards Mr. Paget's papers were restored, and Mr. Forbes was directed to convey to Mr. Paget an expression of regret, on the part of the Government of Saxony, at what had occurred, and to state to Mr. Paget that the police who had taken upon themselves, without orders, to seize his papers had received a very severe reprimand. Under these circumstances no further notice of the matter on the part of the Government was thought necessary.

WESTMINSTER BRIDGE.

SIR DE LACY EVANS said, he would beg to ask the First Commissioner of Woods what the definite intentions of Government were as to the removal or the contrary of the buildings on either side of Bridge-street, Westminster-bridge; and if one or both sides of that street were intended to be removed, at what period it might be intended to carry the same into effect?

LORD JOHN MANNERS said, he had to state that it was the intention of the Government to introduce a Bill in this Session of Parliament directing a bridge to be built across the Thames at Westminster, but that measure would not include the property on the south side of Bridge-street. The hon. and gallant Gentleman was probably aware that the houses on the north side of Bridge-street were the property of the Westminster-bridge Commissioners, with the exception of one house; and he (Lord John Manners) believed the leases would very shortly fall in. But with regard to the houses on the south side of Bridge-street, their purchase, he feared, would be a very expensive affair; and it was the opinion of the Government that their removal was not necessarily connected with the erection of a bridge across the Thames. Their removal, doubtless, would be a great improvement to the appearance of the New Palace of Westminster, though the cost that would necessarily be incurred would in all probability prevent that removal taking place. When the Bill which he had previously mentioned was before Parliament, the hon. and gallant Gentleman would then have an opportunity of seeing what were the intentions of the Government on the subject.

ECCLESIASTICAL COURTS—CHURCH REFORM.

SIR B. HALL: I wish to put three questions to the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for the Home Department, of which I have given him notice. The first relates to the Ecclesiastical Courts, the second to Ecclesiastical Discipline, and the third to Episcopal Incomes. The right hon. Gentleman is aware that in 1850 a Committee was appointed by this House to inquire into the Courts of Law and Equity. That Committee presented a very elaborate report, in which they set forth the facts that arbitrary fees are taken by Judges and registrars, who it appears hold sinecure offices, "and the Committee desire that the attention of Parliament should be directed without delay to the application of the necessary remedies." The first question is, whether he can inform the House whether it is the intention of the Government to introduce any measure or to take any steps for the purpose of carrying out the recommendation of that Committee? With regard to the second question—that referring to Ecclesiastical Discipline—the right hon. Gentleman perhaps has had his attention drawn to a paper presented to the House in 1851, being No. 205, which was an Address to Her Majesty from lay members of the Church of England, and very numerous signed by Peers of Parliament and Members of this House, complaining of certain innovations in the form of worship of the Established Church, and praying that Her Majesty might be graciously pleased to take such steps as might prevent a continuance of those practices. Her Majesty commanded the Secretary of State to communicate with the Archbishop of Canterbury; and the Secretary of State, then Sir George Grey, says (writing to the Archbishop):—

"Her Majesty places full confidence in your Grace's desire to use such means as are within your power to maintain the purity of the doctrines taught by the clergy of the Established Church, and to discourage and prevent innovations in the mode of conducting the services of the Church, not sanctioned by law or general usage, and calculated to create dissatisfaction and alarm among a numerous body of its members."

A short time since a letter appeared in the public papers, signed by the clergy and laity of the diocese of Exeter, and addressed to the Archbishop of Canterbury, praying that his Grace would interfere to carry out those recommendations of Her Majesty. His Grace replied—

"The memorial alludes to the introduction of doctrines and practices into the Church during the last few years which cannot be reconciled with the principles of the Reformation. This is a subject upon which, unhappily, I have been so often obliged to declare my opinion, that I need not repeat it now. The memorial, however, proceeds to complain of a practice originating in these erroneous doctrines, which can scarcely be distinguished from the auricular confession of the Church of Rome. I agree with the memorialists in believing this practice to be equally unscriptural in principle, and mischievous in effect. But I trust that public opinion will prevent the continuance of the system."

I ask, now, whether it is the intention of the Government, or whether they can inform the House and the laity of the Church of England whether it is the intention of the Bishops of our Church to take any steps in pursuance of the commands of Her Majesty for the purpose of preventing those proceedings which the Archbishop himself declares "are contrary to the principles of the Reformation?" The other question, as regards episcopal incomes, is perhaps one which the right hon. Gentleman may answer more easily. The Act of 1836 was intended to limit the amount of Episcopal incomes; but by a return laid on the table of this House, it appears that the spirit and intention of that Act are evaded; and I wish to know whether it is the intention of the Government to introduce any measures which may carry into effect the spirit and intention of that Act, so that the bishops may not have larger incomes than those which were assigned to their respective sees?

MR. WALPOLE: Sir, the hon. Gentleman has asked me three very important questions, and the most important of them, perhaps, is the first, namely, what are the intentions of Her Majesty's Government with respect to the reform of the Ecclesiastical Courts? Perhaps I might say that the Report to which the hon. Gentleman has referred is a Report of a Committee with reference to fees taken in the Courts of Law, and is not a Report on the whole question of the Ecclesiastical Courts. Now, the hon. Gentleman may possibly be aware that the Lord Chancellor in another place has already intimated that extension has been given to the Chancery Commission—in consideration of a paragraph in their most valuable Report—to enable them to consider the whole question of testamentary jurisdiction with reference to proceedings in the Courts of Law, the Ecclesiastical Courts, and the Court of Chancery. The attention of the Government has been seriously called to the subject, and I have no hesitation in saying that they are unanimously of opinion that there ought to be a stringent, an extensive, and a decided reform in the Ecclesiastical Courts. Wishing, as I do, that this reform may be one that may be approved of generally, and carried into execution and effect with the approbation of the country, I certainly wish, for my own part, that no Bill should be brought in until the whole question can be taken into consideration. For that reason, I own, the Government have not at the present moment an immediate intention of bringing in a Bill, because they look with great anxiety to that Report of the Chancery Commissioners, which will probably settle the whole question. With regard to the second question, I hardly know how to answer it. There are no powers, that I am aware of, in the Crown for preventing what the hon. Gentleman has called Romish practices in our Church. The best mode by which they can be prevented is by the good sense of the people of this country, expressed, as it has been over and over again expressed, against the introduction of any such novelties into our Church; and, so far as the Government are concerned, they are as anxious as the hon. Gentleman, or anybody else can be, to see that our own Church is preserved in perfect purity, according to the principles established at the Reformation. With regard to the last question, which relates to Episcopal Incomes, the hon. Gentleman is aware that they were settled by the Ecclesiastical Commissioners, by virtue of the Act, I think, to which he refers. I do not see that the Government ought to interfere with the life incomes of any of the bishops, but to leave the Episcopal Incomes in future to remain as they were settled by the Ecclesiastical Commissioners, in pursuance of the Statute to which the hon. Gentleman has referred.

THE CAPE OF GOOD HOPE—THE CONSTITUTION.

MR. FREDERICK PEEL said, that seeing the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary for the Colonies in his place, he was desirous of asking permission of the House to correct a misapprehension into which he conceived that the House could not but have been led by what fell from the right hon. Gentleman in replying, on last Friday evening, to a question put by the noble Lord the Member for London (Lord J. Russell), calling for an explanation of the delay that had taken place in transmitting the Constitution to the Colony of the Cape. He (Mr. Peel) understood the right hon. Gentleman to say that a general impression had prevailed throughout the Colony that Earl Grey, in his draft Constitutional Ordinances, had intended to confer the franchise on every man who occupied for a certain number of months any description of fixed property—that it was under that impression that deliberations had taken place in the Legislative Council, and amendments been proposed; and that the Council, conceiving that their franchise was so extensive as to admit the bulk of the coloured classes, and at the same time entertaining great distrust of those classes in consequence of their having united with the Kafirs in rebellion against the Crown, had made amendments restricting very considerably the franchise, with the express view of excluding the coloured classes. He understood the right hon. Gentleman further to state, that after all these proceedings were over, in the course of a conversation between Lieutenant Governor Darling and the Attorney General, Mr. Porter—the latter having, as he (Mr. Peel) understood the right hon. Gentleman, then for the first time taken the trouble to read the clause in question in the draft Ordinances of Earl Grey—observed that it was much less liberal than it professed to be, and that, in fact, it conferred the franchise only on the occupiers of one description of property, namely, house property, and that this qualification made the franchise more exclusive even than that adopted in the amendments of the Legislative Council, which were considered to be so narrow as to have been protested against by the whole Colony. The right hon. Gentleman proceeded to add, that under these circumstances the question of the franchise was involved in new and insuperable difficulties, and he did not know which franchise to adopt; that certainly he could not adopt the franchise contained in Earl Grey's draft Ordinances, because if he did he should be conniving at a delusion. Now, it was quite true that the franchise in the draft Ordinances sent out from this country was restricted to the occupation of house property of the value of 25*l.*; but the point which he was concerned in making clear was this—that there was not and could not be any misconception in the Colony of the Cape as to the fact of this limitation, because in the covering despatch in which the Ordinances were transmitted, Earl Grey distinctly stated that the question of the franchise was one on which he could not be expected to express any decided opinion; that at so remote a distance from the Cape he could not decide a question of that kind; and that he must abide by the views of those who, being locally connected with the Colony, might be presumed to be cognisant of the nature of its society and the tenure of its property, on which questions the franchise must mainly depend.

That, in taking this course, he was prepared to follow the views of the Legislative Council, and especially among them the recommendations of the Attorney General, (Mr. Porter), a gentleman who was much distinguished in the Colony for his ability and for his long official service and professional attainments. Now, he should state that Sir Harry Smith, when Governor of the Cape, had directed the Attorney General (Mr. Porter) to draft a Constitutional Ordinance in accordance with the views of the Colony, of the Council, and of Mr. Porter himself. Mr. Porter proceeded to discharge that duty, and his draft Ordinance was transmitted to this country; and, as far as the question of the franchise was concerned, the only point to which he (Mr. Peel) now adverted, Mr. Porter's draft was the basis of Earl Grey's clause in the draft Ordinances. Without entering into particulars, he might state that Earl Grey made a literal transcript of Mr. Porter's paragraph, and transferred it into his own draft Ordinances. He confessed, then, it appeared to him quite impossible that there could be any misconception in the mind of the Attorney General at the Cape with respect to the precise nature of this qualification. It only remained for him to say, that not only Mr. Porter but every Member of the Legislative Council was, he was certain, quite aware of the nature of the franchise, because he found in the Amendment adopted by the Legislative Council—and he might mention that the question of the franchise was discussed for many days in the Council—the following words added to house property: "whether separately or jointly with any land occupied with the house;" clearly showing that they were aware that the franchise conferred by Earl Grey was restricted to the occupation of house property as distinguished from any other kind of immoveable property. That was the explanation he wished to make, and he trusted that if any hon. Gentleman had been misled by the right hon. Gentleman the Colonial Secretary into the idea that Earl Grey had resorted to anything like artifice or stratagem to disguise the real nature of the franchise from the Colony, he would now give that noble Lord credit for acting in a plain and straightforward manner.

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON said, he thought that the House would perceive that the question to which the hon. Gentleman had called their attention was not only one of detail, but one of an intricate and difficult character. He must say that he thought the hon. Member would have treated him with more courtesy if he had given him some notice of his intention to bring the subject forward. He (Sir J. Pakington) had not the slightest idea, until the hon. Gentleman rose, that it was his intention to refer to what had fallen from him on a former evening. He followed the hon. Member with as much attention as he could, and he confessed he could not clearly understand what his reasons were for introducing the subject until he came to his closing observations. From the words used by the hon. Gentleman at the close of his speech, he presumed he meant to say that it was his (Sir J. Pakington's) object on Friday evening last to impute to Earl Grey some intention to mislead the Colony, and to practise some delusion on this question of the franchise. Now, if that were really the hon. Gentleman's impression, he begged altogether to disclaim any such intention, and distinctly to state that he had no wish to make any imputation whatever upon that noble Lord. He wished, also, to correct a mistake into which the hon. Gentleman had fallen, and which, he believed, he had been led into by what he had seen in some of the public journals rather than by what he had heard in that House—namely, that he (Sir J. Pakington) had stated that this question of the franchise was surrounded by “insuperable difficulties.” Such a word as “insuperable” he had not used. What he stated was, that the arrivals from the Cape when the Constitution came home in July last, showed that the subject was surrounded by “great and unexpected”—not by “insuperable” difficulties. The substance of all he had said on the occasion was, that by the Council which first took this subject into consideration, subsequently by the seceding members of that Council, and thirdly by the Commission which undertook the management of the subject—that in every one of these cases the franchise proposed was the occupancy of fixed property to the value of 25*l.* for the twelve preceding months; and the legal construction of that franchise had been, and was now, he believed, held to be, and justly held to be, that every Hottentot who occupied a hut, with adjacent land, provided the whole was worth 25*l.*, would enjoy the right to the franchise. It was so held in the Colony; and it was not only so held in the Colony, but, as he stated the other day, it was ultimately promulgated that this franchise had been adopted for the purpose of embracing the greater part, if not the whole, of the Hottentot population. He had further stated that when Earl Grey's Ordinance was sent out, instead of the franchise being the occupancy of a hut and land together worth 25*l.*, it directed that the franchise should consist of buildings of that value. As to any imputation upon Earl Grey, he had made none further than this. His own belief was that the change might have been unintentional, nevertheless it was a very important change. The Colony was not aware of the difference when the Constitution was discussed last February. It was discussed under the idea and belief that it was a land franchise, and it was not until after the Amendments had been moved and carried that the difference between the franchise of huts and land, and the franchise of buildings alone, was discovered. He might add, that on this being discovered, the Gentleman who moved those Amendments remarked, “If we had only known this previously, we might have spared ourselves this trouble.” All he had said, therefore, was that this discovery had been productive of considerable difficulty, and had involved the necessity, on the part of the Government, of using the utmost discretion before they decided ultimately what the franchise should be.

SIR CHARLES WOOD said, he did not understand the right hon. Baronet to have imputed to Earl Grey that he had done anything to mislead the Colony; though he did use words which might seem to bear that construction. What his hon. Friend the Member for Bury (Mr. F. Peel) meant to say was, that whatever franchise Earl Grey gave was the precise franchise mentioned in the Ordinance which had been sent home from the Cape, drawn up by the Attorney General for that Colony; therefore his hon. Friend did not understand how there could have been any misconception at the Cape. That Ordinance Earl Grey had copied. So far as the subject of the franchise was concerned, he (Sir C. Wood) did not say what that franchise was, but whatever it was, it came from the Cape to Earl Grey, and was sent back by him as he had received it, unaltered.

Subject dropped.

CALL OF THE HOUSE.

SIR JOSHUA WALMSLEY begged to move, for his hon. Friend the Member for Montrose (Mr. Hume), who was unavoidably absent, that the House be called over.

Order read; Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the House be now called over."

SIR ROBERT H. INGLIS said, that, without any disrespect to the hon. Gentleman who had just moved that the House be called over, and with less disrespect towards the hon. Gentleman upon whose behalf he made that Motion, he must appeal to the experience of every Gentleman present—of those, at least, who had personal experience upon the subject, and of many others who knew historically the proceedings of that House—whether the attempt to call over the House were generally successful—whether it were not a mere brutum fulmen to the absent, and a great waste of time to those who were present. Obviously he did not rise to speak on his own behalf, or of as large a House as almost any Gentleman ever remembered—he did not rise to speak on behalf of the 450 Gentlemen then present ready to answer to their names; but on behalf of other Members who had not only had no notice, but who from the nature of things could not have had such notice; for when was the notice for a call of the House carried? After post-hour on Friday last; and he believed it would be physically impossible, with all the aids of modern science which had been bestowed upon the transmission of intelligence, for a notice of a call of the House to reach many of those distant quarters of the Queen's European dominions in which many Members were at present. It was not that the hon. Member (Mr. Hume) had not as full a right as any other hon. Member to do this, but he was perfectly astonished when he saw in the name of the hon. Member for Montrose a Motion to this effect, because, if there were one hon. Member more than another who had sat in that House continuously, it was that hon. Gentleman; and, if that hon. Gentleman had been present—and he regretted the cause of his absence—he would have appealed to him, whether in one single instance a call of the House had ever been productive of any advantage. Suppose the hon. Gentleman brought the 654 Members of whom that House consisted into their places, could he compel any one of them—he would not say to express his opinion, for, happily, they did not want that expression from all at any rate, but—to give his vote? He might bring him to his seat, but the moment an hon. Gentleman had answered to his name, he might, if he were so advised, leave the House, and, except by another call of the House, the hon. Member could not compel his further attendance. Without, therefore, wasting more time of the House in attempting to induce the House not to waste further time in the prosecution of the present Motion, he should take the sense of the House upon it.

MR. COBDEN said, that although he could not admit that the reasons of the hon. Gentleman were altogether valid, yet there might be a good deal said on both sides. The hon. Gentleman stated that, although they were called on that evening to answer to their names, yet there was no power to compel them to vote the next day. That was perfectly true; but, assuming that there were any hon. Gentlemen who wished to evade voting, or wished to run away, for that was the intimation—the object of a call of the House, as he understood it, was, that they might do their best to show to the country whether Members were in a condition to be there or not—whether they were in health to be present—whether they had any paramount engagement to prevent their being there—whether they could satisfy their constituents that there was a reason or physical impediment to prevent their being in the House on the next, as well as on that day. He thought, therefore, there was not in the hon. Gentleman's argument that cogency which many hon. Gentlemen supposed; but he thought the Motion of his hon. Friend (Mr. Hume) might be said to be all but completely successful, for he believed that there were present forty or fifty Members who had not taken the oaths of the House before that day. Seeing the great number around the table that day, it was evident that the Motion had had its full effect; he would therefore put it to his hon. Friend (Sir J. Walmsley) who represented the hon. Member for Montrose upon this occasion, whether he would press the matter to a division?

MR. WALPOLE said, he was one of those who voted for a call of the House; because, when an hon. Gentleman in the position of the hon. Member for Montrose (Mr. Hume) thought an important question was to be brought before the House, which made it proper to obtain as large an attendance as possible, seeing that that Motion was proposed more or less against the Government, he (Mr. Walpole) thought it his duty to vote for the call; but he so entirely agreed in the observations of the hon. Member for the West Riding (Mr.

Cobden) that the Motion for the call had really answered its purpose, and would be perfectly satisfactory to the hon. Member for Montrose, that he ventured to say it would be convenient to the House if the Motion were not pressed. No object could then be gained by calling it over, but possibly some great inconvenience might arise to hon. Members too far distant to have notice of the call; and for that reason, among others, he hoped the hon. Gentleman would not press the Motion.

LORD JOHN RUSSELL said, he begged to express his concurrence in the observations of the right hon. Gentleman.

SIR JOSHUA WALMSLEY said, that in accordance with the wish of the House, he would withdraw the Motion.

LANDLORD AND TENANT (IRELAND).

MR. NAPIER said, he rose to move for leave to introduce a series of measures, having for their object the adjustment of the relations between landlords and tenants in Ireland—namely, “A Bill to facilitate the Improvement of Landed Property in Ireland;” “A Bill to provide Compensation to Tenants for the improvement of their holdings in Ireland;” “A Bill to facilitate the making of beneficial Leases and Agreements for Compensation for improvement of Lands in Ireland;” and “A Bill to simplify, consolidate, and amend the existing Laws which regulate the relation of Landlord and Tenant in Ireland.” When he considered the difficulty and importance of this great question—when he reflected on its bearing upon the interests of Ireland, on the spirit in which the measures he asked leave to introduce might be received by the people of Ireland themselves, and how great and eminent statesmen had touched this question with a trembling hand, and left it still unsettled, he honestly confessed that he approached the subject with the utmost diffidence, and must ask the House for its kind indulgence while he endeavoured to state his views upon it. At the outset he readily admitted that he was greatly indebted to those who had heretofore endeavoured to grapple with the subject; because, although, some wilfully, and others reluctantly, had abandoned it, yet he had been greatly assisted by their labours; but he must also be permitted to add that he conceived the difficulty surrounding the question had been very much enhanced by delay; for when concessions were to be made—provided they were just and wise concessions—the sooner they were made the better. For what had been the result of the delay that had taken place in the settlement of this question? In the first place, the pressure upon the agricultural interest of Ireland, the reality of which, however they might dispute about its causes, was denied by none. The effect of that pressure had naturally induced some persons to entertain the most extravagant expectations as to what legislation could do with the view of relieving them from their distress; and again it had enabled other persons to take advantage of the discontent of the people to inflame them against the laws, and to raise expectations which they did not honestly believe could be fulfilled. Now, if others acknowledged as the most competent had attempted to deal with this question, and had shrunk from it, it might perhaps be considered as presumptuous in him to suppose that he was able to do what was thus left undone. He did not now come forward for the purpose of catching transient applause; on the contrary, his sole desire was to propose something which was so obviously practicable that it would be likely to be carried through that House, and prove successful. It happened that shortly after he entered Parliament, Mr. Sharman Crawford had brought in one of his Bills before the House; and it was but just to say of that gentleman, in passing, that, although he differed from him on many of his views respecting this question, yet he did think it was owing very much to the perseverance with which he pressed the question on the public and the House, that it had now become a matter for Parliament to dispose of—that it had become the duty of the Legislature at length to settle the question for the peace and welfare of the country, and, therefore, it was that he had been led to prepare the measures he was about to propose. In the year 1848, Mr. Sharman Crawford brought the question before the late Parliament; and in 1849, he (Mr. Napier) heard from the lips of one who was now no more, but one who understood Ireland well—he had heard from the lips of the late Sir Robert Peel these words:—“I see every reason why Ireland, if her position in respect of tenure could be improved, should be most prosperous.” In the opinion of that great statesman, therefore, the prosperity of Ireland depended upon the improvement of her tenure. Having had numerous communications with various persons in different parts of Ireland upon the subject, he (Mr. Napier) felt that it had become his bounden duty either to assist in the great object of effecting the settlement of the question, or to make the effort himself. Whilst the late Government were in office, therefore, he did what he could for that purpose; and he got two friends to prepare a complete digest of the existing state of the law in a clear and condensed form. When that statement was prepared, it was sent to many members of his own profession; and it had been commented upon in terms of the highest approval by one of the ablest lawyers in Ireland—a man well acquainted with the subject itself, and the father of the Irish bar—he meant Mr. Robert Holmes. Mr. Holmes wrote to Messrs. Vance and Ferguson:—

“Gentlemen: I have received the book which you were so kind as to send to me—your work on the ‘Tenure and Improvement of Land in Ireland,’ &c. I deferred acknowledging the gift until I could in some degree appreciate its value. I have now read it, and I consider it due both to you and myself to declare that I have derived from the perusal the greatest satisfaction and most useful information. It is a work which exhibits industry and research, professional knowledge and talent, judicious treatment and suggestion, practical good sense, temperate stricture, and benevolent purposes in an eminent degree, and a rare union of brevity and comprehensiveness, on one of the most important and interesting subjects which can in these times engage and fix the attention of every class in society, and which demands the prompt and decisive interference of the Legislature. That your valuable work may have the influence which it ought to have with those who possess the power of giving effect to its wise recommendations, is the sincere wish of, Gentlemen, your obliged and faithful servant,

Discussions afterwards took place in that House upon the subject, and in one of the debates the hon. Member for Cavan and the hon. Member for Middlesex suggested that some person professionally connected with Ireland should endeavour to settle this question. The Government of the noble Lord the Member for London (Lord John Russell) having paid great attention to this subject, at length brought in a measure with regard to it. The noble Lord was disappointed, however, in any expectation he might have formed of its giving satisfaction, and withdrew it. He said it with the greatest deference, but he must say this with regard to Ireland, that he had always thought it was a wrong policy to try and frame measures to catch any mere passing popularity—to please those whose province and interest it was not to be pleased with any measures that were proposed—but that, on the other hand, they should do that which they believed to be equitable and right, and trust that in the end what was based upon a sound and just principle would commend itself to the people, and that the good sense and judgment of the community would adopt that which careful deliberation had led them to propose. Now a code of laws, that was intended to regulate and adjust the relations between landlord and tenant in Ireland, must provide for the demands of the past, the requirements of the future, and the exigencies of the present transition state of that country. He might add, also, that a code of laws such as a British Parliament might be expected to pass affecting property, must keep within the great landmarks of property, and that no right of property universally acknowledged should be tampered with or violated. Moreover, the law should be made to harmonise with our commercial policy, as he (Mr. Napier) understood it now to be established, though he was somewhat surprised to find it was thought by the authors of that policy that the principle of free trade needed the protection of a declaration on the subject on the part of that House. What we had to deal with was the present existing state of Ireland: and, taking all circumstances into consideration, it seemed to him that the present was a peculiarly fitting opportunity for the settlement and adjustment of the relations subsisting between the owner and occupier of the soil in Ireland. Agricultural property there was so greatly rising in value, that according to the information he had lately received, a great competition existed for the land, and some sales had been effected at thirty years' purchase, and others at twenty-five. The prosperity of Ireland was not an isolated question; for with the prosperity of Ireland were bound up the security and strength of the United Kingdom. He did not wish to present her—he had never desired to see her coming forward—in the attitude and spirit of a mendicant, and he had always felt a glow of shame when he thought of the greatest nation in the world being placed side by side with a country which seemed to be at all in a mendicant state. Ireland had undoubtedly great resources, but he thought the first and material thing she required for her advancement and prosperity was security for life and protection for property; and those objects would be assisted by the enactment of really just and fair laws; and the next thing he thought she required at this moment was the adjustment of the long-vexed land question. Ireland was an agricultural country; they could not expect that manufactures or commerce would make great way there until there had been a large advance in agricultural improvement. The adjustment of the land question was therefore a great question for Ireland first, and secondly, for the British empire at large. The adjustment of the land question had relation not merely to present exigencies, but also to past difficulties. He had now, however, only to deal with that portion of the question which was connected with the law of landlord and tenant; and he believed that if they could but see life secure, property protected, and the land question equitably adjusted, an improved cultivation of the soil would follow, and they would witness among his countrymen more of mutual forbearance and of common co-operation for their common welfare. He should then have no fears for that country; Ireland must improve and grow largely in prosperity. With regard to that portion of the subject to which he had now to address himself in the adjustment of the land question, it was attended with two classes of difficulties, which ought to be considered separately for the purpose of understanding the nature of the remedies which it was proposed to apply to them. These were the permanent difficulties and the temporary difficulties. With respect to the permanent difficulties, they had heard numerous discussions and various theories as to what caused these permanent difficulties. One theorist would tell them that they were owing to the priests; another that they were caused by the parsons. One would attribute it to the landlords, another to the tenants. One would charge it upon the Government, and upon English legislation, another upon Irish neglect; whereas the truth was that all these several causes had contributed their quota towards producing the general result. But, for his own part, after carefully and attentively considering these various causes, he felt that there could be no question that the policy which had been adopted in earlier times, and had been since long pursued by England towards Ireland, had most severely aggravated the evils under which that country had suffered. The extent to which the system of tenure at will prevailed was not less an evil in the days of Elizabeth than in those of Victoria; and whoever read the pages of Sir John Davies would find that he had emphatically insisted that the application of the English land tenure to Ireland was essential to save the occupants of land in that country from the great and increasing misery, the prostration to which the uncertainty of their tenure in their holdings exposed them; and Edmund Spenser had written in exactly the same spirit; yet, up to the present time, the vast proportion of the land there was occupied by tenants-at-will, having no security whatever for their industry or their enterprise, and consequently in a position befitting the idle or the improvident man, but altogether unsuited to the honest and industrious cultivator. Often neglected by the absentee proprietor, ground down by the middleman, living—if living—from hand to mouth, utterly uncertain and insecure in his holding, the occupier of land lived wretchedly on the potato, and when the first storm arose—when the first calamity occurred at all beyond the ordinary condition—wholly founded. In this way the whole structure of society had become vicious; and in a country where they ought to have had a well-organised state of society, they found that civilisation made small progress, that the people did not improve, and that difficulties and disasters were of periodic recurrence. The commercial policy of England towards her sister country had largely tended to produce this most unhappy result. In 1785 he found Mr. Pitt thus describing the effect of that policy upon Ireland:—

“That which had been the system counteracted the kindness of Providence, and suspended the industry and enterprise of man. Ireland was put under such restraint that she was shut out from every species of commerce;—she was restrained from sending the produce of her own soil to foreign markets, and all correspondence with the colonies of Britain was prohibited to her, so that she could not derive their commodities but through the medium of Britain.” [Hansard, Parl. Hist. xxv. 317.]

That the English system “had debarred Ireland from the use of her own resources, and made her subservient to the interests and the opulence of this country, without suffering her to share in the bounties of nature and in the industry of her citizens”—a system “which counteracted the kindness of Providence, and suspended the industry and enterprise of man.” Again, also, in 1799, Mr. Pitt, speaking on the question of the Union, repeated the same sentiments, and declared that "Ireland had long felt the narrow policy of Great Britain, who, influenced by selfish motives, had treated her with partiality and neglect, and never looked on her prosperity as that of the Empire at large." What had been the result of that policy? Why, that Ireland, with her commercial and manufacturing growth thus stunted, had been compelled to remain a purely agricultural country, and, from the enormous and reckless competition for land which had hence arisen, a most vicious state of society had developed itself — of difficulties and misery among the occupiers of the soil, of incumbrances among its proprietors — a state of society most graphically described by the present Lord Chancellor of Ireland in his evidence before the Committee of 1824. A large proportion of the incumbrances and settlements on Irish estates dated their origin from the latter end of the last and the beginning of the present century; and were based, in a very material degree, upon a fictitious value of land arising out of the circumstances of the time, such as the infinite subdivision of the land, the undue competition, the system of subletting, and the artificial value of land and produce consequent on the state of prices before the conclusion of the war. But recent occurrences having stripped things of that false aspect which they had assumed at the period he referred to, the whole system was found to be rotten and unsound; and having been cleared away by the sufferings of the last few years, an open space was made for a new arrangement, which he hoped they would endeavour to aid him in turning to account for remedial purposes. There were various other matters connected with the country to which he might advert as explaining its position; such as the political influences brought to bear upon owners of property on the one side and the other. For instance, of the two parties in the country, one was corrupted and the other coerced, and all the evils arising out of this state of things were inherited by the landowners of the present day, who ought not to be blamed for the evils arising out of the vicious system that had been thus entailed upon them. At a subsequent period the intervention of Parliament was invoked to provide a remedy, and a series of Parliamentary Committees investigated the subject. A Committee of the House which sat in 1819 appeared to have arrived at the conviction that man in Ireland was a nuisance, and that the main question was how to get rid of many, and, therefore, amongst other remedies for the existing evils, they recommended emigration; and, again, in the years 1823 and 1827, other Committees recommended similar temporary remedies and nostrums. But he had perused a report from another source on the same subject, to which he would direct the attention of the House. It was a report emanating from some members of the Society of Friends. In the year 1827 the excellent Mrs. Fry and her brother, who had conceived a deep interest in the subject, visited Ireland; they examined every county, and made the most minute inquiries into every element of her condition; and the result was, that they prepared a kind of report on the subject for the Marquess of Wellesley, and a better state paper on Ireland never was produced. They stated that what they found in Ireland was a want of employment, a defective administration of justice, and a want of education, prevalent throughout the country; and they added, as a remarkable feature, that scarcely anything was made the most of, and that everywhere the country presented the spectacle of a fine and fruitful land with utterly inadequate cultivation. They expressed their conviction that, if sufficient cultivation was applied to the soil, by the adequate employment of the people, any failure of the potato crop — under existing circumstances so terrible a calamity — would be amply and most beneficially met by a regular supply of the more suitable and far more nutritious description of food, wheaten bread. They considered, they said, that employment would be a far better remedy for the distressed people of Ireland than emigration, although to a limited extent this latter remedy also might be useful; and they insisted, as a grand remedy, upon the effectual alteration of the system under which high nominal rents, low wages, and insecurity of tenure, afflicted the country; and they also recommended (for this was before the Relief Bill of 1829) the establishment of equality of civil rights, adding that the less distinctions of religion were insisted on in civil polity, the greater would be the probability of the establishment of a state of things leading to permanent tranquillity. Had the suggestions made by these able and benevolent persons been acted upon at the time, he would venture to say—not scrutinising the design of the Almighty in the dispensations which had befallen the country, nor causes over which men had no control—he would venture to say, humanly speaking, we should have been spared calamities which Ireland had in late years endured. In 1830—after emancipation, and when the Roman Catholic prelates of Ireland had published a manifesto that they had got all they desired, and that now all parties ought to unite for the common good of Ireland—another Committee sat on Irish affairs, which reported that one-fourth or one-fifth of the population of Ireland were out of employment, and that it was the imperative duty of the Government and of the Legislature to take into consideration the most effectual means of diminishing this amount of non-employment, of introducing into Ireland a sounder economical and social system, and of regulating on more rational and useful principles the relations between landlord and tenant. Nothing, however, was done. Another Committee sat a few years afterwards, who reported that there would absolutely not be a sufficiency of labour in Ireland if the soil were adequately cultivated, and recommended most emphatically that some measures should be adopted for giving tenants for life powers of leasing and charging the inheritance for permanent improvements. Still nothing was done. Mr. Crawford was at this time pressing his Bills in Parliament, but without result; but in 1843 Sir Robert Peel suggested that a Commission should be appointed, of respectable and well-informed persons, to inquire into the whole subject, to ascertain what precise differences there were between the tenures of England, of Scotland, and of Ireland, and maturely consider the result of those inquiries, and the steps which they appeared to suggest. Upon that Commission, at the head of which was Lord Devon, were his hon. and valued Colleague near him, also the hon. Member for Derry, the late Under Secretary and the present Under Secretary for Ireland. That Commission was appointed in February 1843, and made its report in 1845. He was aware that much obloquy had been cast upon that Commission, and many strong observations made upon the manner in which they were said to have taken their evidence; but he must point out that upon its appointment the late Sir Robert Peel said, that by it he did not intend to excite any expectations that there would be the slightest interference with property, the maintenance of the rights of property being the great characteristic of social improvement and progress of civilisation, and any attempt to interfere with it constituting the severest blow that could be given to industry and the accumulation of wealth. Accordingly, that Commission proceeded with its inquiry, subject to the conservation of the rights of property. There were 1,117 witnesses in all examined before it, of which number 117 were proprietors, 451 were farmers, 219 land-agents, and 44 were professional men. The Commission went through every county in Ireland, seeing with their own eyes, and hearing with their own ears. They were personally connected with every province in Ireland, some of them having property in every province. They were honourable men, and men well acquainted with the country. The views of such men, he conceived, furnished a basis on which Parliament might then have proceeded, and might still proceed, with security to all the just rights of property, and with satisfaction to all the just claims of industry. These gentlemen stated that the testimony was uniform as to the unimproved state of certain districts, as to the want of employment, the poverty and hardships of the agricultural population, and they recorded, as their decided opinion, that the agricultural improvement of Ireland was one of the first and most important steps towards the amelioration of the state of Ireland, and the establishment of its prosperity. They particularly and feelingly adverted to the condition of the unfortunate labourers, whom they described as being badly housed, badly fed, and badly paid for precarious labour; and they commended their patient endurance of their sufferings, as entitling them to the best attention of the Government. They recommended the allotment system, the repair of the cottages, and other measures for the amelioration of the labourer; and they spoke also of the impediments in the way of that agricultural improvement which would give employment to the labourer. But the labourers had no political influence; they were neglected, and the disasters which succeeded the failure of the potato were the result of that neglect, and formed [a sore penalty on those who had neglected them. Among these impediments to the improvement of the soil, the Commission adverted to the small number of owners in fee in Ireland as compared with England, there being only 8,000 in Ireland, while there were 200,000 in England; and they spoke of the large amount of property locked up in the settlements to which he had adverted, and which resisted every attempt at improvement. It was while the resources of the country were thus shackled that the landowners and tenants of Ireland were called upon to run with others in the race of unrestricted competition. Whatever might be the opinions entertained as to the principle of unrestricted competition, its partial application must be more injurious than its complete and entire application. The effect of the encumbrances was to sever the rights and duties of proprietorship. The encumbrances were so great that the rental of the property now in the Encumbered Estates Court, if paid up punctually, would not amount to more than 5 per cent on the amount of the encumbrances. The result of such a state of things was, that the owners of these large properties, with a rental of nearly a million and a half, received nothing, and thus had all the duties but none of the rights of their property, whilst the encumbrancers possessed all the rights without being burdened with the performance of any of the duties. They were, for instance, exempted from contributing to the support of the poor, and even, in the case of augmented rates, the result of famine or distress, the nominal owner had to bear the whole burden. The Commission then proceeded to describe many of the remedies which were obvious, such as providing facilities for the sale of land, giving proper powers of leasing and charging for improvements, the encouragement of leases with moderate terms, the effecting of permanent improvements by the landlord, a Bill to provide a registry for agreements, and affording an opportunity for the tenant to improve where there was no express agreement; and they advised also that the Bank of Ireland should have the power, which the Bank of England possessed, of lending money on landed security, whereby a large amount of money would be released, and made available for the improvement of the soil; and also they suggested that permanent improvements should be done by the landlord, rather than by the tenant, adding that some legislative measure was necessary to give efficacy to agreements, and provide for cases which could not be otherwise settled. The measures which he (Mr. Napier) contemplated proposed to give facility for the employment of capital, and remove the restrictions upon the use of it; to enable leases of moderate terms to be made; to give efficacy to the agreements of parties, and also to deal with the cases of those parties who might not themselves have entered into express agreements. The Commission also provided for the registration of agreements, and in order to furnish opportunities for improvement, the landlord should be empowered to execute the improvements suggested by the tenant, charging 5 per cent on the outlay. Mr. Burke, in his Essay on the Penal Laws, noticed that improvements on the land in Ireland were not made in general by the landlords, whereas in England and Scotland they usually were. The Devon Commission also noticed the fact, observing, however, that from the number of small holdings in Ireland, it would be impracticable for the landlords to carry out that system as it was in England and Scotland, where the farms were generally large—of 50 or 100 acres or more—and furnished with buildings and other conveniences. The Committee on Receivers, of which he was Chairman, and of which Sir Robert Peel was a Member, investigated much on this subject, and the startling fact was then disclosed that nearly 2,000,000*l.* of the rental of the country was placed under receivers—a system under which everything that was bad in the habits of the population was fostered and encouraged. The result was most striking. There were millions of acres in the country uncultivated, millions of unemployed people in a state of the utmost wretchedness, and millions of money lying at a low and unproductive rate of interest, and in the Bank of Ireland a large capital unable to be advanced. Reverting to the state of Ireland, as set forth by the Devon Commission, it appeared from the report that in Ireland two-thirds of the population were agricultural, while in England there was only one-fourth—the produce per acre was one-half only of that in England. Let them not delay the remedy for such a state of things as he had described. There was also another report which had been lately issued by the Central Relief Committee of the Society of Friends, who had contributed so largely to relieve the recent distress of Ireland. From this admirable report, which gave the details of what they had done during that period in Ireland, it appeared that in that year of tremendous destitution, when all the world was sympathising with Ireland, there were places where ample means of relief which had been furnished could not be brought into operation from the faulty and vicious state of society which existed, and which furnished no agency to carry out the charitable intentions which these benevolent persons had in contemplation. All this surely called for some remedy, if legislation could by any possibility effect it. He (Mr. Napier) had applied his mind to endeavour, at least in some degree, to remedy the evils he had indicated—to enable improvements to be made by the cultivation of the soil and the employment of the people. Several measures had been tried for this purpose, and there were various models in existence which might have been resorted to to guide them to a proper choice of a remedy; there was the Montgomery Act of Scotland; the Act of 1845, the Landed Estates Improvement Act, passed by the Government of the late Sir Robert Peel; the Act of 1846, under which two millions of money were lent for drainage in Britain; and the Land Improvement Act, passed in the first year of the Government of the noble Lord opposite (Lord J. Russell), which had grown out of the Act of 1846. What had occurred to him was, that farming must now of necessity be placed under totally new conditions. It was admitted on all hands that farmers must, under the present system, be more educated men than hitherto—that they could not go on in the mere routine of ignorant cultivation. It was admitted that there must be industry, skill, and capital applied to the soil; and he found, too, that the effect of recent circumstances and recent policy had been very materially to alter the course of cultivation and produce in Ireland, and to alter it in such a way as might be ultimately beneficial. In the Times newspaper of September 5th, 1850, there had appeared a very striking article as to the altered conditions of the proprietor and the farmer. It described, that under the new state of things, the proprietor must merely be considered as a man possessing so much property, and that while, of course, he was bound to contribute his quota to the necessities of the country, no special burdens were to be cast upon him; at the same time, the farmer must become a man of more capital, more knowledge, and ready to avail himself of more skilful labourers, and of every new improvement, without all which it was impossible he could succeed. He remembered, too, that Sir Robert Peel, when he introduced his measures for a change in the commercial policy of the country, intimated his opinion that probably there would be a reduction of about one-third in prices of agricultural produce; and he added, that if there were any part of the United Kingdom that would suffer from that reduction, it would be Ireland, on account of its being an agricultural country. The right hon. Baronet had undoubtedly been quite right in the reason of that anticipation; and not only did he (the Attorney General) find it true as comparing Ireland with England, but on comparison of one part of Ireland with another. In Belfast, for example, where the commercial, manufacturing, and agricultural population were commingled—where there was an increased number of consumers, and facilities of markets, and of exportation and the like, the capital that accumulated there, and the busy activity of the whole neighbourhood, enabled them to bear up nobly and to get on prosperously. But, if he went to those parts of Ireland where there were no such facilities for communication with other districts having good markets—where there were no works of commercial enterprise going on—where the agricultural body was in a backward state—where the landlord had no capital, and the tenant was ignorant—it was very hard to call upon them to enter upon the race of unrestricted competition. It was the duty of Parliament, by wise legislation, to encourage them, to endeavour to alleviate the condition of those agriculturists, and stimulate their industry. Under the 9 & 10 Vict., c. 101, two millions of money for England and Scotland, and one million for Ireland, were placed by the late Sir Robert Peel at the disposal of the Enclosure Commissioners and the Commissioners of Public Works, to issue as loans to landed proprietors for the purpose of improvement; and this in some degree, where it came into operation, enabled them to meet the altered circumstances. The people of Scotland speedily availed themselves of the advantage thus put at their disposal; but in Ireland, owing to their not having the money to make the advances in the first instance as required by the Act, they were unable to avail themselves of it; and it therefore became necessary, in the next Session of Parliament, under the Government of the noble Lord (Lord J. Russell) to pass a measure to give effect to the intentions of the Legislature. Accordingly one of the best and simplest Acts for Ireland was passed into law, and that Act he had taken as the basis of the first Bill which he now proposed—namely, the Land Improvement Act. The sum advanced altogether, under the law to which he had referred, was two millions sterling—namely, 1,500,000*l.* by the first Act, and afterwards 300,000*l.* and 200,000*l.* The amount of loans applied for under these Acts—principally for the purposes of drainage, and in some few cases for subsoiling and other works—was 4,082,591*l.*; and of this, 1,839,843*l.* were sanctioned, and 1,287,884*l.* actually issued. It was supposed by some persons that these loans were in reality gifts; but he could assure the House that England got back the money. He found by a return that the amount of rentcharge due under these Acts, to the 15th of November, 1852, was 190,151*l.*; and the amount paid on account of the same was 183,150*l.*; and the reason that the remainder had not been paid up was chiefly to be attributed to the circumstance that the officers entrusted with its collection had not given a proper attention to their duty. That showed the punctuality of payment on the part of those to whom the loans were advanced. The drainage which had been performed under this Act had contributed very much to the improvement of the country. It had, to a considerable extent, substituted for cereal crops, green and root crops, which particularly required thorough drainage, and it had led to the introduction into the country of the manufacture of tiles, which were now actually made in Ireland and carried into Scotland. Under this Act, indeed, the most important benefits had been conferred upon the country. There was one case which had come to his knowledge, of a gentleman whose estate was encumbered and who was entirely at the mercy of his creditors, but who got his creditors to consent to allow him to apply for a loan under this Act. The loan was obtained, and expended on the land under the inspection of the Board of Works. The result was, that the gentleman's tenants had been enabled to pay their rents without abatement, that they were now in a prosperous condition, that the gentleman himself and his property had both been saved, that he had now a surplus in his hands, and had been enabled to deal with his creditors like an honest man. There was also the case of a gentleman in the south of Ireland, who applied under this Act for a loan, and one of whose tenants was so opposed to drainage that he at first actually threatened him with an action at law if he attempted to drain any part of his farm. The gentleman, however, persevered with his improvements, and that very tenant had recently called upon and thanked him for what he had done, stating that the effect of the drainage was such that he had been enabled to pay his rent without difficulty, and that he was now contented and prosperous. That showed the resources of Ireland, if properly developed. In many instances the product of the soil had been nearly doubled by drainage. Money advanced, therefore, under the Act would be employed for the material good and general benefit of the country, and he begged the House to observe the collateral effects of the system. Every acre drained employed many labourers, and in several cases where the tenants had the land drained for them, the drainage was accepted in lieu of an abatement of the old rent; showing that it was considered equivalent to at least twenty per cent. If, then, by other modes of proceeding, drainage could be made accessible to tenants of all classes, as well as to proprietors, it would be a great boon to Ireland. He (Mr. Napier) was not there to ask money from Parliament for that purpose, though in his opinion such money would be usefully employed; but he was there to ask the House to agree to a measure which would enable tenants, as well as proprietors of land, private individuals as well as public bodies, to enter on a system of thorough drainage, by empowering them to do so by their private enterprise, if they had means of their own, or, if they were not able to provide the money themselves, to enable them to obtain it from private parties, and by giving facilities to the Bank of Ireland to make advances for that purpose. To effect this the cost would be made the first charge on the land; it would be, moreover, placed under the preliminary control and inspection of the Board of Works in that country. The mode in which it would be placed under that control and inspection was this: the party wishing to drain would have to send in a memorial to the Board containing a specification of the nature of the improvements proposed to be made, the value of those improvements, the return expected, and so forth. In every county of Ireland there were competent persons in connexion with the Board of Works—not paid officers, but persons acquainted with agriculture, and perfectly competent to decide upon the value and character of improvements of this nature. These persons would go at once to the spot with the memorial in their

hand, and examine the lands and test the accuracy of the statement set forth in the memorial; and then, unless they should be of opinion that the projected improvements would increase the value of the land more than $6\frac{1}{2}$ per cent, the application would be refused. The expense of this process would vary from 5s. to 15s. per cent. If the application was acceded to, the money would be expended under the superintendence of the Board of Works, and the improvements to be made would be minutely marked upon the town-land maps of the valuation survey of Ireland. These maps would be preserved for future reference, and the means of registry would be by this means effectually furnished. Another important improvement under the existing Acts had been introduced by one of the Devon Commissioners—he alluded to the drainage of mountain pastures at a cheap rate. The working of that Act had given great satisfaction in Ireland. A proof of this was, that 2,000,000*l.* had been advanced for improvements, and 4,000,000*l.* had been applied for in the course of a few years. Power was given in the Act to the Commissioners of the Board of Works to adjudicate on the increased value of land, in cases where the landlord and tenant could not agree as to the increased value of the land consequent on the improvements; but it was a further proof of the value of the measure that only four applications had been made to them on the subject. In fact, the improvements had left no room for dispute. That Act had been made the basis of the Bill which he now asked leave to introduce. The difficulty in such cases was, first, how to distribute equitably the burden of the improvements between a tenant for life and his successors; and, second, how to adjust matters between the landlord and the tenant. A tenant for life might have only a partial enjoyment of any improvement he might make; and it was only just that those who came after him should pay their proportion of such improvements. What he proposed to do was this—he provided that the money so expended should be made payable in twenty-two yearly instalments, so that every tenant for life would pay exactly as much for the improvement as corresponded to the time during which he enjoyed the estate. This appeared to him to be a great improvement upon the Montgomery Act, which called upon the tenant for life to pay the whole charge in the first instance, and then to throw three-fourths of that charge upon his successor, for it might happen that the tenant for life might live long enough to exhaust the whole improvement himself. It was further provided that the money for these improvements might be obtained from the Bank of Ireland and other private sources, because, after the improvements were certified by the Board of Works, the certificates might be assigned to the parties advancing the money, which certificates would constitute a first charge upon the land. The effect of this would be to enable those who had money of their own, or who could get it from the Bank of Ireland, to carry out fully and fairly, in every part of Ireland, the system of drainage, and subsoiling, and those other improvements calculated to increase to a large extent the productiveness of the soil; to employ to an increased extent also the industry of the people; by so doing to diminish pauperism and the poor's rate, and advance the happiness and civilisation of the whole country. By means of a staff of great experience, the Board of Works would be enabled to give its supervision to these improvements, and in so far a great and beneficial object would be effected for Ireland. It was now quite certain that agriculture, as such, could not get on without green crops; but without draining, green crops, and particularly flax, which was a crop of the first importance to the industry of Ireland, could not be profitably raised; and drainage could not be undertaken in that country without a facility for obtaining advances of money being furnished. The flax raised in Ireland was not more than one-third of what was required for the present consumption of the country, and yet millions of acres were lying useless. By means of drainage, however, Ireland might not alone supply the wants of her own inhabitants, but also those of the inhabitants of other countries. Ireland would also find out, by the experience which these improvements would involve, the sort of cultivation that was best adapted to her soil and her resources; and so, by an interchange with other countries, would conduce to the general welfare of mankind. This Bill was framed for the purpose of promoting that object with the greatest ease; and he hoped, therefore, it would receive the support of the House.

The next measure to which he should come was one of very great importance—indeed he attached more importance to it himself than he did to any of the others.

He meant the Bill to facilitate the making of beneficial leases and agreements for compensation for improving land in Ireland. He found that in Ireland there existed somewhat about sixty statutes conferring special powers upon persons in the position of tenants for life, upon corporations, and public bodies—such as boards, governors of charities, &c.—to make leases for particular objects. Sometimes the tenant for life had the power of making leases of from three to fifteen acres; sometimes, in ecclesiastical tenures, the rector had the power of making a lease for a year, a bishop for twenty-one years, and so on. The Bill he proposed to introduce recognised the principle as laid down by the Devon Commission, and by a Committee of that House that sat in 1848—that a person having a limited interest in an estate should have the power of leasing the land to the best advantage: it reduced the powers under one uniform principle; and by so doing simplified the process of their application. The Montgomery Act, passed for Scotland in the reign of George III., recognised these powers, though in a limited form; but other Acts had been passed since for that country, expanding the principle, and enabling parties to grant leases for proper terms on certain specified conditions. In the present circumstances of Ireland it was highly desirable to carry out the cultivation of the soil in all its forms to the fullest extent possible; it would be far better to arrange at the beginning of a tenure the question of outlay and expenses, than to leave it for a scramble at the end. In Scotland the tenant obtained leases of 19, 31, and even 99 years. What he wished was to carry out the principle in Ireland. He was of opinion that, as they applied the principle of free trade to the produce of land, it had become imperative upon the Legislature to remove restraints upon the use of the land itself. In the Bill before the House he had specified the classes—including all the parties, corporations or governors of charities—tenants for life, and those who exercised special powers in connexion with the land; and what he wanted to accomplish was this, that, although he quite approved of the proper use of landed property for family purposes, yet he desired that those purposes should be carried out in a manner consistent with the beneficial cultivation of the soil. Instead, then, of having a large number of inconsistent and anomalous statutes on the subject of leases, and of the inconsistency of regulating the term by the character of the depository of the power, to regulate the term of the lease by the uses to which the land was to be applied, and the nature and object of the improvements. Thus, for agricultural purposes, it was proposed to grant leases for 31 years; for the improvement of waste lands, leases of 61 years; for the working of mines, leases for 41 years; for private buildings, leases for 99 years; and for public edifices and public purposes generally, leases of 999 years. The necessity of the latter tenure was proved by an instance which had come to his knowledge of two model agricultural schools and farms having to be abandoned in parts of Ireland where, perhaps, of all others it was most required, because the promoters of the plan could not obtain leases long enough for the purpose. What he wanted was not an ignorant and impoverished agricultural population in that country, but a people both educated and employed. The tenant for life was now prevented from making a lease, except for the brief periods and for the special purposes stated, by want of power. That power, however, was proposed to be conferred by the Bill; for it stood to reason that the parties enjoying the tenancy for life should also possess the power of doing all that was needful—consistent with the strict observance of the honest purposes of family settlements—for the improvement of the property, and for the general good of the community. To all those persons and corporations particularised it was proposed to give the power of making such leases, for the purposes stated. There were other provisions in the Bill, setting forth special cases for leases, with such clauses as were best calculated to carry out the objects in view. The terms of such leases were accordingly set out in the Bill—whether for agricultural leases, or for other purposes—to save the trouble and expense and risk of tedious covenants set forth in each particular lease. One clause in the measure, however, might, he was bound to admit, be deemed open to discussion—namely, that which proposed to enable parties to agricultural leases to make the question of rent a subject of variation, according to the value in the general valuation survey of Ireland. His reason for adopting this was confirmed by a communication sent to him by the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland—a nobleman who took the deepest interest in everything that concerned the prosperity of that country—referring to a remarkable case in Scotland, the particulars of which that noble Lord had been furnished with by a gentleman in connexion with the transaction. Being himself connected with the working of the Montgomery Act in Scotland, Lord Eglinton had supplied him with this case as an illustration of the mode in which property had been improved in that country, and as a lesson for Ireland. It referred to an estate in Scotland, which consisted of 1,170 acres, and which was divided into twelve farms or tenancies. The tenants had been tenants at will, and after the Act of 1819 regulating the currency, in common with several tenants in Scotland they had fallen into arrear with their rents. In 1826 a gentleman—the gentleman who furnished the statement to Lord Eglinton—was asked to take charge of the property in question, but he declined to do so as the tenantry were so poor and so much in arrear. In 1830, however, it was again pressed on him, and he then consented to try the management on condition that the tenants were got to take leases. It was, therefore, arranged that the tenants should take leases for a term of sixteen years, the rent to be regulated every four years by the prices of produce; and the leases were taken accordingly in 1832. They were then induced to join with the landlord in tile-drainage, he contributing 3,349*l.*, they contributing, as their quota, to the extent of 2,255*l.* The rent for the years from 1843 to 1848 was settled at 1,715*l.* 7*s.* 4*d.*; in 1848 the leases expired, and they were, as is the custom in Scotland, to be then set up to public competition. But all the old tenants again took their former holdings, though the property had been revalued at the prices of produce in 1848, 1847, 1846, and 1845, and though the rent had, notwithstanding, been increased 24 per cent, being then 2,121*l.* And further, during the last fifteen years of their tenancy under these conditions, their rent was not, in the case even of a single tenant, a single day, or a shilling, in arrear. When the draining commenced, this gentleman proposed that a committee of tenants should decide what period ought to remunerate for the improvement; and it was unanimously agreed on by them that five years would be sufficient and satisfactory from the sinking of the drains. In 1848, therefore, those tenants who had been in arrear in 1832, were in comfortable circumstances, and their rents paid to the last farthing; and, moreover, they resumed their tenancy at a rise of 24 per cent on the former rent of the estate. The fact was, that by the co-operation of the landlord and tenant, in attending to the due cultivation of the soil, both parties benefited; there was no scrambling, confusion, or recrimination; and this state of things was brought about by a sensible and just agent, who appreciated the capabilities of the property, and who resorted to those means of improvement which were the means which God would ever bless, namely, the industry and virtue of the people. The gentleman who sent this statement to Lord Eglinton had said that he could not see why a similar result should not be produced in Ireland. He did not see it either, if, as that gentleman said, they only laid themselves to it. Some parts of Ireland were, no doubt, peculiarly situated as respected the introduction of improvements; but in most places the greatest natural facilities existed; and if all parties co-operated, he could not see why success should not equally crown their efforts. By enabling the landlord, when tenant for life, to grant beneficial leases and regulate the rent by the prices of produce, it might be effected. This was a simple and intelligible view, and perfectly comprehensible to all parties. The experience of this Scotch case was, therefore, a good lesson, of which he felt he ought to avail himself. There was, however, another curious fact which had forced itself also on his attention in connexion with this question. In the examination of the Rev. Mr. O'Sullivan before the Lords' Committee in 1825, it was stated that there was one townland of the county Tipperary from which there had not been a single inhabitant brought under the provisions of the Insurrection Acts, and that in this townland the rent had always been regulated by the prices of produce. It was these facts that had induced him to continue this clause, which he hoped would be found one not the least beneficial of the Bill. With regard to drainage in Ireland—especially drainage with subsoiling—it was very difficult to settle the compensation, as it was not easy to ascertain what subsoiling had been done, unless a man was on the spot watching its progress; but when the landlord and the tenant joined together for that purpose, it could be done cheaply, it could be done effectively, it could be done without contest, and would be of the greatest advantage to the country as the means of pulverising the soil and increasing the quantity of produce as well as the quality. There were other provisions in the Bill with respect to leases under powers; but to show the injurious operation of the former law, he would merely quote one instance. In the town of Ballycastle, in Antrim, the tenants took leases under trustees, for lives renewable for ever. These leases were only executed by one of the trustees of the estate, the other trustee not being in the country; but the agent for the property was so well known that the tenants reposed the utmost confidence in him. Some of the tenants spent from 700*l.* to 800*l.* upon solid buildings and other improvements. Subsequently the estate came under the jurisdiction of the Court of Chancery, as the property of a lunatic, and then it was discovered that one trustee had not executed the leases. On reference to the Master, the Court of Chancery held these leases, therefore, to be invalid, and an action of ejectment was accordingly brought against the tenants. The Solicitor General for Ireland and himself were of counsel for the tenants, and they succeeded in defeating the ejectment by a point of law—at least of locking it up in Chancery; but the unfortunate tenants were within an ace of losing their property. The provision he proposed in the Bill to meet such cases would amply provide that such bonâ fide leases, would be perfectly valid as regarded the tenants. There were other provisions, also, of a remedial nature; and then came a second class of provisions, having for their object to enable parties empowered to grant leases, to make agreements for improvements on the lands which might be already in lease. He believed hon. Gentlemen connected with Ireland would bear him out when he said that there were several towns in that country where, by reason of the defective powers relating to leasing, improvements could not go forward. He had known places where extensive manufactories would have been established only that by reason of the property being in tenants for life, they could not sufficiently demise it for such purposes. One case he knew of, in which a person who desired to build a factory close by a turf-bog, because of the supply of fuel, could not do so in consequence of the tenant for life being empowered to grant him only three acres of land, which were wholly inadequate for his purpose. The result was that he went to another neighbourhood, and there established his manufactory. As things stood, the effect of this was to lock up the resources of the country, without doing a particle of good to any person. The provisions of the Bill would give power to persons, empowered already to grant leases, to make beneficial leases, and to make collateral agreements for purposes connected with the improvement of the country. The improvements contemplated were the cultivation of waste lands, the formation of farm roads, thorough draining, irrigation, the removal of rocks and stones, the erection of boundary fences and internal fences, enclosing not less than ten acres, and other improvements of that nature; and he held that the Legislature was bound to fix a certain number of years for the periods applicable to each of these classes of improvements. In order to do this, he had fixed a certain number of years as what he would call compensation periods; because, he believed, experience had shown that within a certain period of time the tenant making an outlay for improvements was compensated for that outlay. He did not propose to take a short period; but in places where the tenants had the advantage of skill and ability they would gain a quicker return than those who were, as he might call them, unlearned. Accordingly he had in the Act inserted provisions by which these special matters were to be regulated. Thus he expected persons would be enabled to make beneficial leases, and enter into specific agreements for any particular class of improvements. Nothing was more desirable than to have means at hand by which mutual agreements could be made and enforced. It was most important in such a case that there should be a connexion between the landlord and tenant, for, if they were placed in collision, an injury was inflicted upon the whole community. The great object of the Legislature ought to be to promote, as far as possible, their common welfare, by showing them that they had a common interest. The Bill would provide for a decree and an appeal to the Judges of Assize when parties were dissatisfied, for there was a power of recovering compensation in case the tenant was dispossessed before the expiration of the period during which he ought to enjoy the land, in order to reap the benefit of his improvements. It might be said that it was a very hard case to make the tenant for life pay the whole compensation, and that he ought to have some contribution from those who succeeded him in the possession of the property. The tenant for life, however, had the alternative of not disturbing the possession of his tenant. If, then, the tenant was allowed to remain in possession during a period which would compensate him for the particular class of improvements he might have made, he had no ground of complaint; and if the tenant so remaining in possession paid his rent the landlord could not complain. He (Mr. Napier), therefore, thought the sound principle was to say to the tenant for life, "Don't you attempt the injustice of dispossessing a man who has made improvements before the period has elapsed during which he may get compensation; but if you do dispossess him, you are bound to compensate him yourself." If, however, the tenant did not pay his rent, it was manifestly unjust to allow him to retain possession of the property; and in such case no claim for compensation would be allowed. But when a tenant was dispossessed under circumstances he had no reason to anticipate, then he was to have compensation. If he abided by his contract, paid his rent, and made improvements, he would be secured by the proposed law, and the contract could be carried out. With respect to a power of setting-off for exhaustion of the land, a tenant would receive full compensation for real improvements, but against that compensation a set-off would be open for exhaustion and bad cultivation of the land. Every protection was given to the tenant for so much as he had expended in improvements, and the provisions for that purpose would be found to have been drawn up with the greatest care, and with the view to do substantial justice to all classes of tenants and landlords—but he would candidly say that his sympathies went much more with an industrious tenant than with an improvident landlord. He regarded the industrious tenantry as a class of men entitled to every consideration, and who ought to receive every protection that could be afforded them by legislation; and he had endeavoured to protect them, as far as was consistent with justice and the rights of property. He hoped that by removing restrictions upon the beneficial cultivation and enjoyment of the land, the tenant would be enabled to make improvements by contract and agreement—they would secure to the tenants full legal protection —that they would give to the tenants every shelter and security the law could give them, while at the same time the just rights attached to property were fully secured to the landlords. He had now disposed of two Bills, the first of which enabled proprietors to improve their land; and the other enabled them to make beneficial leases and agreements with tenants for the profitable cultivation of the land. In framing these Acts he had endeavoured to create a machinery which in its working would be found to promote the best interests of Ireland. With respect to the case of mortgagors, powers were given to enable persons in possession to make leases and agreements—a step which, while it would preserve the necessary safeguards for every creditor, would increase the value of the heritable estate, and would remove impediments to proper cultivation. He would now refer to the admirable report of the Society of Friends, in which two things were recommended—the freedom of making contracts, and facilities for enforcing them. This led him to submit the next measure he had to offer to the consideration of the House—a Bill for consolidating, simplifying, and amending the existing laws which regulate the relation of landlord and tenant in Ireland so as to enable those who had made contracts to secure their enforcement. This Bill stated as its basis, that the relation of landlord and tenant should rest on contract. At the present time a struggle was going on between the old feudal principle and the commercial spirit of the nation; and the question which arose was, was the old strict system of feudal rights to continue, or were contracts to be founded on principles more consonant to justice and to common sense? It was the object of the present measures to meet the difficulty. Contracts, indeed, might be express stipulations, or of such a nature as would grow out of the relations of parties. He thought it the duty of the Legislature to make a sort of model contract, to state what contracts ought to be, and to make provisions for enforcing contracts according to the exigencies of the case. He knew it would be said that such contracts could not be very well made in Ireland, because, with regard to land, parties were not on equal terms. He admitted that where undue competition existed for land, there were more than ordinary difficulties in the case. Nothing, in his opinion, was more calculated to increase this kind of competition than that of leaving parties to suppose, that though convenient to make an offer, they should never be obliged to abide by the terms. The surest way to cure the mischief flowing from such a state of things, was to have a law that contracts for land could be enforced against both parties — there was no other law which would tend so much to promote among the people of Ireland punctuality, honesty, and morality. The endeavour had been made to carry out the second view expressed in the admirable report of the Society of Funds—namely, after making provision for perfect freedom of contract in agreements between landlord (and tenant), to provide facilities for carrying these agreements into execution. By the new Bills he had disposed of about 200 statutes; and thus the whole subject having been brought to a focus, it was hoped the law would work in a beneficial way. After going into Committee, it was intended to schedule all the old Acts, and parties would find in the new Acts all the information they could require as to their respective rights. With respect to the law of assignment, that was dealt with in the Bills; and with regard to subletting, that question was also considered. As to the subdivision of land, one of the greatest evils under which Ireland laboured, that was duly provided for. There could be no doubt of the old system being in a state of change. Small holdings or farms were found not to answer, and very great changes had occurred in this respect of late years. In the year 1841, the number of farms from 1 to 5 acres was 310,375. In 1851 the same class of farms numbered only 88,083; showing a reduction of 222,000 of this amount. In 1841 the class of farms from 5 to 15 acres numbered 252,758. In 1851 the number was 191,854, a reduction of upwards of 60,900. In 1841 the number of farms from 15 to 30 acres was 79,838. In 1851 the number had increased to 141,311. In 1841 the number of farms of 30 acres and upwards was 48,623, and in 1851 the same class of farms had increased to 149,093. It appeared, in truth, that of the small holdings under 15 acres one-half were gone. This was sufficient evidence of the change which was going on; but, at the same time, there was another circumstance which he could not speak or think of without deep and solemn concern, that with the small holdings the small holders had gone too—that nearly a million and a half of the people were swept away. It was indispensable that the subletting evil should be cured, otherwise drainage could not be carried out. Provision was made in the Bill for a local register of deeds; and the rights and reservations connected with mines and forests were condensed. Provisions were also made with respect to the waste or burning of land: the great object of the present Bills was not to punish, but to prevent the mischief. The practice of burning was so injurious, that in Roscommon, where such a process had taken place, the land had been deteriorated in value very considerably compared with adjacent land of equal quality. In the new measures power was given, by application to a magistrate, to stop this mischief. Formerly punishment was inflicted after the injury was done, but by the new law it was competent for parties, if they suspected injury by waste or burning was about to be done, to apply to a magistrate, who was empowered to issue a stop order. If, however, it should turn out that the tenant thought he was by such order prevented from doing that which he had a right to do, and was justified in doing, then the tenant was empowered to apply either to the assistant barrister, if in the county, or to a Judge of Assize, or to a Superior Court, to have the magistrate's order annulled. The present law, which required that a party aggrieved should go to a Court of Equity for the purpose of getting an order to stay waste, did not prevent waste from going on while the application was in progress. That difficulty would be obviated when a landlord was entitled to have a stop order, and the provision of the Bill on that subject would, he thought, be found useful and valuable. As to the duty of tenants to repair, that question was considered, as also was the question of the condition of the labouring classes. It was expedient, in order to effect improvement in the condition of the labouring classes, that they should have decent cottages and small allotments. Formerly the labouring classes were under the control of the grinding middleman—2,000,000 of people were in the condition of mere nests of insects, which the middleman chose to assume the right to trample upon. It was necessary that proprietors should now look after their labourers, and see that they had cottages so constructed as that they might live in a room different to that tenanted by the pig or cow. He was delighted to state that several landed proprietors had taken a great interest in the improvement of the comforts and the elevation of the Irish labouring classes, and had followed out the recommendations of the Devon Commission. In order to induce landlords to pay attention to this subject, it was proposed to deprive the landlords of the power of recovering rent if proved that they neglected to repair a certain class of cottages. Summary power was however given to get possession, when the labourer was dismissed. Then there were provisions with respect to rent. When it occurred that parties violated the conditions of their lease, instead of, as before, going for redress to the Superior Courts, it was proposed to give a remedy by a simple plaint, by way of civil bill. It was provided that the receipt for rent should specify the gale for which the rent was paid; or, if not, that the rent should be considered as paid for the gale which was due on the last gale day. The real contest between the landlord and tenant related, generally speaking, to what was the state of the recent account; and when that was adjusted the other questions in dispute were easily settled; but by the provisions he had inserted parties would be enabled to go to a court of justice and get a settlement cheaply and speedily. As to the law of set-off, that should be the same as for any other debt. With respect to the law of distress, there was great difference of opinion before the Devon Commission about it. Many thought it not wise to abolish the law of distress; but in Ireland that law, from the peculiar circumstances of the country, had been attended with great abuses and great hardship. In some cases it was difficult for the landlord to use any other remedy than the law of distress for his rent; but though he had devoted the best ability he possessed to the framing of clauses, it would be presumptuous in him to expect, where interests so large and so various were involved, that he had satisfied all parties. But he could assure the House that it was in no party spirit the measures had been framed—that he had been anxious only to do justice to all parties; and he invited suggestions from every quarter, and every suggestion calculated to make the measure more equitable and practicable—come from what quarter it might—should have full consideration. With respect, then, to this remedy for rent, what was proposed was this:—but, first, he should remind the House, that with respect to the present law of distress, a landlord could distrain for six years' rent. Nothing could be more unmerciful towards a tenant than for a landlord to allow the rent to run on for such a period. If tenants got into arrear, then litigation ensued—vast expense was incurred—the relations between tenant and landlord were permanently soured, and both parties were set against each other, to their mutual injury. To do away with this state of things, it was proposed to limit the right of distress so that no distress should be made in virtue of any warrant for arrears of rent due more than a year and a half from the date of the warrant; and that no distress should be made for a sum less than 5*l*. Parties, on making an affidavit of the amount of rent due—which was not to be less than the specified sum—might get a special warrant, but that warrant would not enable him to recover more than the rent of one year and a half. When there was a dispute whether the rent was due or not, the fact would be ascertained without the necessity of encountering the tedious and vexatious procedure, from which advantage was scarcely ever derived. There was no doubt it did no service to a tenant to afford facilities to evade a distress; but if the Legislature considered it right to give the tenant power to make a contract with his landlord, it must give the necessary powers to enforce that contract, though they could not by Act of Parliament make either good landlords or honest tenants. Supposing the law of distress he now proposed should be adopted, he next provided easier proceedings in ejectment, by which that remedy would be much simplified. Constant confusion had arisen as to the parties entitled to receive notice of ejectment. He proposed that all parties in actual possession and all such other parties as had availed themselves of the local registry of leases, should have the right to be served with such notice. He had abolished all those fictions which were remnants of feudal times, and had adopted a system consistent with the advanced state of civilisation. Every day, as society improved, as education advanced, and as public opinion was brought more and more to bear upon the laws of the land, that rule of simplification would, and ought to, become more and more adapted to the growing exigencies of the country. Then, again, there were provisions applicable to deserted tenancies. It often happened that tenants abandoned their land and went off to America. It was hard upon the landlord, under these circumstances, that he should not be able to regain easy possession of his property. He had introduced a provision to give the landlord an easy remedy in that case. Sometimes it happened that when a tenancy was at an end, and a writ of possession executed, the tenant forcibly came back again. The present form by which he could be punished was antiquated and operose. A provision to meet this evil had likewise been introduced. He had now gone through, as briefly as the nature of the question would admit, the whole of the case relating to the making of leases and agreements for improvements of land in Ireland, and the mode of enforcing them; and he hoped that the Bills he proposed to introduce would constitute a complete code upon that subject. He again begged to acknowledge the great assistance he had derived from the friends whose names he had already mentioned, and he hoped the scheme would facilitate the combined efforts of both landlords and tenants for the improvement of the land and the employment of the people.

He now came to his fourth and last measure, which was a Bill to provide for compensation to tenants, in the absence of express contract. If they had only to deal with the future, he could rest satisfied with the three Bills the provisions of which he had already explained to the House. But they had to deal with a vast number of tenants who held from year to year, especially in the north of Ireland, who had made improvements on the land. The claims of those persons required attentive consideration. It was not his intention to interfere with or to prejudice the tenant-right which prevailed in Ulster. It was not considered judicious to do so; in fact, with regard to the tenant-right of Ulster, it was not capable of being reduced to a fixed law, because the right was varying in its practice. There was nothing, in fact, to prevent any landlord in any part of Ireland from introducing the same practice that prevailed in the north of Ireland. It was a mode of dealing which had grown up from the necessity of the case, such as the existence of small farms, and the habit of landlords not to make the improvements. The tenants, therefore, improved the land themselves; and it was only just to consider whether those tenants could not have the benefit of those improvements also secured to them by some legal enactment. Preceding Governments had attempted to deal with that part of the law of landlord and tenant. A Bill on the subject was committed to the charge of the noble Earl now at the head of the Government, when he was Secretary for the Colonies in 1845, which was read a second time, and referred to a Select Committee. After going through the Select Committee the objections made to it were left for the consideration of the Government, and the Bill was then dropped. In the next Session another edition of the Bill was introduced by Lord Lincoln, and by the right hon. Baronet the Member for Carlisle (Sir James Graham). Both those Bills dealt only with the question of compensation to the tenant; and while they differed from each other in the mode of ascertaining that point, they agreed in this, that they were both prospective. The second Bill was not passed. In 1848 the late Government introduced a Bill upon the same subject, which was referred to a Select Committee, where it underwent considerable discussion, and it was again introduced in 1850. Now, having been a Member of that Committee, looking at the provisions of those several Bills, and considering that they emanated from different sections of the House, and having also heard the discussions in Parliament upon that question, he thought he could pretty fairly estimate what was the extent to which Parliament would go upon the subject. He adverted to these circumstances for this reason, that he would candidly and honestly avow he was himself willing to go to the utmost extent consistent with the just rights of property, to secure the greatest advantage to the industrious tenants, and to give them a fair and legal security for what they conceived to be covered and secured to them by a moral obligation. But the condition in which he (Mr. Napier) stood in that House was different from that in which hon. Gentlemen on the opposite side were placed. They might propose what might appear to be useful to themselves as a means of gaining popularity, but he was bound to propose what he considered practicable. He felt he was bound in this matter—officially bound—to protect all the rights of property, and not to propose anything which he believed contrary to those rights. Knowing, therefore, the feeling of the House of Commons on the question, he felt that he ought not to peril an equitable measure by endeavouring to propose what he knew would not be carried, nor to introduce such clauses as would tend rather to obstruct than to promote useful legislation. He had stated that that Bill did not interfere with the tenant-right of Ulster; but he thought that it honestly carried out the view of the Devon Commission, because it did not interfere with the just rights of landlords, nor did it interpose any difficulty in the way of the tenants. Where the parties did not choose to make their own agreement, he proposed to enable the tenant—if the landlord would not stir in the first instance—to make improvements beneficially connected with the soil, and to propose, on his part, that he would execute them. It enabled the landlord, however, to make himself the execution of these improvements, on the report of the Board of Works, as proposed by his first Bill, and thus to supersede the necessity of the tenant undertaking them. He knew that a strong feeling prevailed in England on this point, that tenants from year to year ought not to have the power of forcing improvements on their landlords. But when it was considered that the Devon Commission had recommended such a concession—that on two occasions Bills had been introduced embodying that principle—one of them by the noble Earl at the head of the Government, and another which had only been stopped by the then Government going out of office; namely, that in Ireland, where the landlord had the option of taking upon himself the making of the improvements, the tenant should, in case the landlord refused, make the improvements himself, always giving to the landlord the security of an inspection by the Board of Works, he did not think that there was any good ground for the landlord to complain of this provision of his Bill. The landlord having the opportunity of either making the improvements himself, or of inspecting those made by the tenant, furnished a basis for compensation to the tenant for the improvements so made by him. There were provisions in the Bill prescribing the mode of ascertaining the amount of compensation, which, consisting of details, would be better explained in Committee. As to the immediate effect of this measure, he would not venture to make any prophecy, though his own opinion was, that perhaps the power thus given to the tenant might, in some cases, be abused; but, finally, his belief was, that the tenants would come in under agreements with their landlords in accordance with the second Bill he had explained to the House, and that the result would be most advantageous to both parties; that additional inducement would be given for the improvement of the soil, and great advancement in the general system of cultivation in Ireland. He now came to a part of the Bill which had given rise to a great deal of controversy; and that was with regard to what was called the retrospective clauses of the Bill. On the one hand it was said that, if a tenant had done that which a good tenant ought to do, in beneficially cultivating the land, or making other improvements for farming purposes before the passing of the Bill, he ought to be compensated for them. On the other hand, it was said that if they once admitted retrospective legislation on this point, they could not know what consequences would follow. The subject was one which he had most anxiously considered, and having weighed every argument with the greatest care, he confessed he had come to the conclusion that retrospective improvements ought to be provided for. He thought so, inasmuch as it was confined to that class of improvements specified under the Lands Improvements Act, which landlords had been able to make by means of loans of public money, which showed that they were of importance as connected with the beneficial cultivation of the soil, and of immense importance as regarded the welfare of the population. At various periods the people of Ireland had been visited by famine, from the failure of the potato crop and other causes—famines of which he hoped they might never witness a repetition; but it was only by using the just and available means which God had put in their power, that they could hope to avert them, and to advance the civilisation of the people. He thought, therefore, that where a tenant had made such improvement, he should be secured in possession for a compensating period as if he had got, at the time of beginning to make these improvements, a lease to cover such a period. After coming to that conclusion, he had been greatly fortified in it by what he had found in the Poor Law Act of 1849—one clause of which, after reciting the importance of encouraging such improvements, went on to direct the valuator not to include in his valuation any of those agricultural improvements specified in the Land Improvement Act, which had been made seven years before the time of valuation. In the General Land Valuation Act a similar clause was introduced. The Bill of 1850 confined the retrospective clause to cases in which the property was under the value of 10*l*. But he could see no principle upon which a property worth 20*l*. should be placed in a worse condition than a property of 10*l*. The fact showed that in the opinion of the Legislature it was quite possible to ascertain when and what improvements had been made, and it further showed that the law was necessary for the purpose of justice, and was founded upon grounds of policy. In his humble judgment, the tenant was entitled to compensation (if ejected on the title) for the period not yet expired, and he had accordingly introduced provisions to carry out that principle, guarded so as fully to secure the rights of both parties. Another case had been forcibly put with respect to improvements made at a time when prices were so high that the tenant was enabled to pay a higher rent; and it was said that the tenant should have the power of surrendering his farm whenever he pleased, and of then forcing compensation from the landlord for the unexpired period of his tenure; but, with every desire to favour the honest and industrious occupier, he must say he could not reconcile such a demand with the great principle of the rights of property on which all civilised society must ultimately rest. It seemed to him that any attempt to carry out this proposal by legislative enactment, which he could not see his way at all clearly to do, must interfere with the adjustment of rent between landlord and tenant which it was so desirable to leave to mutual contract. It was true that in the working out of these relations there were evils to be found which were inseparable from all general systems, but they were evils which he did not think the Legislature could rectify by stepping in further between the owners and occupiers of the land. If, however, he had failed in providing a remedy for any particular evil which might be removed, and if any hon. Member thought he had not done full justice in any special case, he would be delighted to give his most candid and careful consideration to any clause that might be framed to remove those imperfections, and to recommend it to the House, should he think it deserving of support. If he thought he could not introduce such clauses, of course those hon. Gentlemen who suggested and framed them would be at liberty to lay their propositions before the House. But when he found Mr. Sharman Crawford declaring before the Devon Commission, stating that the great object which he had in view was to secure practically a continuance of possession to the improving tenant; and in answer to a question put to him, that he was of opinion the adjustment of rent was a thing which could not be done by any compulsory enactment; and when he found the hon. Member for the county of Cork, in a pamphlet he wrote on the land question, stating that he looked on compulsory legislation on such a subject as a delusion of a most mischievous description, he quite agreed with them, believing, as he did, that these were cases in which the Legislature could not advantageously interfere. He had done as much as could be done, so far as he could see, to protect and secure the tenant; but he could not approve of a law to enable the tenant to compel compensation from the landlord by surrendering his farm when he pleased. He had endeavoured to encourage the tenant to continue his improvements to the end of his term, and not, as was too often the case, carry them on for a short time and then withdraw; and it would be seen that the regulations for the outgoing tenant had been framed with that view. The law of emblements was rendered a little more liberal than it was made in the law of 1851, and some alterations had also been made in respect to fixtures. The remaining parts of the Bill referred to the procedure in civil-bill courts, and to the conditions under which compensation for the improvements of tenants from year to year was to be enforced. The quantity of details unavoidably noticed fell far short of the entire of the provisions actually embodied in these Bills, which he now must leave for future discussion in Committee.

Such, then, was the outline of the code which he proposed for the adoption of the House, and the acceptance of such proprietors and tenants in Ireland as might not desire to sacrifice any of those rights of property which formed the basis of civil society. Subject to these rights, and so far as their just limits would allow, he had endeavoured to meet the exigencies of Ireland in a liberal and generous spirit. In preparing this code, and in considering every suggestion submitted to him, he knew he had added many an hour of toil to a life of no ordinary labour. Every suggestion which might hereafter be offered, from whatever quarter it might come, would be accepted and considered in the same spirit in which these measures had been submitted to the House. He knew the recompense too often bestowed on those who preferred the moderate and equitable adjustment of extreme opinions and conflicting claims to the gratification of narrow prejudices, but who considered the common weal and the interests of all as paramount to the selfish demands of any class or party. The man who was clamorous about rights and negligent of duties would depreciate his labours; the grinding middleman would dislike, and the factious or fraudulent tenant would heartily condemn them—for all this he was quite prepared. Enough for him, if by this code he had provided a freer course for industry, and had raised up an obstacle to injustice. If he should afford the means of developing effectively the resources of a land which God had blessed but man had blighted, the recompense would be to him an exceeding great reward. They might ask him, indeed, whether he hoped that by any measure of legislation they could bring peace and prosperity to Ireland? And he should answer, that they could not, except in so far, indeed, as their legislation might be a portion of that appointed agency which He could bless whose gracious touch could make the very act of ministering to the wants of the multitude the occasion and the means of increase and abundance. The voice of mercy had resuscitated Ireland—the flush and flow of returning life reanimated her frame; but still was she bound in the grave-clothes in which severe policy and sore affliction had enwrapped her: loose her and let her go.

“That leave be given to bring in a Bill to facilitate the improvement of Landed Property in Ireland by Owners of Settled Estates.”

MR. CONOLLY said, he was sure that the House generally must participate in the pleasure which he himself felt at hearing such a speech as that which they had been fortunate enough to have addressed to them by the right hon. and learned Attorney General for Ireland, and which he admired not only for its tone and temper, but because it was ennobled by the highest sentiments of public policy. Great as was his respect for the right hon. and learned Gentleman, and great as was his wish to see the question brought before the House conducted to a proper conclusion, he had no idea that it would have been put by him on so clear and on such an eminently working footing. He did hope, therefore, that the House had given and would give every attention to the measures submitted to them, and that the right hon. and learned Gentleman would be assisted and sustained by all sides of the House in the moderate and judicious course he had proposed.

MR. SERGEANT SHEE said, that he had listened with the greatest attention to the very able speech of the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General for Ireland, and must tell him that he was very much mistaken, and would do great injustice, if he thought that the Members who had been returned by Irish constituencies to that House, would, as he had insinuated, seek to obtain popularity in Ireland by any attack upon the rights of property. He (Sergt. Shee), for one, had undertaken to call the attention of the House to a Bill for the regulation of the relations subsisting between landlord and tenant in Ireland, but he could never have been induced to take that step if he had been of opinion that there was one word in the Bill which tended to touch or trench in the slightest degree on the just rights of property. He was disposed to give to all the suggestions contained in the speech of the right hon. and learned Attorney General for Ireland a most candid consideration, and he thought that there was much in the measures the right hon. and learned Gentleman had introduced worthy of being favourably entertained, and he was resolved to avow his approval of that which might appear to him worthy of the approbation and adoption of the House. As to three of the Bills which had been laid before the House, however he might be inclined to differ with the right hon. and learned Gentleman on some of their details, he believed that there was much in every one of those three Bills deserving of the attention and the adoption of the Legislature; and though he could not hope to be able, by any assistance he could give to the right hon. and learned Gentleman, who was so well acquainted with the details of the complicated law in Ireland, to lighten his labours, he could assure him it would not be from any want of hearty good will on his (Sergt. Shee's) part that he was not successful, and that he would not, from any party or factious motive, hesitate to do him full and entire justice on a question which ought not to be a question of party at all. Having said thus much, he felt bound frankly to state that the last Bill which the right hon. and learned Gentleman had brought forward, was not calculated in his (Sergt. Shee's) opinion to give the slightest satisfaction in Ireland. The first part of that Bill which related to prospective improvements was but a second edition of the Bill introduced by Lord Stanley in the House of Lords, in 1845; and of the two Bills of Lord Lincoln and Sir William Somerville. Of all these measures the one which gave most dissatisfaction in Ireland was the Bill which had been brought forward by the present Prime Minister; and he (Sergt. Shee) felt assured that the proposition of the right hon. and learned Gentleman, which seemed to be but a renewal of that measure, would be received with the same dissatisfaction. As to that part of the Bill which related to what the right hon. and learned Gentleman called retrospective compensation, he felt convinced that that also was unlikely to be received with favour by the Irish people. He would not enter into a lengthened discussion on that point, because he hoped to have on an early day an opportunity of addressing the House upon the subject. He was of opinion that the Bill of the right hon. and learned Gentleman was defective in another point. It made no provision for the security of the vast amount of property accumulated in the north of Ireland. It left it altogether unprotected. Nay, more; it did worse, because, when the House had been called upon to consider a Tenant Right Bill, and when the right hon. and learned Attorney General for Ireland had brought the result of his consideration of the subject under the attention of the House, and yet made no provision for the Tenant Right in Ulster, he, in fact, said it was a right which ought not to be recognised, and which the landlords would be justified in disregarding. He (Sergt. Shee) would not discuss the various details of the Bill until it was laid before the House, but he felt assured that, so far from giving satisfaction, it would create dismay and consternation, if it did not cause disturbance, in what had hitherto been the most prosperous part of Ireland.

MR. GEORGE said, he rose with extreme reluctance to address the House for the first time. He felt that the right hon. and learned Attorney General for Ireland had brought to the consideration of that all-important subject all that legal skill, extreme industry, and right feeling could supply to settle the conflicting claims of two classes whose interests ought to be identical. He did not mean to pledge himself to all the details of those measures, as there might be questions connected with agricultural matters worthy of consideration by and by; but the right hon. and learned Gentleman had stated most fairly and candidly that he was perfectly ready to listen to suggestions on all matters of detail, and to submit his measures to the judgment of those persons on both sides of the House who were best informed upon the questions under discussion. He should not have stood up, therefore, had it not been for some observations of his hon. and learned Friend who had just sat down. The hon. and learned Gentleman said he was not the man to do anything to trench on the rights of property. He confessed he was glad to hear that statement, because he thought the hon. and learned Gentleman had charge of the original Bill of Mr. Sharman Crawford, in which were two clauses introduced by the hon. and learned Gentleman (Sergt. Shee) himself, which, in his humble judgment, were utterly incompatible with the free rights of property. He thought that any attempt to force perpetuity of tenure, or to fix a compulsory value of rents, was utterly subversive of all the rights of property; and, therefore, if he was to draw a conclusion from the hon. and learned Gentleman's statement, it would be that he (Sergt. Shee) had determined to abandon those clauses to which he alluded in the Tenant Right Bill. Sure he was that no Parliament—not composed of landlords merely, but of fair, honest, honourable men—could ever agree to them. This was not the time for entering into details, but he should have thought himself wanting in his duty to his constituents if he had not taken this the earliest opportunity of stating his opinion that the measures now introduced would give general satisfaction in Ireland. He hoped no attempt would be made to add to the Bills clauses which would destroy, in all probability, their good effect, and mar the success of this latest effort to give peace and contentment to that country.

MR. KIRK said, he wished to make a few observations on the importance of these Bills to Ireland, and to state that this question of landlord and tenant involved the internal peace and tranquillity of that country. It had been said that Ireland was the chief difficulty of every English Ministry. And why? Because its annals were annals of agrarian crime, arising out of disagreements between landlord and tenant. It was, therefore, most desirable for all parties to unite to promote the good of Ireland, to promote her peace and prosperity, grounded as that prosperity must ever be on her internal peace. He felt, and must acknowledge, a deep obligation to the right hon. and learned Gentleman for the code of laws he had just proposed, as well as for the manner, spirit, tone, and temper with which he had introduced them; and he, for one, should never offer the slightest degree of factious opposition to the measures now under discussion, but he must say that one important element, the settlement of the rent, had been left out. The right hon. and learned Attorney General for Ireland had alluded, at the conclusion of his address, to that district of Ireland which had been the scene of agrarian outrage. When, in 1846, the Legislature repealed the Corn Laws, and when concurrently it pleased God to bring on Ireland the potato blight, it was impossible that the rents previously contracted for could be paid. For a long time the occupiers in Ireland—in the north of Ireland more particularly—had made all improvements, not merely on their farms, but public roads and buildings. There was not a road or a bridge, a courthouse, gaol, or bridewell, but what had been constructed by the occupiers of the soil, the landlords not contributing a shilling unless when occupiers. That time they had high prices, caused latterly by the operation of the Corn Laws, and previously by the operation of the wars of the French Revolution. Prior to 1845, the usual course for settling their claim for improvements was for the tenant, when leaving, to agree with another person for a certain sum of money as compensation for the improvements, then to take this new tenant to the landlord, and satisfy him of his sufficiency. Thus the sale was completed, and the outgoing tenant compensated; the landlord had his property in the soil; the tenant his in the improvements. This system had worked very well, but when the potato blight and the Corn Law repeal came, it was impossible for occupiers to pay their rents. Since that there had been a system of combination and conspiracy extending itself over a great portion of the most peaceable part of Ireland, and stretching on, as he believed, even into England. When the landlord refused to lower the rent, the dread expedient was resorted to of shooting the agent. What had not been granted to remonstrance was conceded to terror, and this in the surrounding properties as well as in those in which such extremities had been proceeded to. The rents were lowered. Now, in none of these Bills did he see any proposition to meet this grievous and unfortunate state of things. As a merchant and a free-trader, he should be ashamed of himself to argue for a compulsory valuation of rents; but he thought these measures should include a clause providing, where the landlord and tenant could not between themselves agree upon the price of the land, that then permission should be given to the tenant to resign his holding to the landlord, and get from him the value of the improvements he had made upon it, subject to proper restrictions. This would completely destroy all cause of agrarian crime. He wished the right hon. and learned Gentleman would turn his attention to this point, and exert himself to produce security for person and property in Ireland; and he trusted and hoped that the admirable observations made by Her Majesty at the close of Her Most Gracious Speech would be duly attended to, and that a just and generous policy towards that country would be the governing rule of the Administration.

MR. F. GREVILLE said, he thought the House and the country were much indebted to the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General for Ireland, for the admirable spirit in which he had introduced those measures, as well as for many valuable provisions which they contained. But, at the same time, he (Mr. Greville) agreed with the hon. and learned Member for Kilkenny (Sergt. Shee), that the last Bill which had been introduced by the right hon. and learned Gentleman would not give satisfaction to the tenantry in Ireland. It should be remembered that there could be no comparison made between the position of the tenant class in Ireland and in this country. In England the improvements in land were almost universally carried out at the expense of the landlords, while in Ireland they were almost as universally the work of the tenants. For these improvements the Irish tenantry naturally looked for compensation when they were ejected from their holdings; and their claim in that respect, ought, he thought, to be acknowledged by Parliament. Emigration from Ireland was continuing upon as large a scale as ever, and the only hope we had of preserving the population—that population of which we might yet stand in need, and which had always stood faithful to this country in times of danger—was to do that which would secure the tenant in his application of capital to the land, and retain him at home.

LORD NAAS said, he did not rise for the purpose of prolonging a useless discussion upon points of detail, which it would, at that moment, be impossible for them to consider in an efficient or satisfactory manner. But he wished to take that opportunity of correcting a mis-statement which had fallen from the hon. and learned Member for Kilkenny (Sergt. Shee), when he had said that the fourth of these Bills—namely, that for giving compensation to tenants in Ireland—was similar to the Bill upon the same subject which had been introduced by Lord Stanley, in the House of Lords, in the year 1845. He (Lord Naas) affirmed, on the contrary, that there was no similarity whatever between the two Bills, with the single exception that they had both been framed for the same object. Their details were entirely different, and the machinery by which their end was to be attained was equally dissimilar. The machinery of Lord Stanley's Bill was of a very complicated character, and such as it would be very difficult to work out. It proposed that Commissioners and Assistant Commissioners should be appointed for the purpose of determining whether the improvements contemplated by the tenant should be considered as improvements or not, and it would render the tenant liable to ruinous litigation before he could begin any improvement. There was nothing of that kind in the present Bill. There were no preliminaries whatever, and it would be perfectly competent to the tenant to commence his improvements at once; and any litigation which arose at all must arise when the landlord proposed to eject the tenant, at the end of his tenancy. The improvements could thus take place within a week after the first steps were taken by the tenant. That created a very important difference between the two measures. He was not surprised to learn that hon. Gentlemen opposite expected to find in the Bill an attempt to legalise the tenant-right of Ulster. He was perfectly prepared for that; but he could not sit down without expressing his opinion—an opinion entertained, he believed, by almost every Gentleman who had calmly considered that question, and was acquainted with the circumstances of the north of Ireland, that it would be simply impossible to import into an Act of Parliament the tenant-right custom as it existed in Ulster. That custom varied on almost every estate. It was founded on ancient usages, which differed in different parishes; and it would be impossible to embody it in any system of legislation without dealing separately with nearly every farm. He believed, too, that any legislation which would have for its object the legalisation of the tenant-right system would deprive the tenantry in the north of Ireland of the advantages which they at present derived from that system, and that by any effort to settle the question by legal enactment they would be losers to an enormous amount. He would not detain the House any longer. He had witnessed with great satisfaction the kind and liberal spirit in which the proposals of his right hon. and learned Friend had been received, even by those Gentlemen who differed from him; and he was sure that in future discussions on the Bill they would all approach the question with a sincere and honest wish to provide to the utmost of their power for the improvement of the condition of the people of Ireland.

Leave given to bring in the four Bills, which were each read 1^o.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

MINUTES.] PUBLIC BILL.—1^o West India Colonies, &c., Loans Act Amendment.

THE CONSTABLESHIP OF THE TOWER.

MR. VERNON SMITH said, he wished to ask a question of the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary at War relating to the appointment of Constable of the Tower. The right hon. Gentleman was probably aware that the Committee on the Army Estimates refrained from entering into the consideration of the Tower garrison, because they were informed that at the expiration of the patent all the offices would undergo revision. That was certainly stated by Mr. Fox Maule, now Lord Panmure. A vacancy had now unfortunately taken place through the death of the Duke of Wellington; and he perceived that Lord Combermere had since been appointed Constable of the Tower. He wished to know whether the establishment was subjected to revision previously to Lord Combermere's appointment, or whether the appointment had been made subject to any revision which might hereafter take place, which he conceived to have been the intention of the Committee.

MR. BERESFORD said, in the Committee on the Army and Ordnance Estimates the then Secretary at War (Lord Panmure) certainly stated, that according to the Resolution of a Committee of 1833, the whole staff of appointments at the Tower was to be subject to revision at the death of his Grace the Duke of Wellington; but on turning to the Report of the Committee, he did not find any such resolution. With regard to the appointment of Viscount Combermere as Constable of the Tower, he begged to inform the right hon. Gentleman that the appointment was made on the death of the Duke of Wellington, with this provision, that not only the emoluments of the Constable, but those of other offices also, as they became vacant, were to be subject to any revision which Parliament might choose to make. But he must also beg to make this further remark: That from the Army Estimates of the present year he found that the total sum given to reward distinguished services amounted to 18,000*l.*; that the sum to distinguished officers was 9,674*l.*; for garrisons held by officers, as rewards for military services, 2,931*l.*; the amount borne on the Vote for rewards was 12,605*l.*; the amount borne on the staff for the Tower of London was 3,911*l.*; the amount of appointments on the staff which, when vacated, were applicable as rewards, was 445*l.*—making altogether 16,963*l.*; to which was added the sum of 1,036*l.*, making a total sum of 18,000*l.* That was an estimate to which was appended, not the name of "William Beresford," but "Robert Vernon Smith." The "Tower of London" was included in rewards for distinguished services; and he was sure that in the case of Viscount Combermere, who had served his country upwards of sixty years—in India, in the Peninsula, and in nearly all parts of the world—900*l.* was not too large a sum under that head. He begged leave further to say, in answer to the right hon. Gentleman's question, that whenever any Parliamentary inquiry should be made on the question, the Government would most willingly give their best consideration to it.

REGULATION OF PORTS AND HARBOURS, &c.

ADMIRAL BERKELEY said, he begged to put the following questions to the hon. Gentleman the Secretary to the Admiralty: Whether Her Majesty's Government intend to introduce a Bill for the better regulation of ports and harbours? Whether the present Board of Admiralty, soon after their accession to office, gave directions that the names of the workmen and artificers, recommended for promotion, were to be sent direct to the Secretary to the Admiralty instead of being first submitted to the Surveyor of the Navy, as had been previously the rule? Whether any correspondence took place with the Surveyor in consequence of such order, and whether such order is still in force? Whether a Committee of Officers was appointed to inquire into and report on steam ships, steam engines, and the subject generally as applicable to naval purposes; and the reason for such Committee separating without coming to any conclusion or making any report?

MR. STAFFORD said, in answer to the first question, it was not the intention of the Government to bring in a Bill on that subject. In reply to the second, he had to state that he supposed the hon. and gallant Gentleman alluded, in the wording of his question, to the arrangement made by Mr. Ward in 1847. The arrangement, which was first made when the Navy Pay Office was consolidated with the Board of Admiralty, in 1843, confirmed in 1844, and assumed to be in existence in 1847, when Mr. Ward issued his last regulation, was still in force, and had not been at all disturbed by the present Board of Admiralty. There was no correspondence with the Surveyor of the Navy on the subject. In answer to the third question, he thought the hon. and gallant Gentleman had assumed that the Committee of Officers had separated; but that was not so. The Committee, on their appointment, proceeded to visit Glasgow and Liverpool. They found, however, that in order to carry out the purposes for which they were instituted, it would be necessary to expend a greater sum in the prosecution of their researches than was desirable. For that reason the Committee returned to town, and did not prosecute the inquiry further; but it was in contemplation for them to resume their functions.

MR. RICH said, he wished to know whether any steps had been taken by the Admiralty with a view to render the naval defences of the country more efficient, in pursuance of the recommendations of a Commission which sat on the subject?

MR. STAFFORD said, the Commission to which the hon. Gentleman referred made a report, in which they suggested certain things to be done, and other things which it would be desirable to do when the next mail contracts came under consideration; but he (Mr. Stafford) did not think it prudent to state what those suggestions were, for the present at all events.

COMMERCIAL LEGISLATION—FREE TRADE.

MR. VILLIERS rose, in pursuance of notice, to move the following Resolutions:—

“That it is the opinion of this House, that the improved condition of the Country, and particularly of the Industrious Classes, is mainly the result of recent Commercial Legislation, and especially of the Act of 1846, which established the free admission of Foreign Corn, and that that Act was a wise, just, and beneficial measure.

“That it is the opinion of this House, that the maintenance and further extension of the policy of Free Trade, as opposed to that of Protection, will best enable the property and industry of the Nation to bear the burthens to which they are exposed, and will most contribute to the general prosperity, welfare, and contentment of the people.

The hon. Gentleman then said: Sir, in rising to submit to this House the Resolutions of which I have given notice, I think it right to state why I have deemed it my duty to persevere in the Motion, and why I did not accede to the request which was made to me originally by the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer, that I would postpone the Motion until a time subsequent to his proposal of some measures which he said he wished to lay before the House. With this view I beg first to call the attention of the House to its own position with respect to the great matter which we are specially summoned at this unusual, and perhaps inconvenient, season to settle. It will be remembered, that on the first night of the Session, there was a sort of general concurrence in the propriety of not moving an Amendment to the Address; which I think was chiefly occasioned by a feeling, that as this Session was a special one, a more deliberate consideration might be given to this subject upon some future or distinct occasion. It was under these circumstances that, on the first evening I gave notice that I should, on a future occasion, bring the matter distinctly under the notice of the House. But, Sir, one of the consequences of the unanimity which prevailed on the first night of this Session was, that this House became bound by the contents of the Address; and with respect to that particular matter on which we were supposed to have been summoned, we were bound by that paragraph or passage in the Speech which had reference to it, which was the subject of observation on that night, and which, I may add, was at that time so justly and so generally objected to by the House, and I am not exaggerating the case, when I say which, under all the circumstances, has been so universally condemned. Something like an official intimation of the opinion of the Government upon the great matter on which the last Parliament had been dissolved and the new Parliament had been called together, was expected; persons were hoping either to hear that opinion intimated through the Speech, or the view entertained by the Government of the opinion which the country had expressed on the subject; but where they expected to have this information, nothing is found but what I think has been properly designated an unworthy evasion of the whole matter. Whereas it was expected to find something in that part of the speech distinctly stated, they found nothing decided, nothing asserted, something implied which was very questionable, while the paragraph concluded in terms which I venture to say there was not a man who did not consider were used purposely not to be respectful to this House. I say that, Sir, most advisedly. I do not believe, at least in the modern days of Parliament, that there has ever been such a paragraph penned or addressed by any Ministry to this House. We all know what is meant by a reference to “the wisdom of Parliament.” Why, it is the cant sarcasm or cynical reflection commonly made upon the character of this House. Whenever anybody wants to satirise this House, he refers in a sneering tone to its wisdom. That may or may not be just; but I say it is the custom, and I say also that there was not a man in this House, and I believe there was not a man out of this House, who did not recognise this object in the terms used on the occasion. And that is the paragraph in the Speech which was intended to satisfy this country upon a question distinctly put in issue when Parliament was dissolved, to which an answer is said to have been given, and for which Parliament has been summoned expressly to declare. Why, Sir, I am at a loss to understand how hon. Gentlemen opposite can honestly say that for a moment they supposed that such a passage in such a Speech would be at all satisfactory to what they themselves have described as "the great majority of this House." And still more am I surprised to learn, from what has passed recently in another place, that it was not only expected to be satisfactory, but that anybody who disputes the matter—anybody who is not satisfied with such an allusion to the great matter in question—is factious, and raises a question about it for the purpose of opposing the Government, or resisting the measures which are in contemplation for the benefit of the country. Sir, it is on this account that I consider it most important that this House should come to some positive declaration on the great question at issue. This House is put in a position anything but satisfactory by the decision of the other night. I said before, and I repeat, that no Amendment having been moved to the Address, the House has become bound by its contents; and, with reference to the condition of the country, it is bound by the passage in the Speech to which I have referred; and I ask whether that is a decent or a satisfactory way for this House to represent the opinion so strongly expressed by the country upon a great question submitted to it? But the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer suggested to me to waive the Motion of which I gave notice, for the purpose of first hearing the measures which he had to propose. Now, Sir, I really do not understand the logic of such a proposition. This House is met at this time, as I have said before, for the purpose of receiving the answer of the country upon a matter distinctly referred to it—the policy which is to regulate the commercial interests of the country. I am only saying that which was stated by the First Minister at the beginning of the last Session, and repeated by him last night, when I assert that is the purpose for which we are assembled at this unusual time of the year. The right hon. Gentleman, without anything having been conveyed in the Speech as to the opinion of the Government upon this subject, or with regard to the elections which have taken place, proposes, or at least suggests to me, that I should waive the proposition which I now make for a distinct decision of the House, until he brings in certain measures. Now, I don't know what these certain measures have to do with the purpose for which we have met. I do not remember that the last Parliament was dissolved for the purpose of taking an opinion on any measures, and I am not aware that any measures have been submitted to the country. I do not deny that certain intimations were made in another place of measures which were to please everybody, if only a reasonable time were given for their introduction. That may all make a very good story for Gentlemen to tell their constituents, or for Cabinet Ministers to announce to their party, but it will not do for a House of Commons assembled for a specific purpose, and determined to fulfil the purpose for which we are met. We have a distinct recollection of the purpose for which the Parliament was dissolved; and it was, as was said the other night, to be because the First Minister of the Crown could not make up his mind to change his opinion on a certain important subject, and thought proper to assume that there was a doubt upon the matter, and to take the opinion of the country as to whether he was right or wrong in the course he had adopted. As far as I could understand that Minister, last year, he consented to be tried by his country: he submitted himself—I will not repeat the irreverent addition he made—to that ordeal; he said he would be tried by his country, and that is sufficient to justify my Motion. He has been tried, and, as it seems to me, has been found wrong, though now he seems to start afresh, and says, "Well, if that won't do, I must try something else." Certainly, says the First Minister, "you differ from me in this matter; but if you only give me a little time, I have got a Colleague so fertile in his resources, and of such transcendent abilities, that he will soon prepare a substitute for you—something that you will be delighted with—something that, if he is only permitted to produce it, is sure to be satisfactory to all parties." I do not deny that this is possible. There are geniuses of that kind, particularly in connexion with medicine, who discover remedies for every evil to which the flesh is heir; and I have no doubt but that this Colleague is preparing measures which will be universally palatable, if he has only plenty of time to produce them. But in the meantime we must think of the business for which we are assembled, and come to the decision for which we have met. I am perfectly astonished to hear that a Motion so obvious, so reasonable, as I hope that is which I am about to submit to the House, one so strictly consistent with the purpose for which we are assembled, and the object with which we were dissolved and dispersed through the country—I am perfectly astonished to hear that the very mention of such a fair common-sense proposition is considered by Her Majesty's Government and their supporters to be factious. Framed for the purpose of overthrowing the Government! Framed for the purpose of thwarting Ministers! Really, I do not know why I am implicitly to trust this Government, or to rest satisfied with their reputation for consistency! I do not see why such faith in them should be expected from any man. I dare say that before this debate terminates, we shall have plenty of reasons given why we should all agree; but still I cannot think my offence deserves the name of factiousness, or—seeing that the Government has not yet intimated its opinion—why I should not submit some Motion to the House of Commons, in order that it may express its collective opinion, in obedience to the directions its Members have received from their constituents. Moreover, I have no idea of what the measures are which the right hon. Gentleman is to propose with a view of silencing a factious opposition. I certainly have read the public papers, and have endeavoured to collect the information which is open to everybody, and I have found the same difficulty which I believe has been felt by every one, in tracing out the real character of these measures. I have read carefully the speeches of persons supposed to be in the confidence of Her Majesty's Government. One of them, a noble Marquess, when addressing an agricultural audience, said that he had received no distinct intimation of what the Cabinet contemplated, but he felt perfectly convinced that they in some way or other intended to advance the agricultural interest, whether by a tax on spring corn, or by meddling with the currency of the country, he could not say, but relief was in some way or other to be afforded. Turning our view to Essex, we see a Gentleman there, who has given his attention particularly to the currency, and who intimates that there can be no justice for the farmers until that most unwise measure, the law of 1819, is repealed. Again, a Gentleman high in the confidence of Government, one holding a most important position in the Government, goes down to Lincolnshire and informs the farmers there—I don't allude to his original speech, in which he stated the grounds of his confidence in Lord Derby, that he knew his Lordship to be a thorough protectionist, one who had nothing at heart but the re-enactment of a protectionist policy—I will not allude to that speech, it is too old, it was made some months ago—but I allude to the speech of a week ago, which I consider to be important. In that speech he says that there are only two courses open to the Government: either to return to protection, or to give the agriculturists in its place something as good, which, as I venture to read it, would be, something quite as bad. These, then, are the measures shadowed out by Members in the confidence of the Government, and still the hon. Gentleman says—"Let me bring forward my measures, let me have the precedence of you." Of me, who want to lay down some principle upon which the country ought to regulate its commerce, or, according to an expression used in the House of Lords, its interests. Before you do that, says the right hon. Gentleman, let me introduce my measures. But the right hon. Gentleman asks me to assume that some mischief has been done, and that some reparation is required, which he must be aware I deny in toto, and declare the direct opposite to be the case. Then I am told of recent converts. I hear of persons who are honestly desirous of supporting our policy—persons, too, who on both sides of the House are tender on the subject—and I am told that we have framed our Resolutions purposely to offend these converts. Give us some information that they are honest converts, and that they adopt our views of commercial policy, and certainly they shall receive all forbearance from this side of the House. But, as far as I can understand, the converts to free trade, if converts at all, are so from necessity. You have dissolved the last Parliament, and you have got a verdict against you; and you, what you call, bow to the verdict of the country. Certainly I must say that a more convenient course for a party I never heard of, than that of dissolving Parliament to obtain a verdict from public opinion as to whether they are right or wrong, and the adoption of such course afterwards. One cannot but be amused at it. To use a rather vulgar metaphor, it is merely, "heads, I win, tails, you lose." If protection succeeds, so much the better, we are all right. If free trade is successful, we "bow" to the verdict of the country, but at all events we remain in. I never should have made these observations, nor have taken this line of argument, had not my Motion been stigmatised as factious. I want to justify my course, and to show to the country that I am reasonable in calling for a distinct declaration of the principles that are to guide the Government. I believe that the country has declared itself to be perfectly satisfied with its experience of recent commercial policy, and don't want to have it changed. On the contrary, they want to have it declared settled, and extended, too. And I cannot understand why the Government should hesitate to declare itself satisfied and determined to carry that policy out to its fullest extent. If I am to understand the arguments or speeches of the right hon. Gentleman, or at least of the First Minister of the Crown, they mean that the latter has not abandoned his opinions at all, but is of the same opinion still. That being the case, I cannot understand that there is anything unreasonable in the country declaring—leaving the First Minister to his opinions—that they also adhere to their opinions, and that they should be expressed by their representatives in this House. I do not believe that a public meeting could be called in any part of the country, when the persons assembled would not declare that they had derived the greatest advantages from the changes which legislation had made in our commercial policy, that they were satisfied with them, and that they did not wish to return to the old system. Then I want to know why the House of Commons is the last place in which such opinions are to be declared. Why are we to come with "bended knee and bated breath" to whisper something conditional and equivocal, like this paragraph in the Queen's Speech, which seems to intimate that evil had resulted from the commercial changes, and that the first business of Parliament should be to remedy that evil? That paragraph is vague and mysterious: we don't understand it. We, the majority of this House, think, and have declared elsewhere, that the recent changes were wise and beneficial, and we are assembled here to declare them so. There is one thing, moreover, which cheers me on, and which satisfies me of the propriety of my making this Motion, namely, that it has already done some good—the good, that it has produced the Amendment of the right hon. Gentleman. I can assure the right hon. Gentleman that I have derived the greatest satisfaction from seeing his Amendment, which is not an amendment on my Resolution, but a great amendment of his own politics and that of his party, particularly as they are propounded in the Queen's Speech, and especially in a recent one by the First Minister of the Crown. And I can hardly be induced to withdraw my Resolution for the sake of this Amendment, because I think that any man of common sense seeing the two propositions would say that mine was the Amendment, and the right hon. Gentleman's the original proposition. Neither would I withdraw it, if it was only from the good it had done already. I will not despair that before the close of the evening, or of the week, the right hon. Gentleman may adopt my Resolution—perhaps vote for it. There is one point in the Amendment that brings us so near to an agreement that I am in hopes we shall have but one division, or perhaps none. It is a most valuable admission, "that one of the Acts of our recent legislation had cheapened provisions, and thereby greatly improved the condition of the working classes." I entirely agree with the right hon. Gentleman on that point; and so much do I agree with him that I have specifically referred to that Act; and so entirely do I agree with him in his reference to that Act, which has cheapened provisions, and thereby improved the condition of the working classes, which the right hon. Gentleman, in his Amendment, says it has, that I have characterised it as a wise and just measure. If the right hon. Gentleman still requires me to withdraw my Resolution, he will feel obliged to tell me why an Act which, according to his own Amendment, has conferred such an inestimable blessing on the people, should not receive the character which I have given it. I should be surprised if there should be any hesitation on the part of his friends to admit that character to be just; for, having long considered the subject, having many times assisted in its discussion in this House, I have a distinct recollection that this recent legislation, which used to be called in that day the total repeal of the corn law, was opposed solely on account of the advantages of that law to the poor. It was always a labourers' question. "Prove to me," used to say some Members for counties whose seats depended on upholding this law, "that it is not for the good of its poor—that the labourers wont suffer from its repeal, and I am in the lobby with you directly; for it is on their account I uphold it—it is because it is a labourers' question that I vote for the corn laws." It was a poor man's question essentially; and used to be discussed by Gentlemen opposite in that point of view. I am sure that if any foreigner had been present when our discussions were going on, he would have thought that all the benevolence was on that side of the House, and all the heartlessness on this side. He would have thought that those benevolent men cared nothing for their own kindred or their own property, but were all ready to be sacrificed for the benefit of the humbler classes; whereas their opponents were hard and flinty-hearted men, ever grinding the faces of the poor, and seeking profit from their misery. If such an observer were to appear to-night, and to see that we have not only changed that law, but have admitted that the change has greatly benefited the working classes, and greatly improved their condition, but yet that a great party, the majority that used to be, the disinterested and humane that seemed to be, now object to designate that Act as wise and just, I believe he would be led into some doubt as to the sincerity of their sympathy with the poor. Now, if I must offer a word of advice to the right hon. Gentleman and to that party, it would be at once to accede to my Resolution. It is not much to ask of them; I hardly see how they can do less, for if ever there existed a law which had the effect of raising the price of provisions, and consequently deteriorating the condition of the people, it must have been the most odious and execrable law that ever passed; and no one will understand why an Act which repeals such a law, and has produced such consequences as the right hon. Gentleman asserts, can be other than I have described it in my Resolution. I cannot conceive a more guilty exercise of authority than that of tampering with the subsistence of the people; and if an Act having that effect existed for the benefit of a few members of the community, I cannot conceive anything more vile than such an enactment. What is it that you mean by an Act that has raised the price of bread and provisions, and limits the amount to the poor? Such an Act involves everything that regulates and gives character to the whole condition of the people. The amount, more or less, of food which the people have, determines the condition of those millions of people who earn their daily bread by their daily toil. Whether a man shall be a degraded animal or a civilised social being, depends entirely on the means he has of obtaining, not only that which is necessary to supply the requirements of nature, but on the excess beyond that which enables him to attend to his other wants, moral and social. A man so elevated or degraded is literally either a civilised man or the contrary, just in proportion as food is easily accessible to him or scarce; and, in the present state of the world, the most important circumstance connected with the moral nature of man is that which affects the plenty or scarcity of his food. What is the business of life? Look round at the millions upon millions that cover the surface of this earth, and consider if the business of their life is not to exchange labour for food? The terms on which that exchange is made, decides whether a man shall be degraded or raised; and, amongst us, whether he shall be the occupant of the union or the gaol, or perhaps of a premature grave. It is that which has produced the universal conviction now prevailing that upon the amount of food in this country depends the condition of our people. If, therefore, any Minister or man in authority should try to persuade any portion of his fellow-countrymen that an Act of this country which has had for its purpose to increase the abundance of food has had the effect of increasing crime and pauperism—I say, if any man announces such an opinion, he excites the wonder, if not the indignation, of the people throughout the land. There are men in every parish of this country whose experience satisfies them that the extent of crime and destitution among the people entirely depends upon the amount of food available for their support; and in making the reference I do now, I am perfectly satisfied the right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary will feel that it is necessary for him to make some explanation to this House of the statement he is represented to have made when he recently addressed his constituents. I am sure that the right hon. Gentleman has been misrepresented or misreported, for I believe he is the last man in this country who would misrepresent a fact, or mislead his countrymen. But with his high authority he is supposed to have suggested to the people whom he addressed, that in consequence of recent legislation crime and destitution had increased. [Mr. WALPOLE: No!] I readily believe that denial of the right hon. Gentleman, from the respect I have for his character; and I am glad to see the prompt manner in which he expresses it, for it shows his conviction of the opposite opinion. It is now the knowledge of the great importance of this matter—of the amount, more or less, of food in this country—that makes the power or control of it a circumstance so terrible, so great, so vast in the hands of any authority; and I do think there can be no greater manifestation of heartlessness, I had almost said of barbarity, on the part of any body of men, who can, for the purpose of benefiting themselves, attempt to limit the amount of subsistence of the people. But, Sir, I am obliged to ask, nevertheless, what it is we are assembled here upon this occasion for? I am obliged to ask whether such a law has not existed, or did not exist, in this country for upwards of thirty years; and whether we are not now about to recognise the enormous advantage to the community of having repealed that law? A law for which there is nothing in the vaunted institutions of this country, or in the wealth which it may have conferred upon individuals, or in any other circumstance connected with this country which could compensate to the working classes for the enormous injury that such a law must have inflicted on them; and yet if I understand the difference between this and the other side of the House this night, it is that I propose to designate the repeal of such a law as wise and just, and you consider that such a designation is “factions,” and that it is utterly incompatible with the honour and credit of some hon. Gentlemen to acknowledge the policy and advantage of such a change. Indeed I received information within a few moments of entering the House, that if it should be declared by a majority of this House that the repeal of the law—which has had the effect the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer has stated, and which I have so often stated in this House—was wise and just, we have a prospect of a resignation of this Government. I can assure the right hon. Gentleman and his Colleagues that, whatever they may think of the motives of the person who proposes this Resolution, and though Lord Derby may think it factions, I have not the smallest desire to see them dismissed. [“Oh, oh!”] I do not deny that the noble Earl at the head of the Government is a great authority as to what is faction. He has been, as he stated last night, thirty years before the public: the public have had the opportunity of witnessing his conduct for the last thirty years, and I, as one of the public, do not dispute his authority in such matters; but it is still possible, I can assure the noble Earl, for a man to be single-minded on a matter of this sort—to have but one purpose before him—still possible for a man not to be ready to adopt every principle and abandon every party for the sake of power. I care, however, very little whether credit is given or not by hon. Gentlemen opposite to the statement I have made; for most surely do I believe this great country would survive the calamity with which it is said to be thus contingently menaced by right hon. and hon. Gentlemen opposite resigning their places. I should be very sorry to see it happen; but, though it did so, still I am not without hopes for the country. I have heard of such things before, and I have seen such things happen, and without any evil to the country in consequence. In fact, I myself am not disposed to attach so much importance to the existence of a Ministry as some people are. I have seen four or five Ministries in office since I have been in Parliament, and, so far as I have been able to judge, there has been a strong family likeness between them all. The country never suffers very much from any of them; those who accede to power, generally do that which they resisted in opposition, which is pretty much what their predecessors did before them. My own impression is, that no great genius is required to administer a government. I believe that all the real business in the public offices is done by a certain number of public servants—able and valuable men—of whom we hear very little, and that it must be owing to some lack of judgment, or some want of capacity, whenever a Government becomes sufficiently unpopular to be displaced. That I may not be misunderstood, however, I beg again to state, that in making this Motion I have no object of displacing the Ministry. [“Oh, oh!”]

I do not act as a partisan on the occasion. ["Oh, oh!"] Well, then, as Gentlemen opposite do not seem satisfied with what I say, I will add that, were that displacement to occur, I shall be quite reconciled to the event. If, however, I might offer a word of advice to the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer, it would be that he do no such thing as go out, but rather that, if this Motion be carried against him, he accept it with thankfulness, and make use of it in adopting the course which he apparently wishes to pursue. He seems to be about to enter upon a career of usefulness, and I would advise him not to be deterred by the novelty of that course from doing so. The right hon. Gentleman takes very much the same views with regard to the financial policy of the country that those whom he used to assail took before him; and with his talents, which seem to be available for any purpose, I should be really sorry to see him removed from office by my Motion. I am still more hopeful of the course he is likely to pursue from what I see shadowed out in his Amendment. There was reason to expect good from his statements when he produced the Budget last year. He stated facts very candidly; and, though his friends were then very anxious to relieve him from the imputation of deducing any conclusions from those facts, it seems that he has concluded something from them, and has now formed opinions which he really entertains. In that statement on the Budget he declared, very frankly, that the commercial policy which had been followed in this country for the ten years previous had had the effect of greatly relieving the community, without injuring the revenue. He admitted that these were facts which it was his duty, as a Minister, to declare; that duties had been repealed or reduced to a very large amount; that the revenue had not suffered much, and that the community had benefited a great deal. Facts such as these were obviously distasteful to his supporters; but still the right hon. Gentleman, with the responsibilities of office upon him, felt bound in candour to state them. I must say, that in his present Amendment he seems to have laid the ground for advancing the policy to which he did homage last year; a policy which consists in reducing, or altogether removing, duties on articles of necessary consumption, then on articles of general consumption, so that the people might, by easily satisfying the wants of first necessity, have the means of obtaining articles of secondary importance. This is a policy distasteful to hon. Gentlemen opposite to admit; but nine months' gestation has done a great deal, and, among other results, has produced that Amendment, which admits the case on this side of the House: that when you reduce the tax on food, and do nothing to raise its price, you may venture to reduce other duties, because then the people will be able to consume the commodities on which they are laid, and the revenue will recover itself. That is an intelligible principle, and we want that principle acknowledged by this House. We want the Chancellor of the Exchequer to recognise that principle, and fully to carry it out. I justify the Resolution I am going to propose, on the ground that at present the Chancellor of the Exchequer's intentions on this main subject are not known; that we cannot understand, from anything that has taken place officially, whether he is going backwards or forwards, or what course he is going to take; whereas if he adopts the Resolution I shall move to-night, there can be no doubt on that matter in future. That Resolution is a full and clear recognition by the House of the advantages we have already experienced by the new policy. I startled Gentlemen opposite some time ago when I attempted to show how available the means of the community were for further consumption if duties on necessary articles were reduced; but some of those Gentlemen, while recently occupied in agitating the counties and remote districts on the subject of protection, have made great use of the statements I so put forward, and have applied them to the proposition that 91,000,000*l.* had been abstracted by recent legislation from the pockets of the farmers, and that the farmers, consequently, were entitled to indemnity. What I spoke of was the vast difference that there was in the means of the community available for general expenditure between a year of great scarcity and a year of great plenty—between such years as 1847 and 1849—between years when people paid a great deal for little food, and when they paid little for a great deal of food; quite sufficient to account for great differences in the demand for articles taxed for revenue, and the condition of the people generally. I did not stoop to contradict Gentlemen who made this use of my statement, for they exposed themselves to this question—If 91,000,000*l.* have been taken from the farmers, who gave the farmers the 91,000,000*l.* in the first place? I have here in my hand a calculation smaller in amount, and which I hope will therefore startle Gentlemen rather less, but which exactly illustrates the advantage of that policy which I hope the Chancellor of the Exchequer intends still further to carry out. This metropolis alone affords a most conclusive illustration of the enormous effects that are produced by a reduction in the price of articles of food upon the availability of the people's means for purchasing other articles. The population of London, according to a moderate calculation, is 2,300,000. From July, 1828, when the sliding scale was enacted, up to the end of 1841, when it was abolished, 14,787,990 quarters of wheat were admitted, 12,452,562 of which, or 84 per cent, were not admitted until the price exceeded 70*s.* per quarter. 70*s.* per quarter for wheat gives 60*s.* per sack for flour. The quartern loaf would then be 11*d.*, it is now 7*d.* The consumption of the population of London is not less than two quartern loaves per head per week, so that the saving is 8*d.* per head per week, or 1*l.* 18*s.* per annum, being, for the whole population, 4,750,000*l.* Again, as to articles that come next to those of necessity, for instance, sugar: in London, where the consumption is greater than in the country, the allowance to servants is half-a-pound each per week for breakfast and tea alone; the middle and upper classes consume not less than 50*lb.*; so that the average may fairly be taken at 30*lb.* The soft sugar, that, up to 1845, was 7*d.*, is now 4*d.* to 5*d.*; the loaf sugar, that was 10*d.* and 11*d.*, is now 5*d.* to 6*d.*; and probably half the consumption of London is loaf sugar. Take the reduction, as a low average, at 3½*d.*, the saving is 8*s.* 9*d.* a head, per year; or, for the whole population, 1,093,750*l.*, the entire consumed giving above 26½*lb.* per head. In coffee, on a similar calculation, the gain to London is 166,666*l.*; and on tea, 125,000*l.*, owing to the recent reduction in the price of both those articles, representing a total of 5,739,583*l.* in London alone—there being also, of course, a corresponding gain throughout the country, and in every town, from the same cause. The reason why I wish to impress these facts on the Government is, that the First Minister of the Crown does not appear to be informed on the matter. If anything were needed to justify my present Motion, it is the speech of the First Minister on the first night of the Session. The noble Earl cannot understand, it seems, what difference there is between taxing food and any other article—he stated so last year—and his notion is, that if the amount of food increases, that the condition of the labouring classes is deteriorated, or, as he is pleased to express it more shortly, if the price of food falls, wages will fall: he stated so the other night. I want to impress upon him that the difference between food and any other article is, that food is a thing of first, of necessary consumption; and that it depends entirely on the price, or rather on the abundance, of that article, what you have left for farther consumption. But the noble Earl will perhaps say, that he is occupied with the revenue; that he is not talking about humanity, or about the condition of the people; and that he does not see why food is not as good an article to tax as any other. But, taking merely the financial and economical view of the subject, it is of the greatest possible importance as I have shown, that while you tax expenditure generally, in order to collect a vast revenue, that food should be cheap and abundant, in order to facilitate all other consumption. The noble Earl keeps to the point, that if the price of food falls, wages also must generally fall; but I cannot offer so great an insult to the intellect of so able a man as the noble Earl, as to suppose him for a moment to be in earnest, in uttering a fallacy that could only be entertained by the most ignorant persons; for no amount of sympathy with the labouring classes could lead an intelligent being to suppose that they would be injured by the abundance of the first necessary of life, or that a fall in the price of provisions must deteriorate their condition. Against such statements and such views, if honestly held, it would be necessary to show what the general condition of the country is under a fall in the price of provisions; but not knowing exactly what view the Government may be going to take on this occasion, I do not like entering very much into details, for I still hope that we are, on both sides of the House, agreed as to this general fact, that, with food cheaper, and with various duties on articles of consumption reduced, the country is in a prosperous state. I have, indeed, since I gave notice of this Motion, had more information sent to me from all parts of the country than I could carry—papers, and documents, containing facts of every kind, from every district of the country, proving the great prosperity that in all directions so eminently prevails. If I thought there would be the least dispute on the point, the smallest difference of opinion expressed as to the fact, I should feel myself bound to read to the House more or less of this information so received, because it certifies, from literally every part of the country, the great prosperity of every great interest, or great division of the community, tested by every conceivable test—by full employment, by diminished pauperism, by decrease of crime, by loyalty, by contentment; clearly ascertained and confidently stated by competent judges, who have witnessed and watched the course of the change from its commencement. Formerly, I should have felt it necessary to lay all such information before the House; but I shall, for the present, abstain from doing so, because I will yet venture to hope that we are in effect, and substantially, agreed upon the matter contained in the Chancellor of the Exchequer's Amendment—namely, that by the recent legislation abolishing protection, food has been rendered abundant, and the people prosperous. I want the Chancellor of the Exchequer to go further, for he seems to have confined his proposition to the working classes. I do not know why he does so; but I suppose he will explain his reason. I myself do not confine it to the working classes, because there is no possibility of really benefiting the working classes by legislation which does not also beneficially affect the whole community; and it was from the same cause that former laws could not injure the working classes without every other class—every section of every other class—sooner or later being made to feel the effect of their suffering. The same legislation which facilitates and extends to the merchant the market at home for foreign commodities, enlarges for the manufacturer the demand in exchange for his manufactures; to the agricultural producer the demands for his produce by means of greater consumption; to the labourer the demand for his labour; and thus all classes are in fact benefited by means of a mutual interest. It is therefore that in my Resolution I propose to the Chancellor of the Exchequer to accept the principle and doctrine that the property and industry of the country are better able to bear their burdens by applying the principle of free trade, as opposed to that of protection; and it is on this point I am

anxious to get the opinions of the Chancellor of the Exchequer—for, as yet, we have not got his real views on these respective principles. This is one of the great purposes for which we are now assembled, and for which I propose this Resolution. I want to know whether he thinks protection a great good, enabling those who are protected to support their burdens; or whether he thinks free trade a mischievous system, which, if it must be endured, it will be his duty, if possible, to mitigate. These are points which I desire to hear definitively settled in this House, but which as regards the Government are still left undisposed of in the Amendment. My opinion is, now, as it has often been expressed in this House, that protection is an unqualified mischief, unjustifiable in principle, vicious in practice, and peculiarly injurious to the interest it purports to benefit. If the right hon. Gentleman, in the course of those changes which he is undergoing, has come to the same conclusion, it is highly important we should know the fact without loss of time, since the character of future legislation will probably turn upon that point. My distinct impression is, that no compensation whatever is due to any interest that was protected, because, as regards every such interest—I speak of the interest, and not of individuals in particular cases connected with it, but as regards every such interest at large, my conviction is, that it has only been served by the change of system. My belief is that every interest which has been hitherto protected, has been withering under that protection. The experience of the last few years has proved to us the vast advantage of setting all interests free; and if we want any one illustration of this fact more convincing than another, more completely demonstrating how injurious protection was, and how beneficial the relief from that protection is, we have that peculiarly and most conclusively illustrated in the case of the agricultural interest. I do not speak rashly or without book; it has ever been my strict habit, throughout the long discussion of this question, to take the utmost possible pains to assure myself that I was right in the data upon which I based my views and my statements; and in preparing for this discussion I have not departed from that rule. Throughout the struggle for the total repeal of the corn laws, in seeking to ascertain whether the change could be effected with safety to the country and without injury to the particular interest—and if any one doubts the truth of what I say, I would refer to the evidence I adduced before this House in 1844—I made it my business conscientiously to procure information from every one who was competent to give an opinion, and I have done so since. I have questioned persons intimately acquainted with the present state of agriculture in this country, and have sought their views of that condition, and I have received their solemn and conscientious opinion that the agricultural interest was never in a more healthy condition than at this moment. [Cries of “Oh! oh!”] If hon. Gentlemen doubt me, I shall be obliged to produce my authorities. I can adduce one now whom, if I was to name, the Government could not dispute his credit, and whom others would admit to be competent, for he is a man, himself a large occupier and farmer of land, who is, besides, employed by many noblemen and gentlemen as their land agent, and who is generally intrusted with the purchase and sale of land; I asked this gentleman what he thought of the condition of the landed interest; and he told me that he had not known it for years in so good a condition as it was in now. His expression was, “I never knew it in a sounder state.” I asked him whether land now sold for more than it used to fetch; and he replied, “Most undoubtedly;” that, speaking from twenty-five years’ experience, he had never known land sell so well as now; that he himself had sold, within the last few months, a great deal of land; that it was rising in value, and he should say it was selling now at thirty-seven years’ purchase, and that some pasture land which a few years ago sold for twenty-eight years’ purchase, had recently fetched, under his hand, thirty-three years’ purchase. As to the farmers, where they are distressed, it is because the landlords will not do for them that which they properly require; nothing that the Legislature can do for them will remedy such evils, and this they quite understand; they don’t expect a restoration of protection; they don’t affect to have any faith in protection; they all refer their difficulties to causes of a more domestic kind—to matters which must be settled between them and their landlords—matters which we never hear of in this House. Ask about the labourers; are they well off? They are notoriously better off than they have been for many years. You have been told so for two years past, by both landlords and farmers. “It is owing to emigration,” you say. Ay, in some places some have gone off, but it is chiefly owing to the great improvements in agriculture, which create a demand for labour, to the improved condition of the whole country, which absorbs the superfluous labour, and, at present prices, from their wages giving them greater command over the necessaries of life. Now, Sir, I have said that I will not weary the House with details, and I shall keep my word; but there is a statement that I have verified as strictly correct, that does so immediately bear upon the question, that interests so many in this House—namely, the effect of the recent legislation on the landed interest—that I cannot forbear reading it to the House. I happened to see this statement in a public journal, and I have taken the trouble to verify it so that I might not mislead the House. It is a very remarkable case. It seems to me to be precisely in point; it is a case in which a landowner was supposed to have been ruined in 1846, who was, from having been an old supporter of Sir Robert Peel’s, extremely indignant at his protection being taken from him, supposing that his rent and the value of his property entirely depended upon the old law. He charged the Ministry of the day with all the losses which he should have to incur, and, in his distress, he sends for an agent, to consult with him in what way to dispose of his property. The statement is as follows:—

“At the time the Government made known the intention to repeal the corn laws, which is now nearly five years since, the owner of an estate of about 4,000 acres, situate in the centre of England, alarmed at the prospect which free trade presented of reduced rent and diminished income, had his attention drawn to the necessity of preparing his tenants for the lower prices they would have to take for the produce of their farms, and sought, in the improvement of his estate, for means to enable them to continue its successful cultivation. The success which has attended his proceedings offers so valuable an example to others, that I trust I shall be excused for giving some account of it. At the period mentioned, the estate was divided into farms of 130 to 300 acres, which, tithe-free and arable, with valuable pasture, were let at rents of from 15s. to 30s. an acre. The tenantry, although ancient, had held only by the year; the land, which is naturally fertile, had had scarcely anything done to improve it, and the farmers had little idea of any capability in the soil beyond what their inferior practice had developed. The quantity of pasture upon each farm allowed of a considerable quantity of stock being kept, but, as the cattle were grazing all the winter in the meadows, and no provision of winter food, except hay, was given them, the arable land had no benefit from the stock; and, its cultivation being upon a course without root crops, and but little assisted by manure, gave only very moderate returns. To tenants so farming, Sir Robert Peel's announcement of free trade created considerable alarm, for they, as well as their landlord, saw little chance of their continuing to do as they had done; but in the improvement of their inferior practice, and in the amendment of the general state and ill-condition of their farms, the proprietor was told there would be found ample scope to cover their reductions from free trade, and on this he was told to rely. The assistance of a new land agent, and from a distant district, was obtained, and he at once saw how much of the imperfect success of the tenants was owing to the ill-condition of their farms, and their ignorance of the improved practices which the cultivation of inferior soils had elsewhere called forth: he knew the difficulty there would be in introducing the different practices which he considered essential to the future successful cultivation of their farms, and he could only hope to effect this by at once destroying their confidence in their past practice, and making them place a higher appreciation on the capability of their soil. He determined on a course which should at once drive them to adopt a different system, and at the same time should encourage them to enter into improvements of their farms. It was with these views that at the first audit the tenants were informed they would each receive notice to quit, but that leases for twenty-one years would, at the same time be offered them, at an advance of rent of 20 per cent; that permission would be given them to break up certain portions of the pasture of their farms, after they had been drained, upon plans that would be given them; that draining tiles would be allowed them to drain all their land, but that the draining was to be done at depths and upon the plans to be laid down; that their homesteads would be improved, and sheds built to give them accommodation for wintering their stock in yards, and fattening cattle in stalls; and they would be allowed to remove all unnecessary hedges and trees injurious to the corn; but at the same time their leases would forbid their existing practice of taking two white corn crops in succession; and they would be obliged to dress a fourth of their arable land every year, and other restrictions would be introduced on what they had been in the habit of doing. It was expected in this way they might be made to adopt a more advantageous course of husbandry, and that their farms might be put into better condition, and made more productive, so as to become cheaper to them at the increased rents than they had been under the old. I must pass over the difficulties of the next three years, the stand made against these measures, the obstacles thrown in the way, the withdrawal of some of the tenants, the objections raised to the deep draining, and the attempting the cultivation of roots where roots had never grown, &c. Fortunately, some of the tenants left, and the readiness with which the vacated farms were reoccupied, and at still higher rents, and the example which the new tenants afforded, who, directed by their leases, at once proceeded to grub hedgerows, to deep-drain, and raise turnips and green crops, and better clean the land, were answers to many of their objections. And now it is to the result I would call attention, which is as follows:—this estate now affords a clear rental of 23 per cent advance on the rental of 1845. The rents are now better paid than they ever have been; the last two audits were held quicker than ever after the quarter-days, and at each the whole of the rents were collected without an arrear; and the tenants, with scarcely an exception, admit they are doing well, and their farms are cheaper than they were to them at the old rents; and well they may say so, for such crops as they have had the last two years were never before seen in their parishes. I am aware that such an instance of meeting the requirements of free trade is little likely to have the approval of tenant-farmers, and yet how far more truly beneficial has been the course here adopted than would have been that of the proprietor seeking to afford relief by reducing his rents! No reduction could have given the same relief, but would have been mischievous."

This is a case that cannot be singular, because I find it constantly stated by agriculturists who are properly so described, and referred to in the periodical journals which have their confidence, that, notwithstanding the long duration of protection, the land is still, in most places, in a terrible state, the buildings dilapidated and wholly unsuited to the occupations; and that, if the outlay and improvements were only made which were actually required, the occupiers of the land might be now in as good a position as ever they had been. I need only allude to the journal of the Royal Agricultural Society, with which every Gentleman opposite must be familiar, and to the prize essays which are given every year upon the husbandry of every county, to confirm my statements. I have seen those essays. There is not one within these two years that either refers to protection or to legislative relief; but they speak of that relief which a landlord is able to bestow upon his tenants by improving his own estate, and which he has not yet made. ["Oh, oh!" from the Ministerial side of the House.] I want to establish that protection has been an evil to agriculture, and has not promoted improvement, and I will just read a few extracts from these essays. ["No, no!"] Hon Gentlemen may be disinclined to have such facts published; I don't want to make them known, but I wish to show that no relief can be given by this House; that protection has done unqualified mischief; and that, if agriculture is to be improved, it must be by the owners and occupiers of land themselves. In the prize essay of the Royal Agricultural Society on the farming of Kent, after stating "that the further advancement of agriculture in the cold clay districts of Britain essentially depends on draining," the writer says—

"Before draining can be successfully carried out on the Weald and other enclosed portions of the county, the small fields must be enlarged by grubbing hedges and felling trees. Not less, perhaps, than an eighth of the entire area of the entire arable land of this extensive district is occupied by hedges and trees, taking into calculation the ground that is injured by their roots and shade. Many of the fields consist of only three or four acres; the mere mechanical disadvantages, therefore, of cultivation are obvious, especially when it is considered that upon this heavy soil four horses are usually worked at length in ploughing

"Lost fallows, as they are aptly termed, not unfrequently occur in wet autumns in small enclosed fields, where light and air are in a measure shut out. Thus nearly a whole year's expenses, and perhaps a dressing of manure, are almost lost. There are many thousand acres in the Weald of Kent which cannot, under existing circumstances, be cultivated without a positive loss, that might be made to yield of most kinds of corn a full average of the kingdom.

"The fatal mistake characteristic of this district is to allow high wood and trees to grow in the hedges of arable land in small inclosures It is common to see very inferior trees do more injury in three or four years to the crops than the whole value of the trees will amount to after continuing the mischief for half a century."

"The district possesses within itself the means of its own amelioration. All that is required is to go about the business in a judicious manner. The cheapest and most effective way of carrying out the great object (the improvement of the district) would be for owners of land to commence their operations systematically, and do nothing by piecemeal. The best way would be for the landlord to pay the whole expense of the draining, conducting it under his own superintendence, and to charge a fair percentage on the rental. A judicious outlay might be made to yield in many parts of this county five or six per cent, with a great advantage to the occupying tenant."

Now these observations are in a great measure applicable to all our heavy land districts. I won't read the essays from other districts, but I have them here from the different counties—there are Norfolk, Northamptonshire, West Riding of Yorkshire, and Cumberland: their contents have the authority of a journal which I am sure hon. Gentlemen opposite must read, and they all agree that the only thing necessary to make the agricultural interest prosperous is, that the owner and occupier should agree on those obvious improvements which in many instances already have been employed with the greatest success. Again, I must say, that if ever we see reported what the farmers say or require, it is generally something else than a return to protection. I don't say they would not like high prices if they could have them without a rise in rent. But looking at published reports of the meetings of farmers, you will see that they complain; but their grievances are not such as the Legislature can remedy. They have very distinct grievances, and I own that I feel that sympathy for the farmers which one has for any other class of his fellow-subjects, who feel that they are aggrieved. ["Oh!" from the Ministerial side of the House.] I say they are a most valuable—not the most, but a very valuable portion of our community; they are a portion of the middle class—the productive class, who invest their capital in the cultivation of the soil. Who can, or who ought to be, more respected for their usefulness? Can any man who pretends to dilate on the interests of the community at large exclude those of the farmer, and treat his interests with less regard than those of any other class? My judgment at least does not lead me to do so. I think they are a most interesting class. And I say that the time has come when their interests must be more considered in this House than they have been. I can't help thinking that the farmers have been a very ill-used class. In my opinion their distress has been made capital of by the Gentlemen opposite. I don't know any class of people who have been so deluded. It is not their fault if they are not so quick as other people. Circumstances determine men's intelligence and characters, and their circumstances have not been likely to make them more intelligent than other classes of the community. But is that a reason why you are to impose upon them and to traffic with their ignorance? I say that these unfortunate people have been led to believe that they had friends in Parliament, friends who would secure to them some advantages, though at the expense of the community, by which they would be able to live, succeed, and prosper. Those promises have been held out to them for thirty years and upwards by a class of persons in this country who have lost nothing by making those promises. They held out to the farmers, that if they returned them for the counties, and gave them political support, they would either pass Acts of Parliament, or maintain Acts of Parliament, by which they would be enabled to get high prices and to live comfortably. I say that those people have been grossly deceived, sadly disappointed. They had promises made to them in the name of Parliament, but they did not have the fulfilment of those promises. They have been promised first one thing, then another; first one price, then another; but they have invariably been deceived, and never more deceived than latterly, because they have been encouraged to think, that, under the altered circumstances of the country, they need not help themselves, that they had only to rely on their friends, that they must go to Parliament again, and that what had been taken from them should be restored to them. I say that when people have been so treated they have been grossly deceived, and any independent man may well feel sympathy for them. But, when I listen to their own story, I find that it is not protection, or Acts of Parliament, or political friends, that they dwell upon themselves. There are certain things always specified at farmers' meetings, but if any one mentions them here he is either told that he knows nothing of the agricultural interest, or that he is intruding matter which is irrelevant to the subject. There are a few things I say invariably mentioned. One is the law of distress. Another is, the law of settlement. Another is, that the law should be better defined which awards compensation to outgoing tenants for crops or unexhausted improvements; and another is, that no privilege should be given to any person that tended to keep up or increase that which destroys their produce—namely, game. If you refer to any farmers' journal, you will find that those are their grievances, and yet they are never discussed in this House. The law of distraint is a very serious injury to the farmer. His credit is seriously impaired by it. The landlord always comes in before any other creditor; and, who, under such circumstances, likes to advance him money on the security of his stock, but which money he wants for making improvements. Another evil of this law is, that it makes the landlord much more careless whom he selects for his tenant, which produces a very mischievous kind of competition: all sorts of people come into the market for the land, and the landlord is generally safe, for there is always enough on the farm for six months' rent. Then, again, I really thought, judging from some opinions which have been expressed by certain Members of the Government, that that law which affects the farmer most materially, and is a positive evil in this country—the law of settlement—would have been one of the measures dealt with by the Government. There is nothing that the farmers complain of more than that, from its mischievous effect on the character of their labourers. Then, with respect to game, and to what they term "tenant-right," but which may be interpreted by having the law better defined than now with reference to compensation to outgoing tenants; these are mischiefs which the farmer complains of, and real relief cannot be given to him, whether by the Legislature or otherwise, except by remedying those evils. Then, with respect to the owners of land—and I allude to the different branches of this interest to show not only that protection cannot be restored with any advantage, but that it has not been removed with any ill effects, and that if you want to benefit the agricultural interest it cannot be by the agricultural relief which we hear of in this House. Well, but as to the landowners. Generally they are well off in this country at present. The noble Marquess the Member for Leicestershire, who knows a great deal about the agricultural interest, admits that the landowners are very well off, and that they have nothing to complain of, for if they had, he thinks they would take care to remedy the evil for themselves. The landowners have not anything to complain of. They have great advantages. Everything tells in their favour. At no time was there such a desire to purchase or to occupy their land as at present. There never was a time when they obtained money so easily, and everything has been made cheaper to them than it used to be. Then the labourers, by the admission of every person, are better off now than they used to be, and have been so ever since provisions fell. I have here a proof of it, in a letter from Wiltshire, from a person in a position to know the views of all classes, who says, "There is nothing that many of the labourers have more at heart now than getting a picture of Sir Robert Peel to hang over their fireplaces—they are so well off. Almost to a man, the labourers are for free trade. I can't say so much for the farmers, because they are led to look still to the restoration of Protection, rather than to any other arrangement, to improve their condition." The labourers, then, are free-traders. The landowners are well off, and the farmers are kept back or are standing still under the delusive hope that, since their friends are in power, Protection will be restored. Before I proceed to make any further statements as to the great advantage of removing Protection from any interest, I challenge the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer to prove that any injury to any great interest has resulted from its removal. I don't deny that there are individuals who may, under the peculiar circumstances of their case, have been unable to endure the transition; but that is a very different thing from the way in which the interest generally has been affected. I don't deny that there are things affecting great interests in this country, and thereby the country at large, that ought to have been done long since, and should no longer be delayed. These things may severally affect the shipping interest, the agricultural interest, or the colonial interest; but such matters are entirely independent of the removal of Protection, and ought not to have existed while even that system prevailed. What I contend for is, that protection is a positive evil in itself, to the nation and to the protected interest; that nothing but advantage has attended its removal, as six years' experience has now established. I challenge the right hon. Gentleman to disprove what I have said; and until I understand that he does so—until I hear any statement from the opposite side of the House controverting my position on this subject—I shall not weary the House by any illustrations of fact. I am in possession of the most extraordinary details of the prosperity of the country that could ever have been collected at any period of its history. I don't hesitate to say that this country is in a state of most unexampled prosperity; that the manufacturers and producers in every part of the country are unable to execute their orders; that the people never were so well off, owing to the wages they receive, and the command which those wages give them over the comforts and necessities of life; and that all this is more than mainly owing to the emancipation of trade and manufacture from restriction in most important particulars, and the stimulus thereby given to production and employment, and not to those other causes to which either the Earl of Derby or his Colleagues are pleased to ascribe the prosperity of the country. And I think it is unworthy and ungrateful when we see the great prosperity of this country, and when we see it so obviously connected with those changes in the commercial policy of the country to which I refer, that there should be a poor attempt by vague and indefinite expression either to underrate that prosperity, or to ascribe it to any other cause. I call on the right hon. Gentleman to explain distinctly to us what it is the Earl of Derby means by the influence which the discoveries of gold in Australia, and emigration, have yet had in producing the prosperity of this country for the last two years. Let us have that ascertained, and not left to vague assertion. I beg the right hon. Gentleman to state to us distinctly what is the influence which the influx of gold into Europe, or into England, has had on the present condition of the country. I am perfectly willing to admit that the discovery of gold, like the production of any other article, has given activity to trade between this country and the countries where it was produced, and which, as concerns that article, did not exist before, but only in that respect as any other article in general demand would have done, but not to a greater extent than any other article. It has been an article valuable for commerce, available for immediate exchange with every part of the world, and therefore a most valuable product to those countries where it is found, giving them a means of receiving in exchange the products of other countries. The noble Lord at the head of the Government, however, seems to ascribe the present position of the labouring class chiefly to the discoveries of gold in Australia and other parts of the world. I want to hear that explained; because, if I read the statement of the noble Earl aright, it was, that inasmuch as the influx of gold into this country had raised the value of every article in this country, therefore it had raised wages and improved the condition of the people; but the statement of the right hon. Gentleman opposite, and of the Government generally, as I understand it, and as the Amendment they proposed proved, is, that the improved condition of the people is owing to the cheapness of provisions. Now, which is the case? Is it the Australian diggings which have raised the price of wages and every other article, or is it the cheapness of provisions? The right hon. Gentleman, I know, will make all this clear. Then, with reference to emigration, that statement of the noble Earl's is not very distinct; there is a sort of ingenuity in confounding Irish emigration with English emigration. I want to know what effect that has had upon the condition of the people of this country. As far as I understand it, the great amount of emigration which has taken place from this country has been within the last six months.

That, therefore, will not account for the improved condition of the working classes for the last two years. Besides, if any man examines the returns of the countries from which the people emigrate, they will find that, whereas England and Scotland supply something like 100,000, all the rest consists of Irish who have gone to America, not to Australia. How does that account for the improved condition of the country by the efflux of the people? Then he has not told us what class of our countrymen it is that have gone to Australia. It happens to be peculiarly not the class to which he refers. They have been persons rather above the labouring class; persons who have, I believe, taken capital with them, and have, perhaps, rather belonged to the middle class. To underrate but admit the prosperity, and ascribe it to other causes than the adoption of Free Trade, is consistent with adherence to the principles of Protection; and that may, perhaps, be the purpose of the language employed by Gentlemen opposite. I hope the right hon. Gentleman will not overlook this matter in his speech, for it is part of our business this evening to solve the question, whether the abolition of protection has been attended with any evils, or whether it has not alone produced the advantage to the country which we are all observing. We must have an opinion expressed to-night on these facts, and learn from the Government, composed of men formerly Protectionists, whether the prosperity is not fairly to be traced, directly and indirectly, and beyond all fair dispute, to the operation of that commercial policy which was commenced by the late Sir Robert Peel, and has been continued by the noble Lord the Member for the City of London. And now, Sir, I shall bring these remarks to a close; and in doing so, I beg once more emphatically to say that I have no other object in view than that which has guided me, ever since I have been in the House, on this question, which has reference to the great matter in dispute, and to that alone. It is not to serve a party—it is not factious, it is not personal. I say once for all, that my object is not to displace hon. Gentlemen opposite. I don't want any of their places myself, I can assure them—and I don't want the House to take this Motion as necessarily a Motion of want of confidence in Her Majesty's present Ministers. [Cries of "No, ne!"] Why, certainly they have said so themselves. They have volunteered that declaration—that they do not possess the confidence of this House upon the great questions on which the last Parliament was dissolved. They said so at the opening of the Session, and have repeated it since, that they have not changed their own opinions, while the opinion of the country remains against them; and therefore I say, they admit that they have not the confidence of the new House of Commons. If they had changed their opinions on the subject of free trade, and this being a free-trade House of Commons, as Ministers of the Crown, they might be said to have the confidence of the House; but if Lord Derby does truly represent the rest of them, then, inasmuch as he adheres to his former views, they are in an undoubted minority in this Parliament. But I do want, for what I believe to be great national reasons, to have this Resolution carried, and to have the views of the House of Commons on this question most distinctly, most explicitly, and most emphatically expressed; and more especially do I want this Resolution to be placed on record, in order that we may at least, during this Parliament, have a settlement of a matter which, while unsettled, leaves men of business in this country in doubt, and which leaves the rest of the world undecided, as to what the permanent commercial policy of this country is to be. I do hope, therefore, that the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer will not attempt to evade this real question by talking of factiousness, or by impugning my personal motives; but that he will address himself in a straightforward way to the question before the House, and that he will not sit down without letting us at last know what he does really mean. Already enormous mischief has been done by the course taken by the hon. Gentleman opposite ever since 1846. I know, from what I have heard and from what I have seen on the Continent, that there people exaggerate the importance of the party to which hon. Gentlemen opposite belong; they imagine that Lord Derby does represent a strong section of the English political community, and that he has acquired, or will acquire, the power eventually to reverse the policy of Sir Robert Peel; and it is indeed notorious that in those instances where foreign nations are disposed to change their own commercial policy, the movement is retarded because their Governments are compelled to notice the continued existence of this so-called Protectionist party in this country; there are people both here and abroad that will never adapt themselves to the altered circumstances of our commerce while this policy is left in doubt, and constant mischief is still being done, as it has been done, by the agitation and assertion of these protectionist and anti-free-trade views; and therefore it is that I do contend that the importance of some distinctly worded Resolution such as this, with the hon. Gentleman now in power, and which shall be taken as a final decision of the Parliament and of the country, cannot be overrated; and I now conclude by moving it once more, emphatically stating for myself that I have not another object in it but that which has influenced me for fifteen years past, in seeking to establish and make safe the commercial policy which has recently been adopted.

“That it is the opinion of this House, that the improved condition of the Country, and particularly of the Industrious Classes is mainly the result of recent Commercial Legislation, and especially of the Act of 1846, which established the free admission of Foreign Corn; and that that Act was a wise, just, and beneficial measure.”

The CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: Sir, if the speech which we have just listened to with so much interest—as we always do to anything which falls from the hon. and learned Gentleman—had been a speech in favour of the repeal of the corn laws, or in favour of the repeal of the sugar laws as they existed some time ago, I think it would have been much more appropriate than upon the occasion on which it has been delivered, because the question which we have to decide to-night is, not whether the corn laws shall be repealed, not whether the sugar duties shall be repealed; not whether protection or free-trade—to use the somewhat inaccurate language of the hon. and learned Gentleman—should be repealed or supported; but whether Her Majesty's Ministers, by their conduct since their accession to office, have fulfilled the pledges they gave to Parliament and the country; and whether, having announced that they would defer their own opinion to that of the country on a subject of great importance, they have frankly or otherwise communicated to the House the resolution at which they have arrived. The hon. and learned Gentleman has just told us that enormous mischiefs have been done to the country by the course which has been pursued by the Protectionist party since 1846. If, Sir, it be true that enormous mischiefs have been done to the country by the conduct of the Protectionist party since 1846, I am far from wishing to escape from the issue before us; and I say that it is the duty of the House of Commons, if that statement should be proved, to express in a manner which cannot be mistaken, that they have no confidence in men who have perpetrated “enormous mischief.” Under these circumstances, therefore, I hope that the House will allow me, in a calm and dispassionate manner, to trace our conduct since the period to which the hon. and learned Gentleman has referred. I hope they will allow me—I ask it the more especially as there are many Gentlemen in the House who have obtained seats in it for the first time—I hope, I say, that they will allow me to place before them, in an impartial and accurate statement, the principal parliamentary incidents which have occurred during the last four or five years, in so far as they bear upon this great question. I feel it to be my duty not only to the Government but to Parliament and the country to do this: and I am persuaded that the inevitable and irresistible inference which the House will draw from my statement, and the conclusion which every impartial mind will arrive at, will be very different from that which the hon. and learned Gentleman has attempted to establish by the convenient generalities in which he has indulged.

And now, Sir, in the first place, let me state, in a manner that cannot be misapprehended, the principal reasons on which we opposed the repeal of the corn laws as proposed by the Government of the late Sir Robert Peel in the year 1846. We opposed that change on two broad and distinct grounds. The main ground was, that we believed it was a change which would prove injurious to the interests of labour. That was the main and principal ground on which I myself individually placed my own opposition to it. Was it or was it not the cause of labour? That was the main ground of our opposition to it. We opposed that change for a second reason—because, irrespective of the great and principal objection which we entertained to it, we believed it would occasion injury to considerable interests in the country. On a subsequent occasion, in 1850, when the matter was incidentally referred to in the House, I myself used the expression with reference to the corn laws, that it was a question of labour, or it was nothing. Well now, Sir, after the repeal of the corn laws, there were two other great measures connected with that system of commercial policy which is popularly, but very indefinitely, described by the name of free-trade, which were proposed and carried. The Minister who proposed the repeal of the corn laws, and carried it, was dismissed from office, and was succeeded by another Minister who proposed the repeal of the sugar laws: and this proposition for the repeal of the sugar laws was not approved by the Minister who repealed the corn laws. I mention this circumstance because this question has always been argued as it has been argued to-night, as if from the beginning there had been two great parties in the House—the one banded together to carry what was called free-trade in all the great articles of popular consumption, and the other marshalled for the purpose of opposing that policy. Shortly after the repeal of the sugar duties was carried, Parliament was dissolved, a new Parliament assembled under the management of the noble Lord the Member for London (Lord John Russell), and, after considerable delay and hesitation, another great measure—the repeal of the navigation laws—was proposed and carried. There commenced then in due time the complaints of three great interests—the agricultural, the colonial, and the shipping interests. I may fairly say that the five years which elapsed between the election of 1847 and the recent dissolution, were mainly engaged in discussions or in legislation upon the agricultural, colonial, and shipping distress.

Now, let me put this fact before the House—it is a fact which it may be convenient for some hon. Members to forget, but it is one the accuracy of which cannot be questioned by those who have had experience in the business of the House, and which it may be well for those who have not that experience to become aware of—that from the time that the repeal of the corn laws was passed until this present moment, not a single attempt has been made in the House of Commons to abrogate the measure of 1846. [Cries of “Oh!”] I may be pardoned if I remind hon. Gentlemen who have seats in this House for the first time, that it will be for the advantage of our discussion not to interrupt me now, because an opportunity will be afforded to every one who has anything to say to offer his remarks to the House; and, perhaps, I may add, that those who have been accustomed to tumultuous discussions on platforms will find that in the House of Commons it is necessary to be more accurate in their statements than elsewhere. I repeat the statement which called forth the interruption—I repeat it on behalf of the party who have “perpetrated enormous mischief”—that from the moment the corn laws were repealed till now not a single Motion has ever been made in this House—at least, with the sanction of any party—to bring back that protection which has so unnecessarily been attacked to-night. Now, Sir, let me ask what was the reason we did not bring forward a Motion to question the policy of the Act of 1846, which, up to that time, we had consistently and honourably opposed? It was because we had laid it down from the first as a great principle that the fate of that proposition depended not on the injury it might inflict on any particular interest in the country, but on the way in which it should affect the condition of the working classes; and, there being no facts before us of a sufficiently large character to convince us that the condition of the working classes had been injured by the Act of 1846, we did not think it our duty to make any Motion, when in opposition, which questioned the policy of the law. Well, now, Sir, let me remind the House what was our conduct with respect to the other two branches of this great question. Did we—did the party who are said to have perpetrated “enormous mischiefs”—did we, on the subject of the sugar laws, act in that factious spirit which has been described by the hon. and learned Gentleman, who is himself so susceptible with regard to imputations of factious conduct? What did we do with regard to the sugar laws? When accounts were received in this country describing the state of distress—I might almost say of devastation—which had befallen these Colonies—when it was impossible for any man who was doing his duty in the House to be silent on the subject—what was the conduct of the party who have perpetrated “enormous mischiefs on the country?” A noble Friend of mine—alas! now no more—in his place in Parliament, made a most forcible statement to the House of the distress that existed, but asked for nothing more than an inquiry; and in accordance with this request the House granted a Committee to investigate the condition and prospects of the colonies which produced sugar and coffee. It is unnecessary for me to remind the House of the elaborate and complete investigation which took place. Who formed that Committee? Why, Sir, of the fifteen Members of which it was composed, only three were Protectionists, namely, the hon. Member for Somersetshire (Mr. Miles), my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State (Sir J. Pakington), and the noble Lord the Member for Leicestershire (Lord G. Manners). There was, indeed, one hon. Gentleman favourable to protection in sugar—I mean the hon. Baronet the late Member for South Essex (Sir E. Buxton), whose absence, but for the fact that he has been replaced by an hon. Friend of my own, I should greatly regret. There were on the same Committee two Members of the Government of the late Sir Robert Peel—I mean the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the University of Cambridge (Mr. Goulburn), and Mr. Cardwell. There was also a Whig Cabinet Minister (Mr. Labouchere), and of course, being a Whig, a sincere free-trader. There were, besides, six Gentlemen of remarkably pronounced opinions on all questions relating to free trade. I shall read their names, for they are quite classical on such a subject. There were the late hon. Member for Liverpool (Sir Thomas Birch), the hon. and learned Gentleman who made the Motion to-night (Mr. C. Villiers), the right hon. Member for Manchester (Mr. M. Gibson), the hon. Member for Westbury (Mr. Wilson), a Member for a Scotch borough, and another hon. Gentleman, who I am not sure whether he is a Member of the House or not at present. Out of the fifteen Members, I repeat, only three were Protectionists—there were only three men belonging to the party which by its interference on the subject had “perpetrated enormous mischiefs.” And what was the result of the Committee? The result of the investigation by this free-trade Committee was, that they came to a resolution that there ought to be a differential duty of 10s. per cwt. between foreign and colonial sugar. Well, Sir, if there were “enormous mischiefs” done on this second branch of the subject, let hon. Gentlemen opposite take their share of them. But what happened in consequence of the efforts of the Protectionist party? That intense free-trader, the noble Lord the Member for London—the noble Lord who, after the gracious Speech from the Throne—after the speech of the First Minister of the Crown—after the notice which I gave of the Amendment which I intended to propose to-night, which even the hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for Wolverhampton has deemed so satisfactory—the noble Lord who, after all that, had the courage to rise up in his place and say that the question to be decided to-night was whether we should retain free trade or return to protection—Sir, I thought I listened to the tones of the Appropriation Clause when I heard that voice—that noble Lord who, on the night when it was proposed that there should be a call of the House, had the audacity to make this declaration—came down to the House when he was First Minister of the Crown, and owned that his legislation on the subject of the sugar duties had been rash, precipitate, and injurious—that its action had been far more rapid than he had contemplated, and asked leave to introduce a Bill immediately to suspend the change of duty, and prolong the protection which he himself had taken away. Well, now with respect to the first question—that of the land—I have shown to the House that the party who perpetrated “enormous mischiefs,” from the very moment the repeal of the corn laws was carried, never attempted to disturb that law in this House. I have shown that, with respect to the sugar laws, they confined their exertions to a calm and elaborate investigation of facts, and that the consequence of that investigation, pursued with so much energy, and sustained with so much knowledge, was, that we who were in opposition influenced the conduct of the Minister of the day. And therefore, on these two heads, I think I have shown the House that the general accusation of the hon. and learned Gentleman has no foundation. I come now to the third branch of the question. We opposed—and not we merely, but many of Sir Robert Peel’s followers opposed—the repeal of the navigation laws. Have we ever since attempted to abrogate that decision of the House? On the contrary, the present First Minister of the Crown, after the passing of the measure, took an early opportunity of saying that he thought that change in our legislation was one which we could not reverse; that it was a step which it was impossible for the Legislature to retrace. And now, Sir, let me—tracing the conduct with respect to these great questions of those who had perpetrated “enormous mischiefs” on the State—let me remind the House of their conduct since the repeal of those three great laws has taken place. Not having in any instance attempted to disturb the decisions of Parliament on them, circumstances at length arose which called the attention of the Protectionist party to the condition of the cultivators of the soil in this country. When the general election of 1847 took place, the organisation of political parties was entirely broken up; very high prices for all kinds of farm produce, from peculiar causes, then existed; and the opinions which influenced the constituent body on that occasion could hardly be said to have had any reference to the principles, the merits, or the possible consequences of recent legislation. A large Protectionist party was indeed returned to this House from a feeling which always animates great bodies of people in this country, who think they owe sympathy and gratitude to those who have fought their battles or carried their colours. [Laughter.] Hon. Gentlemen may deride this feeling, but they may rely upon it that if this feeling do not exist, Parliamentary government would soon be a mere name. But it is very well known that at the election of 1847 the economical controversy was not at all entered into, at least by the farmers. The farmers were then, as I have said, receiving high prices, and political parties were in a state of disorganisation; and, although a large party was returned to this House in favour of what is called the agricultural interest, the fact is, that no pressure from that interest, or from any of the cultivators of the soil, was made to induce their advocates in this House to bring forward their complaints. In 1850, however, the pinch which we foresaw not only commenced, but was in acute operation. What was then the conduct of the party who have perpetrated "enormous mischiefs?" We were then pressed upon by our constituents, and by those whose interests were naturally dear to us, with complaints of their great losses and sufferings; and that they had great losses and sufferings I need not attempt to prove, because we have always a ready witness on that subject in the hon. and learned Member for Wolverhampton. But when our constituents came to us, what was our course? Did we come forward and demand the restoration of protection? On the contrary: we said we opposed the repeal of the corn laws on two grounds. The first and most considerable ground was, that it would injure the interests of labour; and the second and subordinate ground was, that it would probably do injury to you, the corn growers. We are not satisfied that the interests of labour have been injured by the change. We cannot, therefore, lend ourselves to the cry of the farmer, and demand the restoration of protection on his account. [Laughter.] I can only tell the hon. Member who laughs that in a deliberative assembly it would be better for him to meet argument with argument. If my arguments are not sound, or my statements not accurate, let him expose them. I say that our advice to our constituents was, that we could not, because their interests were suffering, recommend a return to a Protectionist policy, and that, in our opinion, nothing could justify a return to that policy but proof of injury to the great interests of labour, which we believed from the beginning would be affected by it. But we said to them, "If you find your sufferings acute, if you find your distress is intolerable, if you find the cost of production not remunerated by your returns, we will consider your position with reference to taxation, and, if we can relieve you of burdens which others are not subject to, or by any other means equally justifiable give you relief, we will do our duty to you in the House of Commons, and we will endeavour to obtain you that relief." In pursuance of this advice, and at the request of my friends, I brought forward in this House a Motion of a remedial nature, and received, if not the sanction of the House, undoubtedly considerable sympathy. Now, in 1851 a change of Government very unexpectedly took place. In 1851—I beg hon. Gentlemen to remember the dates, for they are very important if you wish to arrive at an impartial estimate of the position of Government—I say, in 1851, at the first moment the House met, I gave notice of a Motion, the object of which was to relieve the cultivators of the soil from the pressure of certain local taxation—not a measure to restore protection, not a measure to question the policy of the repeal of the corn laws, but a measure brought forward with a distinct disclaimer on my part of any wish to enter upon that question, and with the statement that I thought it most unwise to make that controversy one of public discussion in the House of Commons, and that any recurrence to the system which had been abrogated could only be justified by the overwhelming opinion of the country. I brought forward this remedial Motion with regard to agriculture, which was, I think, lost in this House—and in a very full House—only by a majority of 10 votes. I may say that the division upon that question displaced the Government from their seats, because, although they did not resign office upon that point, yet, on finding themselves a few days afterwards upon another subject, and in a very thin House, in a minority, they did feel it their duty to resign; and the noble Lord opposite, in a statement which he subsequently made in this House, referred to the division upon my Motion as that which had mainly decided the opinion of the Government. Well, under these circumstances, the Earl of Derby being recommended to the notice of his Sovereign by the then Prime Minister of the country, was called upon to form a Government. Now, look to the position of Lord Derby at that moment. He was at the head of a party in Parliament, one principle of whose conduct was that it was unwise to disturb the repeal of the corn laws which had taken place in 1846, unless called for by the nation in an unmistakable manner. He had recommended that course while there was a most powerful party in the country discontented with the advice which he gave; and are hon. Gentlemen to be surprised that there should be a strong party in this country favourable to what they call protection, notwithstanding the course which we might feel it our duty to take in either House of Parliament? We must remember that the farmers of England, according to the statement of the hon. and learned Member for Wolverhampton, had at that very time lost upwards of 90,000,000*l.* in one year. Well, it might be perfectly wise, just, and beneficial, that a body of English producers should lose more than 90,000,000*l.* in a single year; but this I will venture to say, with great deference to all those lights of political economy whom I see opposite, that you may rely upon it, that so long as human nature remains what it is, a large body of producers will not lose millions without feeling very much discontented at the legislation which has caused such loss, and without challenging the justice of the legislation of which they are the victims. But you had something more than this. You had the great colonial interests of this country in a state of absolute ruin; and, in addition, you had the great shipping interest subjected to unrestricted competition by a Minister who, at the same time, did not remove those burdens and restrictions which, only six months ago, he told the greatest commercial constituency in the world absolutely impeded its prosperity. Are you surprised, then, that there should be an important party—a party that, from their numbers and their great and ramified interests, may be fairly called a national party—who were discontented with the recent legislation to which I have alluded? Lord Derby, however, had made up his mind that nothing could justify a return to the abrogated system unless the labouring classes were largely and permanently suffering. What then was the conduct of Lord Derby in 1851? He was called upon unexpectedly to form a Government. He had to announce a policy which, while it showed sympathy with those great classes in the country, the sufferings of which are always proved by hon. Gentlemen opposite, would be consistent with the principle he had laid down for his Government, that they should not disturb the existing laws unless the working classes were suffering from their adoption. The programme of Lord Derby was one of compromise and of conciliation. How moderate it was I will show by recalling it to the consideration of the House. In 1851 did Lord Derby come forward and say, “We must return to the sliding scale of 1846?” On the contrary, he said—“I will propose, as regards the agricultural interest, now suffering so much, that we shall have a countervailing duty, such as has been approved of by men of the highest character and authority upon such subjects. You acknowledge the agricultural interest is subject to certain peculiar burdens as regards taxation, and to certain restrictions as regards their industry. Well, I open books of great authority in political economy, and they tell me that a countervailing duty is the legitimate compensation under such circumstances.” I know that one of the most distinguished statesmen of the day, and an undoubted free-trader—the noble Member for Tiverton (Viscount Palmerston)—when he consented to the repeal of the corn laws, yet, speaking as a statesman, repeated his regret that in the passion of the moment the opportunity had been lost of raising a revenue and of accomplishing other national objects by the imposition of a countervailing duty. Then, in 1851, a moderate countervailing duty was the proposition of Lord Derby, and not an attempt to disturb the settlement of 1846. The policy of Lord Derby having been expounded in a speech in his place in Parliament, a record remains which an uninformed sneer will not disturb. [3 Hansard, cxiv. 1003.] What, then, was the conduct of Lord Derby with regard to the sugar duties? [The right hon. Gentleman was here interrupted by some conversation among hon. Members on the Opposition benches.] I hope that, as the Government are on their trial, hon. Gentlemen will do me the honour, as an honest jury, to listen to my statement. Did Lord Derby propose any recurrence to the laws which had been repealed in 1846 under the protest of the late Sir Robert Peel? Not in the least. All Lord Derby proposed was, that the descending scale of duties should be arrested, and that only for a time, while the Colonies were suffering from the great trial through which they were passing. Again, I will ask, did Lord Derby propose to re-establish the abrogated navigation laws? On the contrary, Lord Derby declared that any recurrence in that respect would be impossible, after the removal of those restrictions which the noble Lord opposite himself condemned. Lord Derby did not succeed in forming a Government in 1851. It, therefore, became necessary to consider his position with regard to this question; and, after due consideration, it was his opinion that it would be extremely unwise and injurious to bring forward in Parliament, in that or any subsequent Session, any Motion which directly or indirectly continued the great industrial controversy which had been so long maintained. He was aware that there was a party in the country which would not allow their course to be dictated or their feelings to be regulated by a mere Parliamentary party. It was not for him to tell men who were suffering, they were never to obtain relief; but he said, what I think he was entirely justified in saying, adopting what I conceive to have been a wise and proper course, that if the nation was aggrieved, an early opportunity would occur for the nation to relieve itself. He considered after his failure in the formation of a Government in 1851, that, so far as moral certainty was concerned, the dissolution of Parliament must take place under the advice of the noble Member for the City of London; and he looked to that dissolution, under the auspices of his political opponents, as the proper occasion on which to conclude for ever this great controversy. After having done my best—under circumstances which must, of course, have been mortifying to any party—namely, the noble Lord's failure in forming a Government—to rally the spirit of my friends in this House—in perfect concurrence with Lord Derby's advice, and in complete sympathy with all his counsels, I resolved, as I communicated to my friends at the time, that I would not bring forward any question in this House concerning the incidence of taxation on agriculture, because such a course might be liable to misconception—the Government might be pressed, and consequences might occur which we wished to prevent. Well, in 1852, when Parliament met, although at that time, from political causes, independent of the general feeling of this House, it is very possible that if I had brought forward a Motion on the incidence of taxation upon agriculture, I should have carried it, or at least should have been defeated by a majority so slight that the Government would have been shaken to its base, I scrupulously refrained from giving notice of any such Motion. I did not wish the controversy to be prolonged in this House. I looked to the inevitable and impending dissolution of Parliament, which would take place, as I thought, under the advice of our opponents, as the event that would undoubtedly settle the question for ever. Well, what did occur? Why, that occurred which no imagination could have supposed. There were internal dissensions in the Government—a Government so favoured by its opponents that we would not advance, scarcely even to do our duty, lest we might inconvenience them—the Government fell to pieces from internal dissension, and Lord Derby, by the advice of the noble Lord opposite, was again sent for by Her Majesty. Well, what was the conduct of Lord Derby under these circumstances? It was a result that we did not anticipate, and, what was more, that we regretted; but I will ask the House—I will not say as men of honour, but as men of common spirit—could we possibly have refused the duty which was almost thrust upon us? Our political opponents wished us to occupy their places; this House wished us to undertake the Government; I may safely say, that there was no section of men in the country who did not wish to see some Government formed; and I suppose that no body of men ever acceded to office with such complete absence of party passion and party feeling. Well, that being the state of the case, I was very much surprised, as our position regarding our antecedents was pretty accurately known, to find that the hon. and learned Gentleman opposite (Mr. C. Villiers) the stormy petrel of Protection, who always appears at a particular crisis, came forward and wished to know, on the first day of my taking my seat after my re-election, whether the Government was about to propose a recurrence to a protective policy? The same inquiry was made in another place of my noble Friend (the Earl of Derby). Our answers were in complete harmony with all we had said before—namely, that we had acceded to power by no Motion connected with this subject, on no Motion of our own, and under circumstances which we could not possibly have anticipated; that there seemed to be a unanimous feeling, both in the House and in the country, that we should administer public affairs; that it was not our intention to propose any recurrence to the abrogated laws; but that, in consistency with all we had said, but still more in deference to the feeling of that great party out of doors, who had a right to look to us for the constitutional opportunity of declaring their opinions, we should at an early opportunity recommend Her Majesty to ascertain the sense of Her people, and that this decision of the country upon the subject would be final.

Now, Sir, before I arrive at the dissolution, I may, perhaps, be permitted to state what was the conduct of the party who had perpetrated for six years such “enormous mischief,” when they were—almost against their consent, and certainly with not too great confidence in their own abilities—obliged to become Ministers of the Crown. We found, when we acceded to office, that there were reasons which rendered an immediate appeal to the sense of the people most inconvenient to the public service; and although we wished, and willingly pledged ourselves to the House, that that appeal should take place at the earliest opportunity possible, still we found that it was necessary to administer previously the affairs of the country for a certain time. There were technical reasons which rendered the lapse of at least two months inevitable. The lapse of double that time would have allowed us to carry measures of the greatest importance to the State. The two measures which we considered of paramount importance were, the one for the defence of the country, the other for the reform of the Court of Chancery. The measure for the defence of the country was received with derision by the noble Lord the Member for the City of London. He exhausted all his powers of amiable cynicism upon that measure. He revived and reorganised the Opposition; and, as if the trumpet of political warfare could not sound in that ear without his wishing to take the trenches of the enemy, I really thought the Government were to be upset on the Militia Bill about a month after they had acceded to office. There is no form of ridicule and no prophecy of disaster which the noble Lord and others did not bring to bear upon the absurd scheme of a militia raised by voluntary enlistment. Yet the party which had perpetrated “enormous mischief” persisted in their course; and they carried their measure, which has met with eminent and unprecedented success, and has given to this country a powerful and popular force. But no sooner had we provided for the defence of the country than we thought it our duty to carry out the recommendations of the Commission with respect to Chancery reform. We had the honour and advantage of a Colleague whose great abilities were not perhaps adequately appreciated by his country, though his unrivalled learning was universally acknowledged; but we found in Lord St. Leonards, when he had accepted the responsibility of a Minister of the Crown, not merely a learned lawyer, but a man with the grasp of a vigorous statesman; and, acting under his advice, and animated by the determination which we found inspired him, of accomplishing those great reforms, the basis of which depended upon Parliament’s immediately carrying out the recommendations of the Commission, we resolved that we would face a critical and derisive Parliament, and would not only propose measures, but endeavour to carry them. Well, how were we received? Why, even one whose generous support of the Government I never can forget, and whose amiable and popular character in this House men on all sides acknowledge with pleasure—even the accomplished and noble Lord the Member for Tiverton (Viscount Palmerston), could not help warning us, though in a sunny and friendly way, not to embark in a Chancery suit. Her Majesty’s Ministers, however, did embark in that Chancery suit, and I am proud to say it is the greatest and most successful Chancery suit—and I believe, also, the most popular with the people of England—that has ever been witnessed. Well, Sir, the party which had perpetrated “enormous

The followers of Sir Robert Peel, then, who are, we are told, banded together against the existence of that Government which they are always calling on to produce their measures—the followers of Sir Robert Peel, on the two great questions, first, of agricultural distress, and secondly, on the distress of the sugar-producing colonies, entirely approved the policy pursued by the Protectionist party. What has been their policy with respect to the third test? The moment the navigation laws were repealed we gave up the battle. There never was a Motion made by any hon. Member on this side of the House—I have no recollection of any party Motion—by which it was attempted to, recur to those laws. But this was a question which elicited the views of the followers of Sir Robert Peel. When the Bill for the repeal of the navigation laws was read a third time, the right hon. Member for the University of Oxford raised his eloquent voice in favour of reciprocity, and laid on the table of the House a clause to that effect. I have now submitted to the House the conduct of the party which it is said has “perpetrated enormous mischief” on three questions of free-trade. I have subjected the followers of Sir Robert Peel to the same test, and I find that we have the sanction of those distinguished men to our course.

But that section of the House, even if I could satisfy them, might not be numerous enough to save us from the peril in which we find ourselves. I must endeavour to see whether I cannot act on the consciences of a party more numerous and influential. Let us see what the noble Lord the Member for London and his party, the Whigs—let us see what they have done. Let us apply the three tests to his conduct and that of his followers. Has their conduct been such that they can now, by their votes and their speeches, declare that no great interests have been injured by recent legislation, and that, in sympathising with those suffering interests, we have been all this time perpetrating “enormous mischief?” I brought forward a Resolution which expressed some sympathy with the interests of the cultivators of the land in England, and made some slight attempt to alleviate their sufferings under that severe pressure which the right hon. Member for the University of Oxford so beautifully and so eloquently described. What I did, though I am called the “farmers’ friend,” is nothing to what the noble Lord did.

The noble Lord went to the Sovereign, and recommended Her to express sympathy with the sufferings of the agriculturists. The noble Lord recommended the Sovereign in Her gracious Speech to acknowledge not only their depression but their continued depression. What did he mean by that? Certainly a Minister who took such a course is not one to come forward and pretend that, because we supported a Motion on the peculiar burdens incident to the cultivators of the soil, we were seeking to get back protection. Certainly, he has no right to say that the question now is, whether we shall maintain free-trade or return to protection. What has been the conduct of the noble Lord in reference to the second question? I refer to it to complete the picture. The noble Lord has done more for the sugar interest than any other person in the House has done. He absolutely brought in a Bill two years ago to prolong their protection, and assist them in that struggle to which they were subjected, not only by recent legislation, but by his own. I come to the third test, the sufferings of the shipping interest. The noble Lord has not only lamented their sufferings, but suggested the removal of the burdens and restrictions upon the shipping interest “which still impede its prosperity.” Now an interest whose prosperity is impeded, must be a suffering interest. It certainly cannot be called a progressive interest. It cannot be called an interest enjoying the advantages of the new system, of which the noble Lord is the champion. Thus I have shown that, on the three great subjects of recent legislation to which we have solicited the attention of the House, with reference to the injury inflicted on particular interests, we have the authority of the followers of the late Sir Robert Peel, and of the late Government, with all their followers too. I admit there is a party—how numerous I know not—which has been consistent. There is one person in this House, who has been constant from the beginning, and has a right to make the speech he made to-night, and that is the hon. Member for Wolverhampton. I have sat in this House many years with the hon. and learned Gentleman, and I had the honour and gratification of his acquaintance for some years before either of us, I dare say, thought of having a seat in this House. There are two qualities which I have ever observed in him—precision of thought and concinnity of expression; and that is the reason why I do not believe he is the author of the Resolution which he has brought forward. Whatever may be the faults of that Resolution, I find no fault with his speech. His speech is the same he has always made. I make the observation without any feeling that approaches to a sneer. I may say that he may look back with proud self-complacency to the time when I remember him sitting on almost the last bench on this side the House, and bringing forward, with the command of a master of the subject, never omitting a single point, and against all the prejudices of his audience, the question of the corn laws. There were no cheers then from the followers of Sir Robert Peel. There were no enthusiastic adherents then in a defunct Whig Ministry. On the contrary, the right hon. Baronet the Member for Carlisle (Sir James Graham) came forward and threw his broad shield over the territorial interest of England; and anybody but the hon. and learned Member for Wolverhampton would have sunk in the unequal fray. I honour, respect, and admire him; but I cannot agree to his Resolution; and I will give you, if you will let me, the reasons why I cannot do so. I have to-night put before the House the case of the Government; and, if I have seemed to trench on the patience of the House, I hope they will be generous enough to remember that they sit in the character of a jury to-night; that in speaking to them I am appealing to opinion, which will decide more important things than the fate of a Government. It is therefore fitting that, whatever may be the decision of the House, I should have an opportunity of putting the Government in a right position, and especially with reference to parties who are, we are told, banded together to overturn it. I have shown the House that from the beginning we resolved never to attempt to repeal any of those three measures; that under no circumstances did we think the country could retrace its steps unless the condition of the working classes became permanently worse; that during all this time there was a strong and most suffering party out of the House, a party whose sufferings were not only acknowledged by statements made by Ministers, but sympathised with by our Sovereign. And we are told that we were not to encourage those men under all their distresses, suffering, as they believed, from the desertion of their natural leaders—that we were not to secure for them, at least the constitutional appeal which, if they did not labour under misapprehension, would, they believed, give them the means of redressing their grievances. I wish to bring in no external causes for the course we took; but I can only say, as one returned to this House by my constituents, that I cannot comprehend the feelings which should have induced me to desert them in their hour of trial. Difficult as was the position in which we were placed with these suffering interests, that position was immensely aggravated when the Chief Minister of the Crown was frequently recommending the Sovereign either to acknowledge those sufferings, or bringing in measures of partial and temporary relief. How could you expect that these interests would believe your laws conclusive, when from the Throne you seemed to regret their consequences, and were constantly meddling with the legislation you had yourselves proposed? I have shown the House that, acting on these two principles, we determined, first, that we should not disturb that legislation unless the working classes were permanently suffering; secondly, that we would by remedial legislation mitigate as much as possible any just claims for relief placed before us—claims which I have shown that the leaders of almost all parties have attempted to alleviate.

We now come to the dissolution of Parliament. The dissolution took place in July. The moment the elections were terminated it was the duty of Her Majesty's Government to form a definitive and conclusive opinion with respect to the feeling of the people on this question, of attempting to abrogate the laws of 1846, 1847, and 1849, which affected the importation of corn, the importation of sugar, and the free navigation of the country. There could be, and there was, no question in the minds of Her Majesty's Ministers with respect to the result of that election. There was no doubt that there was not only not a preponderating majority in favour of a change in the laws passed in those years, but not even of modifying them in any degree; that there was a decisive opinion on the part of the country that that settlement should not be disturbed. When we acceded to office in the spring, there were then two courses open to us. If we had formed an opinion from what we observed and heard, that there was no prospect of the country sanctioning any modification of those laws, we might have brought forward measures of a remedial character, such as we might have thought likely the House would sanction. That was one course we could have taken. The other was the course we adopted; and we adopted that irrespective of any other considerations than our own conviction that after such great changes had taken place—after there had been excited in the country so much alarm—and after there had been experienced so much distress—after that distress had been acknowledged by the Throne—after it had been attempted to be mitigated—after the statement that those who were discontented with that legislation would never be satisfied till there was an appeal to the constituencies—we were convinced that, if measures had been brought forward in this House which would have gained the assent of the House; which might have been of a very conciliatory character, and most just and beneficent in operation, there would be always a large party in the country, and no inconsiderable party in this House, who would have said that they had been betrayed by their friends, that we had betrayed our principles, that we had miscalculated the spirit and feeling of the country; that a protective policy was the policy of which the country really were in favour, and that, as in 1846 and 1847, the opinion of the country had been evaded or not appealed to. Irrespective, then, of the pressure of Parliament, we felt convinced that, for the advantage of the country and the permanent happiness of all classes, it was absolutely necessary that the question should be settled, and that those who made an appeal to the country in favour of a recurrence to a protective policy should have a constitutional opportunity of vindicating their opinions. What has been the consequence of the line we have taken? The consequence has been that—as always happens among Englishmen—the protectionists having had a fair trial, having gone through a fair contest, and having been beaten, are not ashamed to acknowledge their discomfiture. If they had not had this opportunity there would have been for years—for endless years—a Parliamentary party in the country and in this House, who would have believed in the possibility of carrying out a protectionist system of policy; and whenever a period of suffering, arising from any of those vicissitudes which will periodically occur, should have happened, you would have had the distress attributed to the policy you are so anxious to support. I admire and entirely respect the feeling which has influenced large bodies of my countrymen to surrender long-cherished convictions. But in what way are you going to meet them? You are about to meet them—I will not say with the insult of a bully, because that would not be a Parliamentary phrase; but I do say that in no wise or politic spirit could these Resolutions have possibly been framed which have been presented to-night. I have already acquitted the hon. and learned Member for Wolverhampton of being the father of his own Resolutions, and therefore he cannot be offended at anything I may say about them. Sure I am that those who have a powerful sympathy with something else than free trade, have concocted these Resolutions. Well, Sir; having after the general election, considered the verdict of the country, Her Majesty's Government felt they had but one course to take—frankly to accept and unreservedly to act upon it. But I am told that we have not done that. I am told that the language of the Queen's Speech from the Throne was not satisfactory. Why, certainly we did not think it our duty to recommend Her Majesty to speak like a partisan. There ought to be a certain degree of reserve in the language to be used by the Crown under any circumstances. The Speech from the Throne is always recommended by the advisers of the Crown, but still it is the Speech of the Sovereign, and the Sovereign might be called on—even on the morrow—to use different language for a different purpose. For these reasons, it has always been deemed constitutional and proper that the Speech from the Throne should be distinguished by a fitting reserve. That used to be the old constitutional doctrine of the noble Lord the Member for London. In February, 1850, the depression of the agricultural classes was beginning to produce a significant effect on the administration of the noble Lord, and, whether for that reason or from some other cause, some of the noble Lord's friends thought that the Speech from the Throne did not avow adhesion to free trade with sufficient distinctness. The noble Lord was called to account for not speaking out by the Gentlemen who are offended by my calling them the Manchester school, although I use the phrase as a compliment, looking on a school as men holding distinct opinions, and not afraid of driving them to their legitimate results, and distinguished from those politicians who, under different circumstances, advocate a different course. ["Hear!"] The mistake which hon. Gentlemen who cheer make is this, that I am not advocating a different course. However, on the occasion to which I was alluding, namely, in February, 1850, the Manchester school was of opinion that the noble Lord the Member for London had not spoken in the Speech from the Throne with the decision which befitted the atmosphere of a free-trade hall. What said the noble Lord in vindication? The noble Lord's words were these:—

"It appeared to us, much as we should have rejoiced in an opportunity of advising Her Majesty to declare the opinions we entertain with respect to the recent commercial policy, that the time was not a fit one to propose that that expression of opinion should fall from Her Majesty. It has always appeared to us, that in conformity to recent custom with regard to matters of legislation, upon which Parliament may have to give an opinion in the course of the Session, it is better to reserve those questions on the first night of the Session, and rather to give an opinion as to the actual state of the country, than to attribute that legislation to any acts of the Government."

Although we have followed the precedent established by the noble Lord, we have not escaped the criticism of his supporters. The hon. and learned Member for Wolverhampton indulged in one—unintentional no doubt, but still—most erroneous misrepresentation on this point, which, if not noticed, might be productive of "enormous mischief." He said that the Queen's Speech was in the conditional mood; that if the House were of opinion that the result of recent legislation had been good, then they should take an opportunity of saying so. Now, I deny that there was any condition attached to it. The House was not even asked to echo that passage in the Speech, for we drew up the Address so that the answer of the House might be, "We thank Her Majesty for Her Majesty's recommendation." In doing so, we followed the precedents that have always been set by the noble Lord, but which he now finds it convenient to disclaim. The Queen's Speech, however, did absolutely contain a distinct affirmation that the principle of our commercial code was the principle of "unrestricted competition." That principle had been acquiesced in after due deliberation on the part of the Government. The First Minister of the Crown spoke in the most explicit manner in that sense on the first night of the Session. What the Queen's Speech really said was, that if it should appear that recent legislation, in effecting a great deal of good—we did not dispute that—had done some harm—we did not say that it had—then the House would take the matter into consideration. The good was positive, the harm only was conditional. Her Majesty's Speech contained a distinct affirmation that the principle of our commercial code was "unrestricted competition." That policy having been accepted by the Government after due deliberation, the First Minister of the Crown, on the first night of the Session, announced the fact in the most explicit manner. I also made, on the same night, some observations in this House, which the right hon. Member for the University of Oxford thought so strong that he intimated hon. Members on this side of the House, as Protectionists, would stultify themselves by continuing to support the Government. Is it not enough that Her Majesty in the Speech from the Throne should have announced the decision of the country to be in favour of "unrestricted competition?" Is it not enough that the First Minister of the Crown should have taken the earliest opportunity of declaring from his place in Parliament that he knew the decision of the country was against a return to protection, and that he accepted the consequences of that decision? Is it not enough that I have placed on the table of the House the Amendment which the hon. and learned Member for Wolverhampton has seized upon rather captiously? You have to consider, first, the Motion of the hon. and learned Member; and, secondly, the Amendment which I, on the part of my friends, have proposed, for reasons which I will express. Let us consider the Resolutions of the hon. and learned Member; I say that, in the first place, they are unprecedented; and, in the second, they are, in my mind, most impolitic and unwise. Let us for a moment try their justice, equity, and policy by parallel instances in similar cases. I will take, first, the case of the House of Commons after the Reform Bill, and the position of the Government in 1835. Sir Robert Peel and his friends had offered to the Reform Bill a powerful and prolonged opposition. Sir Robert Peel suddenly became Minister in 1835, and when he was Minister he expressed his determination not to disturb the Reform Bill, although he did not approve of it. What would then have been thought of the Opposition if in a new Parliament, and with a Ministry in such a position, they had proposed a Resolution declaring that the Reform Bill was a just, wise, and beneficial measure? Let us look at this question a little closer, for it involves much higher considerations than any connected with mere personal interests. I tell you that if you carry your Motion, you will render Parliamentary government impossible in this country. Thenceforth a Government composed of persons whose opinions have been politically vanquished, will cease to be practicable; because if you pursue the course you are now following, the moment such a party succeeds to power, a Resolution may be brought forward, pledging the House in vague terms to some measure which those forming the Government have formerly conscientiously opposed. Take another instance. Let us suppose that a new Government is formed; let us suppose, further, that that Government is composed of the followers of Sir Robert Peel. Suppose you Gentlemen opposite may not approve of the noble Lord the Member for London immediately returning to power. I assure the noble Lord I will offer no objection to his return to office, if he wishes it. Let us imagine a different case, however, namely, that the followers of Sir Robert Peel accede to office, and form an Administration. Two years ago the followers of Sir Robert Peel opposed one of the most popular measures ever brought forward by a Minister in this country. I give no opinion as to the wisdom, policy, or success of that measure, but that it was one of the most popular measures ever offered to the acceptance of a Legislature there is no doubt. The followers of Sir Robert Peel opposed the measure, because they said it was a declaration of war against Ireland. That measure was the Ecclesiastical Titles Bill. Should the followers of Sir Robert Peel take office to-morrow, I do not think it impossible—could I descend to such arts—to carry a Resolution declaring the Ecclesiastical Titles Bill to be a wise, just, and beneficial measure. But the case is more aggravated even than it seems to be by these instances. Let us remember under what circumstances Sir Robert Peel acceded to office in 1834—for although he was as guiltless as any man in Her Majesty's dominions of what had occurred, he came into office under circumstances which produced great acrimony and irritation. The former Administration was displaced by what looked like a Court intrigue, and the Parliament, while still young, was sent back to its constituents. Sir Robert Peel was free from any participation in any intrigue, for he was absent from England at the time; but still he was installed Minister under odious and objectionable circumstances, and he was obliged to meet, with balanced parties, a hostile Parliament and enraged rivals. The noble Lord the Member for London was engaged to operate in that case; and the noble Lord has never been backward in exhibiting what we will call a well-regulated party feeling. The noble Lord had reason to be angry on that occasion, for he may almost be said to have had a personal outrage inflicted on him. He was supported by a party in this House, who were thirsting for vengeance; and if anything could have justified such a course, the noble Lord would have been justified in moving such a Resolution as that which has been proposed by the hon. and learned Member for Wolverhampton. He might have said that a Reform Administration had been displaced by an anti-reform one, and he might have called upon the House to declare that the Reform Act was a wise, just, and beneficial measure. The noble Lord, however, did nothing of the kind. Now what are the circumstances of the present moment? Has a Free-trade Ministry been supplanted by a Protectionist intrigue? Quite the contrary: the Government of the noble Lord fell to pieces from internal dissensions. The noble Lord went out of office; he was not turned out; and instead of our having come into power through Court intrigue, the noble Lord is really responsible—in the most constitutional manner—for our official existence. Since we have been a Government, we have had to make pledges to Parliament and the country. We have fulfilled all our pledges but one. We pledged ourselves—notwithstanding what seemed to be a factious opposition—to carry those measures which we thought absolutely necessary for the country. We carried them, and they have been successful. We pledged ourselves to dissolve Parliament so soon as the public convenience would permit, in order that the opinion of the country might be ascertained on those questions which in the hon. Member's Resolutions are called “free trade” and “protection,” which decision should be final. We did dissolve Parliament, the opinion of the country was given, and we have bowed unreservedly to the decision. We pledged ourselves that there should be an autumn Session, in order that the House might have an opportunity of ascertaining the policy of the Government. The Parliament is now assembled for that purpose. I pledged myself, if an opportunity offered, to bring forward measures which I think the altered circumstances of the country require. Previous to my election I communicated frankly my views to my constituents by telling them, as I always have done, that the assimilation of our financial to our commercial system would ultimately prove the policy by which general contentment would be given to the country. I am ready to fulfil this last pledge; and the measures which the Government has prepared would have been brought forward but for this—I must call it—vexatious Motion. Those measures are founded on the assumption that unrestricted competition, or, to use the more popular phrase, free trade, is the principle of our commercial system. These measures have been concerted with my Colleagues, and have received their unanimous support, and there is no reason, except the hon. and learned Member's Motion, why I should not at this moment be offering them to the consideration of the House. In proceeding to discharge our duty as a Government, we are met by Resolutions which involve more important considerations than the fall of an Administration. You are about to establish a precedent which may destroy a Government—an affair which, perhaps, you may deem of as little moment as it appears to be thought by the hon. and learned Member for Wolverhampton; but you will establish a precedent that will destroy more than the one Government whose cause I am pleading before the House and the country to-night. How have we met these Resolutions? Seeing that I have announced my intention to make my financial statement only two nights hence, I might—and I am sure the feeling of the country, and perhaps of this House, would have supported me in doing so—have moved the previous question. I would not move it. I am satisfied that in giving our friends throughout the country an opportunity of vindicating their opinions in a constitutional manner, we have contributed to the permanent welfare and contentment of the country. I, for one, have received my reward, as all my Colleagues have done, in the assurances of our friends on this side of the House, and throughout the country, that they feel we have done for them all that men of honour could be called upon to do, and that the country having decided against their opinions, they are prepared to accept that altered policy which the circumstances of the times require.

Sir, the hon. and learned Member for Wolverhampton says that the duties of a Minister are merely nominal. I can only express a hope that if he is to be a member of the Government that is to be, he may not be disappointed as to the amount of toil he will have to undergo. I am sure he will not be disappointed in the assistance which he expects to receive from the permanent civil servants of this country. I am the last man to refrain from doing justice to the permanent civil servants of this country. Their devotion to the public service is, I think, one of the most beautiful features of our social system. They have not public fame, but they have the appreciation of those whom they support and assist. But, Sir, even with that support, I can unaffectedly say that the toil and responsibility which in these days devolve upon men holding office, could not be borne by any set of men who were not sustained by a feeling of self-respect and the fair confidence of Parliament. I say it for myself, and in the name and on behalf of my Colleagues, that we neither seek to be, nor will we be, Ministers on sufferance. We took upon ourselves the reins of Government without inquiring whether the late Parliament was hostile to our general policy or not; but we took them at the general desire of the House of Commons and of the country. We met the difficulties of our position fairly, and administered the Government of the country to the best of our ability, applying ourselves diligently and assiduously to the affairs that were brought under our consideration till such time as there had been an appeal to the country. But whatever were the exigencies of the case then, in the old Parliament, we neither desire nor will we submit in the new to carry on the Government under any indulgence which is foreign to the spirit of the British constitution.

Sir, I believe I have now said all that is necessary for me to address to the House, and I am content here to leave the case of the Government. I have placed before the House, very imperfectly I can easily conceive, the whole of that case. The subject is somewhat large, and I have endeavoured to be as succinct as circumstances required and would allow. If I had only personal feelings to consider, I should sit down; but I think, without vanity, and speaking in the name of the Government, that there is, in the circumstances in which we find ourselves placed, a sense of duty which may justify us in looking beyond personal considerations. We believe that we have a policy which will conduce to the welfare, content, and prosperity of the country. I hope it is not an unworthy ambition to desire to have an opportunity of submitting that policy to Parliament. But I am told that that is not to be the case. Now, although I have too much respect for this House to condescend to advocate the cause of a Government, yet I will say something on behalf of a policy. I will not, therefore, without a struggle, consent to yield to an attack so unfair as that to which we are subjected. I will not believe, remembering that this is a new Parliament, that those who have entered it for the first time have already, in their consciences, recorded their opinions. On the contrary, I believe that they will listen to the spirit and to the justice of the plea which I put before them to-night. It is to those new Members—a third of the House—on whichever side of the House they may sit, that I appeal with confidence. They have just entered, many of them after much longing, upon that scene to which they have looked forward with so much earnestness, suspense, and interest. I doubt not they are animated with a noble ambition, and that many of them will hereafter realise their loftiest aspirations. I can only say, from the bottom of my heart, that I wish that, on whatever benches they may sit, their most sanguine hopes may not be disappointed. Whatever adds to the intelligence, eloquence, and knowledge of the House, adds also to its aggregate influence; and the interests of all are bound up in cherishing and maintaining the moral and intellectual predominance of the House of Commons. To those new Members, therefore, I now appeal. I appeal to the generous and the young. And I ask them to pause now that they are at last arrived on the threshold of the Senate of their country, and not become the tools and the victims of exhausted factions and obsolete politics. I move the following Amendment:—

“To leave out from the word ‘That’ to the end of the Question, in order to add the words ‘this House acknowledges, with satisfaction, that the cheapness of provisions, occasioned by recent Legislation, has mainly contributed to improve the condition and increase the comforts of the Working Classes; and that unrestricted competition having been adopted, after due deliberation, as the principle of our Commercial System, this House is of opinion that it is the duty of the Government unreservedly to adhere to that policy in those measures of Financial and Administrative Reform which, under the circumstances of the Country, they may deem it their duty to introduce,’ instead thereof.”

MR. BRIGHT: Sir, I have listened with that interest in which the whole House has joined to the speech of the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer, and I expected when he rose that he would have made at least some attempt to answer the speech of my hon. Friend the Member for Wolverhampton (Mr. C. Villiers). I cannot conceive that the right hon. Gentleman lost sight unintentionally of the point of my hon. Friend's speech, and of the real question now in dispute between the Government and my hon. Friend. If the right hon. Gentleman avoided entering into the question which has been introduced to the notice of the House, I may at least be justified, I think, in avoiding a large portion of his speech. I shall, therefore, in the first place, call attention to only one or two points which the right hon. Gentleman urged. The right hon. Gentleman wished to make it appear that he was now a member of a Free Trade Government, and that he acted with the Free Trade party, and yet repeatedly during his speech, and within six sentences of its conclusion, he spoke of the body with which he was now associated as still the Protectionist party. The right hon. Gentleman said, moreover, that he took no steps in the direction of unsettling the settlement of 1846 since that period. The right hon. Gentleman seemed to forget that in 1850 he voted in favour of a Resolution to the following effect:—

“That the whole House resolve itself into Committee of the whole House, for the purpose of taking into consideration the Acts relating to the importation of Foreign Corn.”

This was a Motion made by a Gentleman who was not now a Member of the House, but one whom the right hon. Gentleman seduced from this side of the House by speaking of what he would do for the farmers, and by promises which have not been fulfilled—I allude to the late Member for West Gloucestershire (Mr. Grantley Berkeley). More than that, the right hon.

Gentleman endeavoured to persuade the House that with regard to sugar and shipping he was as blameless as on the question of corn, and that if any one was culpable at all in regard to sugar, no one was more so than the noble Lord the head of the late Government. But the right hon. Gentleman seemed to forget that his right hon. Colleague the Secretary for the Colonies (Sir J. Pakington) incessantly endeavoured to unsettle the first settlement of that question in 1847. The right hon. Gentleman also appeared to forget—or else sought to conceal from the House, that another of his right hon. Colleagues, whom I see opposite, the right hon. Gentleman the Governor of our Indian possessions—[Laughter.] I speak advisedly when I say Governor, for I recollect that a predecessor of the right hon. Gentleman, Sir John Hobhouse, now Lord Broughton, when President of the Board of Control, admitted, in answer to a question of mine in Committee, that he was the Ruler of India, and that he was responsible for its Government. The right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Herries) gave notice of a Motion respecting the Navigation Laws; he felt, I believe, the insecurity of his position, and, necessitated by the successive taunts of the hon. Member for Stoke-upon-Trent (Mr. J. L. Ricardo), he was induced to bring forward his Motion; but he was so disconcerted at the reception it met with, that he did not ask the House to go to a division. The right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer, following in his usual adroit manner, fixed upon the conduct of the noble Lord (Lord J. Russell) and two or three of his colleagues, in order to divert attention from the real subject at issue. I am afraid that the noble Lord and some of his colleagues have been too long in this House to be perfectly consistent. But I could show the House that, however bad may have been the course of the noble Lord, that of the right hon. Gentleman was not a bit better. But I will not enter upon these questions now, for that before the House is too important in the eyes of the country to be disposed of by recriminations between the members of the late and the present Government. My hon. Friend (Mr. C. Villiers) could with perfect honesty say that he could not be actuated by factious motives in bringing this subject forward, for he brought it forward fifteen years ago, and probably no public man suffered more in his political associations and prospects than my hon.

Friend suffered, by his undeviating advocacy of what to him at least seemed a great and sacred question. My hon. Friend is therefore precisely the man to bring this question forward; and every person must admit that he is harmonious in the position he occupies to-night, when measured by the position which he always occupied on this question. The Government were asked last February and March what course they intended to pursue; and the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer said he meant to appeal to the country. Well, the country has been appealed to, and the right hon. Gentleman has given us to understand that the Government had not done much to promote the cause of protection in the country. They did not do so to much extent in the boroughs, but they did so most assiduously in the counties, and if the House would give me its attention, I could show that there is scarcely a single county in which the electors did not vote almost exclusively on the protectionist principle. The Resolutions before the House are submitted for our deliberate consideration, and while I am ready to admit that that of the right hon. Gentleman is far in advance of any proposition which he ever made to this House in any part of his former political career, that of my hon. Friend (Mr. C. Villiers) involves something which, though it may be inconvenient to the party opposite, contains that which is precisely for the interest of the country, and upon which, I will prove, the country expects we should come to a definitive decision. Suppose the two Resolutions to be placed before the country at the recent election—that of my hon. Friend, who declares the advantage which the country has derived from free-trade, but declares, especially of the measure of 1846, which established the free admission of foreign corn, that it was a “wise, just, and beneficial” one, and that of the right hon. Gentleman—if the whole country, man, woman and child, were polled with respect to that particular passage of the Resolution, would there not be an enormous and overwhelming majority—a majority of nine to one throughout the whole country, in favour of the Resolution of my hon. Friend? Does the right hon. Gentleman think that the hon. Member for Macclesfield (Mr. E. C. Egerton), who seconded the Address, would sit for that free-trade borough unless he admitted that the Act of 1846 was a wise, just, and beneficial measure. The Parliament of 1846 was of opinion that it was a wise, just, and beneficial measure. Is there any Member who voted for that Bill in 1846, the noble Lord the Member for Tiverton (Viscount Palmerston), or any other, who did not, and does not, believe that, under all circumstances, the measure was a wise, just, and beneficial measure. And if there were any who had doubts then, is it possible, after the experience of the last six years, that they could have any doubt at present? The Parliament of 1847 came to the same conclusion as the Parliament of 1846, and during the whole course of its existence it resisted the unsettling of that just, wise, and beneficial measure. And now the Parliament of 1852, called together under a Protectionist Government—for Protectionist they were when they went to the hustings, whatever they are now—this present Parliament, as admitted by the right hon. Gentleman himself, has decided that the result of our recent legislation has been beneficial to the great bulk of the working classes of the country. Now, when Parliament is going to pronounce its final verdict on the question of free trade, I should have thought that my hon. Friend (Mr. C. Villiers), who for fifteen years has been the consistent leader of the free-trade question in Parliament, should be the person to draw up the terms of that verdict, and not one like the right hon. Gentleman, who had been a Protectionist during the whole period of his career. Some persons say—I speak rather of what is said in private—that the Resolutions are much the same, and that it is only a dispute about words. Well, if it is only a dispute about the words to be adopted, if feelings are to be consulted, if claims are to be considered and advice to be taken, surely the advice and recommendation of the long-devoted Friend of the question should be taken in preference to those of the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer. But the words of the two Resolutions are not the same: the principles are not the same; the cause, the intent, the whole matter is not the same, and I will show the House wherein they differ. The Resolution of my hon. Friend establishes a principle: that of the right hon. Gentleman merely a fact. The one proclaims the benefit of free-trade to the whole country and the whole world, and says that our experience must make us appreciate it more and more: the other leaves everything to hazard; it refers to certain injustice to be righted, to certain interests to be compensated to any amount which Parliament may be induced to give. The right hon. Gentleman must not suppose that the House is so exceedingly simple as to think that he, penitent though now he appears to be, is a man to be wholly trusted on this occasion. Hon. Gentlemen opposite, who have had so much experience of the right hon. Gentleman, may trust him; but we cannot do so without stipulations and conditions. Let us go back to the year 1846; six years are not so long past that we cannot remember what he said on these benches and out of this House. The right hon. Gentleman spoke of the audacity of the noble Lord (Lord John Russell); but the right hon. Gentleman has audacity to say that he and his party recommended the farmers not to endeavour to unsettle the Act of 1846, and that they tried to put down the clamorous complaints of the farmers, as the question of the labourers was the only one involved in the matter. I must say, if ever a statement made by a Minister of the Crown gave a more incorrect statement of fact than another, I think that this statement is the one. Why, do we not recollect the speeches which they made by dozens all over the country before the farmers—do we not recollect the deputations to the Earl of Derby—do we not recollect the excited feelings with which the simple farmers were sent back to their towns and counties? I was never more amused in my life than when I was reading the answer of the right hon. Gentleman to the deputation that came to see him, because it was of that nature that I defy twenty or even fifty farmers to make head or tail of it. The right hon. Gentleman sought to defend himself by referring to the conduct of Sir Robert Peel in 1835. When one quotes a precedent, there ought at least to be some analogy between the cases. Did Sir Robert Peel, from 1832 to 1835, employ himself in this House, or did his followers employ themselves in the country, in proving that the Reform Bill was destructive of the British constitution—and that it was absolutely necessary for him and them to take the first opportunity of appealing to the country to undo that Act? If Sir Robert Peel did this when he came back from Italy, the very first proposition that would have been laid before the House would have been a Resolution bearing to the Reform Bill precisely that relation which the Motion now before the House bears to the Corn Law repeal. There were other precedents which the right hon. Gentleman has attempted to set up of the same character, which I will not refer to; but there is one point which the right hon. Gentleman has constantly asserted in this House which it is necessary to notice, and here I cannot help observing how amazing it is that whatever assertions the right hon. Gentleman makes—however untrue they may be—they are speedily taken up and circulated throughout the country. The right hon. Gentleman and his party constantly endeavoured to make it appear, either that the Corn Law was originally granted to the landlords to compensate them for the special burdens which were imposed upon them in the taxation of the country; or otherwise it was for the purpose of preparing the landlords to endure some special burdens which the enactment of the Corn Law would enable them to bear. Nothing, in fact, was too silly, and nothing too unlikely, that the Government did not offer, and the landlords greedily feed upon, at the hustings. But neither the right hon. Gentleman nor any of his friends ever offered one single fact, figure, or quotation in proof of the statement which he made. I do not recollect ever having found in the debate of 1815 on the Corn Laws one single word that led to the conclusion that the Corn Law was then granted to the landowners to compensate them for any exclusive burdens that they bore. I have never heard since even of any Chancellor of the Exchequer imposing any tax upon the landed portion of the community for the burdens they had to endure, or that the landed interest was well able to bear all their share of the taxation because they had the protection of the Corn Laws. Now, with regard to that point, I will just for a moment lay two or three figures before the House, not, however, that I wish to trouble them with any lengthened statistics on this occasion, for we have got far beyond the statistics of this question, except those of the division which the House is to come to at the close of the present discussion. Well, then, from 1801 to 1815, a period when this country was fighting against French principles, the taxes imposed—I take my figures from the Progress of the Nation, the work of my late lamented friend Mr. Porter, were 13,500,000*l.*; but it is not to be seen at all from any records that we have that any of these taxes were especially laid upon land. The amount of Customs duties was 7,381,000*l.*, the Excise 10,702,000*l.*, the Stamps 1,104,000*l.*, which included the Probate and Legacy Duty, which certainly was not a duty upon land or real property. The other taxes, including the Income Tax and the Post Office revenue, made the total amount to 31,538,000*l.* Coming down to 1816 I see how far these taxes were repealed, and I find that of Customs there were 52,000*l.* repealed. Excise, 2,863,000*l.*, and of other taxes, 14,631,000*l.*, making a total of 17,546,000*l.* Now no man can show me from these accounts—and I can go more into detail if it is necessary—that any single tax was laid upon land or on the landowner as a landowner; but if he examine them properly, he will find that all interests were included in the imposition of these taxes, and that none were excluded from the benefits which may have resulted from the repealing of taxation. To a certain extent all were gainers, and none were excluded. From this enumeration I exclude the Probate and Legacy duties, which stand by themselves. I come next to the question of the poor-rate, which the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer has referred to, and I find that from 1812 to 1813 the average poor-rate of the year, calculated by the two preceding years, was 8,688,000*l.*; whereas in 1843 and 1844 the average poor-rate was only 6,878,000*l.*; so that, in point of fact, in 1843 and 1844 the average poor-rates of this country were less by 1,810,000*l.* than they were in 1812–13. And then, if we take also the enormous increase in property since that period, and the value of land, and the accumulation of railways, we shall find that the poor-rates comparatively are an insignificant burden upon land. In fact, they are not half the burden on the landowner or the farmer that they were in 1812–13. With regard to the Legacy and Probate Duty, I regret the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer is not here, but I see the right hon. Secretary for the Home Department in his place, and no doubt he is fully cognisant of the changes which he proposes to make with regard to the Legacy and Probate Duty. I find that it has been charged from 1797 to 1845 upon more than 1,339,000,000*l.* of personal property; whereas the whole of the land that is freehold land, which is the character of most of the land in this country, has been entirely free from this charge. The Probate and Legacy Duty during the period up to 1845, that is, forty-nine years, was upwards of 71,000,000*l.*; and bear in mind that when that measure was first brought in, Mr. Pitt intended that it should cover all property; but the great landowners in this House at the time had sufficient strength and influence to induce the House to reject that portion of the measure which related to real property. But I will not go into further statistics upon that branch of the question; suffice it to say that if there was no pretence of the nature I have suggested for the Corn Laws in 1815, there has been none since, nor is there any at the moment at which I am speaking. It was, in fact, the law of the strong carried against the weak; it was a wicked and cruel law, as my hon. Friend the Member for Wolverhampton has repeatedly shown. And that was its characteristic from the hour when it received the Royal Assent down to the hour when it was repealed. The right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer twits my hon. Friend (Mr. C. Villiers) about the extent of loss which the country has suffered in the reduced value of food which has taken place since the repeal of the Corn Laws; but, in answer to that, I will take leave to call the attention of the hon. Member for Cambridgeshire (Mr. E. Ball), who is the honest supporter of the principles of protection, to the statement I am now about to make. I have made inquiries—extensive inquiries—amongst families in different classes of society on the subject, and I find that the actual cost per head in each family of the article of flour, in all its various uses in a household, is about 10*d.* per week, which is about equal to 45*s.* per head per annum, which, for 22,000,000 of persons, gives something like 63,000,000*l.* sterling. Now, if the food of the people of the United Kingdom cost 60,000,000*l.*, with wheat at 40*s.* per quarter, with wheat at 60*s.* the cost must be 90,000,000*l.* But the right hon. Gentlemen thinks, no doubt, that the nation has taken all that difference from the farmer and the agricultural class, and if the same quantity were consumed now as before, of course the loss would fall on their shoulders; but seeing that a vast proportion of this extraordinary quantity of food is brought from abroad, and paid for by our manufactures, the 30,000,000*l.* can form no indication or measure of the loss which the agricultural class has sustained. Well, then, how is the balance made up, because I admit that the agricultural class has sustained a loss? We never pretended to deny that, but always said that it would be the one result of the repeal of the law. But if they have a loss, it is made up by increased production, by greatly improved cultivation, and extended markets for the sale of wool and animal food. They had also, like all the rest of the population, lighter burdens to bear and cheaper living, besides an enormous gain to all classes of our population who are consumers of agricultural produce at all. Now the Chancellor of the Exchequer admits fairly that the country has decided against him, and I think that every Gentleman on his side of the House will also admit that the country is decidedly with us. There is much unanimity both in and out of doors on the subject, notwithstanding that many objections are entertained on the other side of the House to free trade; but the free-trade majority in this House is but a faint and inadequate index of the free-trade majority that exists throughout the United Kingdom. My hon. Friend the Member for Wolverhampton submits a Motion which he considers to be wholly, entirely, and explicitly in confirmation of the decision of the country, while we believe that the Amendment of the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer is made with a reservation which may possibly involve us in hurtful and injurious consequences in the future. Therefore we propose the Resolution, and prefer it to the Amendment. Can any free-trader doubt for a moment whether, with the interest of free trade—because that is the matter before us—it is not for the advantage of the country that the House should agree to the Resolution rather than the Amendment? Can any one, I say, who is a free-trader, conscientiously doubt which it is proper to do? But if any man does doubt, let him just turn for a moment to the course taken by the supporters of the Government on a recent occasion when they were before the country. I am disposed now for a moment or two to ask the attention of the House to the opinion expressed in July last, when the conclusion of the elections was not so apparent as it is now. What were the opinions of hon. Members opposite, as well as Members of Her Majesty's Government, then? Now, there is a Gentleman just come into this House to whom I can refer. I have not the pleasure of his acquaintance, but he bears the name of a noble Lord who was the leader of the Protectionist party after the break-up of the Peel Administration in 1846. I have often wondered during the last few days what would have been the course Lord George Bentinck would have taken if he had been alive to see what we look upon to-night. I think I know the course he would have taken when beaten by facts, when the case was closed against him. I think he would fairly have admitted his defeat, and I think he would have said what we did to Sir Robert Peel after the heavy charge which we brought against him, namely, that if the repeal of the Corn Laws was necessary, he was not the man who ought to carry it—"We are not the persons who ought now to be entrusted with the guardianship of free trade, or to undertake the further extension of that policy." That, I think, would have been far more satisfactory to the country than the position you are now taking up of sticking pertinaciously to office. ["Oh, oh!"] Hon. Gentlemen opposite cry "Oh, oh." Well, then, I will withdraw that expression, and recall to their recollection what fell from the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer. He told us that he did not mean to give up place. Now my opinion is, Lord George Bentinck would have said, "No, if we still hold our former opinions, we had better give up place, and go into opposition, where, at any rate, there can be no imputations thrown out against our motives." To revert now to the opinions of the supporters of the Government, the hon. Member for West Norfolk (Mr. Bentinck) is reported to have said, that "he believed it was impossible that a free-trade policy could ever be carried out in this country, and he would do his utmost to have that policy reversed." I am reporting from the paper that came into possession of the Queen's Speech so mysteriously—I refer to the Morning Herald, which is considered often obscure, and at the best of times not over-distinct, or easily to be comprehended. The hon. Member for North Warwickshire (Mr. Newdegate) speaking at Coleshill, on the declaration of the poll, avowed himself—

"To be as much a protectionist as ever, and he was satisfied that if Lord Derby saw that it could be easily attempted, protection would be restored in its old form; or if it could not, Lord Derby would retain office to improve the position of the farmer."

Now, that formed precisely the reservation in the Amendment of the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer, which is to be feared at the present time. At the South Warwickshire election, one of the present Members (Lord Brooke) speaking at the nomination, said—

"His own opinion remained unchanged upon the question of free trade, and he thought the changes which Sir Robert Peel made in our commercial policy had been most injurious to the interest of the country."

The hon. Member for West Norfolk (Mr. Bagge), pledged himself at the election—

"To support Lord Derby's Government believing that the noble Lord was disposed to assist the agricultural interests against the inroads of free trade."

The hon. Member for West Sussex (Mr. Prime) said—

"It appears to me that free trade is only calculated to diminish the employment of every trade and profession. All the working classes are suffering from it, and the manufacturers and shopkeepers are endeavouring to meet the falling-off in their profits by extending their trade."

The hon. Member for Cambridgeshire (Mr. Yorke), said nothing more than what I expected from him. He is an independent gentleman, and I am sure he will honestly carry through, if he can, the opinions which he entertains. He expressed his—

"determined adhesion to the principles of Protection, and his surprise at being called upon to renounce those principles on the ground that they were untenable. It might just as well be asked of a man enclosed in an iron cage to give up his notions of liberty; but he should retain his opinion, and take the first opportunity that occurred of recording it in favour of Protection."

Another of the hon. Members for Cambridgeshire (Lord G. Manners), the brother of the noble Lord at the head of the Woods and Forests, expressed "his determined intention to support the Government of Lord Derby, believing that the noble Lord would remedy the hasty and inconsiderate legislation of 1846." The hon. Member for North Lincolnshire (Mr. Stanhope), said—

"He wished to protect not only the farmer, but the British labourer, against excessive foreign competition." "If they disagreed with him on the subject of a 5s. duty on wheat, why should they not have a sufficient duty on oats, barley, and beans, which would enable them to sell their wheat at a cheap rate to the consumer?" "They who voted for the repeal of the Corn Laws were Destructives. He alluded to the deadly enemy of the agriculturist—Graham, and Cobden and Bright coupled with him."

I now come to the third Member for Cambridgeshire (Mr. E. Ball). He is reported to have said, "The more he thought over the matter, the more he was convinced that free trade was one of the greatest curses that ever befell this country." I hope the hon. Member is of the same opinion

yet. [Mr. E. BALL: Quite so.] I do not find fault with the hon. Member, because he has repeated the same opinion in this House with great fairness, and pursued a straightforward honest course. The hon. Gentleman is not in office, he holds no employment under Government, he is not a privy councillor, nor does he hold any political position in connexion with the Ministry, and therefore he has nothing whatsoever to gain by changing his views or tactics. He therefore presents to us what I cannot help feeling to be the mistaken opinions of the farmers of Cambridgeshire. He is one of those in this House who treats them with no duplicity, but says precisely what he means, and does the best for them that he can. The hon. Member for Hertfordshire (Mr. Halsey), at the last election, declared "that he had not in the slightest degree changed his opinion as to the policy or impolicy of free trade." The noble Lord the Member for South Lincolnshire (Lord Burleigh), said that "in his opinion the Bill of 1846 not only remained, but was actually strengthened by experience." He then gave to the simple farmers half a column of statistics about ships, colonies, and sugar, and something about corn, and then, no doubt, excited by the triumphant nature of his own efforts, he exclaimed, "Surely these facts were enough to make him adhere to his resolute opposition to free trade;" and the noble Lord concluded his address by "denying the assertion that free trade had produced happiness to the people." The House will perceive that I am endeavouring to show how anxious the free-traders opposite are to carry out the principles of unrestricted competition. Well, but it is only fair that we should know what these Gentlemen were when they were supposed to be speaking to their constituents with openhearted frankness; and to proceed, I may mention that the noble Lord the Member for North Leicestershire (the Marquess of Granby), declared that "he would ride the horse of protection as long he was fit to go out with." The right hon. Gentlemen who now form the Government entertain a contrary notion, for their opinion seems to have been that they would ride the horse of protection only so long as he was fit to get "in" with. But to return to the noble Marquess, who told his constituents that "when the noble steed was not 'fit,' he would take the beast of burden as far as he would carry him." The hon. Member for South Northamptonshire (Captain Vyse) said—

Mr. Bright

"If again sent to Parliament, he would support the present Government, which he believed to be Conservative, Protective, and Protestant. Lord Derby had said that the best and easiest way to relieve the agricultural distress was to reimpose a moderate fixed duty on corn; but he said, if the country was against it, although he retained that opinion, he would endeavour to afford that relief in another shape."

That is precisely what is meant by the Amendment. The hon. Member for South Northamptonshire (Mr. Knightley) said—

"Attempts had been made to sow dissension among them by stating that Lord Derby had abandoned Protection and had deceived them. He had said, what he had always said, that, if he could, he would restore Protection. If he could not do that, he would give an equivalent in some other way."

The noble Lord the Member for East Gloucestershire (the Marquess of Worcester)—

"admitted that the feeling of the country was favourable to the continuance of free trade, but he should go to Parliament determined to support Lord Derby by every means in his power, as he was convinced Lord Derby would propose a reduction of taxation in favour of agriculture."

The hon. Member for Huntingdonshire (Mr. Fellowes), gave them a series of statistics to show that the poor-rates had increased in a greater ratio than the income tax, and concluded with the remarkable statement, "that the labourer would be better off with the quarter loaf at 6d. than 5d." with this remarkable proviso, "if he had a wife and four children." Another Member for the same county (Viscount Mandeville) said—

"he was still as strongly as ever in favour of protection, although the country was opposed to it, and he looked to the present Administration for such measures of relief as would enable agriculture to meet the altered circumstances."

Now, the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for the Home Department made a speech which I think more blameable in him than it would have been in any other Member of this House. I read the speech of the right hon. Gentleman carefully, and I was obliged to turn back to the head of the page to see whether it was the right hon. Gentleman that had been speaking, as I did not think he would have been guilty of so much inaccuracy. Indeed, I cannot up to this moment bring myself to believe that he did intentionally and designedly mistake the case. But he appears to have made a very curious division in his speech, which suited his own position admirably. He approves of everything that

Sir Robert Peel did from 1842 to 1846. I believe he did give his vote against the hon. Gentleman the Member for Somersetshire's Motion, relating to long and short hours.

MR. WALPOLE: I was not in the House when it was made.

MR. BRIGHT: But the right hon. Gentleman approved by his speech, to which I am now referring, of the policy of 1846, and then the right hon. Gentleman came down to the spring of 1846, which is the epoch of that particular Act which we are now discussing. The right hon. Gentleman disapproves of the subsequent policy of Sir Robert Peel, and then went on to speak of the local taxation upon land. He seemed to think "the local taxation left on land was 15,000,000*l.*, and that crime and pauperism had diminished from 1842 to 1846, while from 1846 to 1849 there had been an increase of crime and pauperism." It is an exaggeration of the statement of his Colleague, who placed local taxation only at 12,000,000*l.*; but really with some hon. Gentlemen a difference of two or three millions seems of no consequence. The right hon. Gentleman went on to show that pauperism and crime increased under a low price of corn. If he had looked at the returns, he would have found that in 1836 the commitments in England and Wales were not more than about 23,000, and that they rose by 1842 to considerably more than 30,000; and then from 1842, when we had a succession of good harvests, down to 1846—the same results were produced to the country which free trade had made perpetual, and the commitments fell off. Why, this is an argument which I used over and over again previous to 1846. The mere erasure of a Corn Law from the Statute-book of this country could be of no value. If you could always have an abundant supply of food; if there were no obstruction to the purchase of food; if the world's price were the market price of England, then the mere existence of an Act with certain words in it could make no difference to the country; and if the famine of 1846 and 1847 had not occurred, the condition of this country might have continued what it was previously. And I say that the right hon. Gentleman, occupying the position which he did, with the authority of so high an office to support him, had no right to present these statistics to his audience at Midhurst, unless he were honestly satisfied that they bore on the case that he was discussing; but he concluded, by arguing that the farmers were entitled to some equivalent for the advantages of which they had been deprived, and for burdens continued. Now there is a Gentleman in this House—I don't know whether he is in his place—I mean the hon. Member for North Essex (Sir J. Tyrell). [Here Sir J. Tyrell came forward and took his seat in a more prominent position.] I ought to apologise for rousing the hon. Baronet from his slumbers, and to compliment him on his admirable temperament, seeing that he can slumber on such an occasion as this. The hon. Baronet said, at the nomination for North Essex—

"All he asked for farmers was fair play," which is precisely what we always ask from them too—and an alleviation of their burdens. That was a relief which Lord Derby wished to carry out. He, for one, treated with sovereign contempt the insinuation that the old and tried friends of the agriculturists should be regarded as impostors. He said if they were impostors, it was clear that Mr. Lennard—[who, he (Mr. Bright) supposed was the hon. Member's rival]—was an impostor also."

The hon. Member for Rutlandshire (Mr. Noel) said—

"With regard to free trade, his opinions were unchanged; he was still a protectionist; he had always advocated a moderate duty on foreign corn, believing that a moderate duty would benefit the farmer without materially raising the price of bread."

The hon. Member for East Sussex (Mr. Frewen), was remarkably definite in his explanation. He said, at his nomination, that he "certainly was most decidedly in favour of protection;" and on the question being put to him, "Will you bring it forward in the House of Commons?" he answered—

"If no other man of greater ability would bring it forward, he would. He would do his best to get a Member of greater ability than himself to bring the question forward, and he certainly would give it his cordial support; he was not going to change his opinions."

I come now to a borough Member, the hon. Member for Wareham (Mr. Drax). This, I should observe, is a very peculiar borough, and I hope the noble Lord the Member for the city of London (Lord J. Russell) will take care to include it in any measure which he may bring forward for the reform of the representation. The hon. Member himself and his friends, have, I believe, entirely swamped the constituency by creating votes of a character to which independence cannot possibly belong; and if he had had an independent constituency to deal with, he would certainly not have made the observations which I am now about to read. He said—

“He felt great pleasure in congratulating them on the fact that protection was not dead. ‘You have heard me say years ago,’ he continued, ‘that I could never countenance free trade; I never was a free-trader, but a free supporter of native industry.’ And then he concluded with this remarkable statement, ‘It may suit some to advocate free trade, but those who do so are of the Manchester school.’”

Well, now, I come to a Gentleman who, I am afraid, is not in the House—I mean the hon. and gallant Member for Lincoln (Colonel Sibthorp) one of those who hold opinions on this subject which are said to be unchangeable. He avowed himself “a staunch protectionist of native industry;” and he said he would not go to the Crystal Palace because he thought that it was encouraging foreigners to the prejudice of our own countrymen. “He would not have gone there,” he added, “if anybody would have given him 100*l.* to do so.” I now come to a young Member of the House, who is at the same time old in subtle tactics—the hon. Member for Walsingham (Mr. Malins). He said—

“The 4*lb.* loaf cost 5*d.*, he wanted to make it but a penny more; then the farmers might live, and it was much better to have little with a smiling face, than a great deal with the ruin of those who were connected with agriculture; it was better for lawyers to have little with a smiling face, than for all those who were unfortunately driven into a course of litigation to be ruined.”

In all the examples I have yet given, I have, with one exception, that of the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for the Home Department, left untouched the declarations of Members of the Ministry; and to those I will now turn. At the nomination at Kirkwall, the Lord Advocate said—

“Let this be understood, that I am for free trade on just and equitable principles; and free trade without reciprocity is nothing more nor less than political suicide.”

Well, now I come to another case—the case of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for North Lincolnshire (Mr. Christopher). I have a book here which I have no doubt he has seen with great approbation. I do not know whether he is present; he was very much concealed behind Mr. Speaker's chair in the early part of the evening, and perhaps he is not present now, but I believe his Colleague is here. Here [holding up a book] is a published book called the Poll Book of the North

Lincolnshire Election. There is a circle upon it, and in this circle the words “Glorious Protection Triumph, 1852.”

On the title-page there is a shield, and, though I am not versed in heraldry, I can perceive as far as I can make out within the shield portraits of three donkeys. The book is dedicated to the tenant-farmers and yeomen of Lincolnshire. It contains a narrative of the election, which is “commented upon,” as is stated, “in a conservative and protectionist spirit.” There are also a number of pieces of poetry, and the writer says, “It is remarkable that the waggy all proceeds from the conservative party, the free-traders of Lincolnshire having no spirit left.” I will now read a few extracts from the remarks of the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Christopher), and I am very sorry he is not here. He said—

“He valued his own independence; he did not undervalue the high position he held in Her Majesty's councils, and he despised the man who did undervalue it; but at the same time he would never sacrifice his own independent principles, or the principles which he believed animated the district of which he was the representative. He held, in common with the Government, the same principles as he did in opposition, and he should do his utmost to give effect to those principles on every occasion on which he addressed the electors of that division of the county; on every occasion on which he addressed the House of Commons. He had invariably maintained the right of protection to native industry, and he never intended to deceive them.” “A plain question,” he said, “would be put to the electors, and that question was, whether they would return a sufficient number of representatives to enable the Government to alter and revise the existing policy.”

He then went on to say, as if to show how entirely unchanged his opinions were, and that he held all the worst doctrines of the very worst school of protection—

“He held it to be a safe principle, in general terms, that they ought to levy from the foreigner, in the shape of customs duties, as large a portion of revenue as they possibly could, without interfering with the comforts of the people, by which means the foreigner would be made to contribute to the taxation of the country, and native industry would to that extent be protected.” “Those,” he added, “were the broad principles on which he thought the policy of this country ought to be based.”

But, now, here is the point which I think he ought to consider, with reference to his own position. He said—

“He never had deserted his professions, and he never should desert them; and if, from any cause, he felt it necessary to desert them, he would take the first opportunity of resigning his seat into their hands, so as to enable them to elect some one more worthy of their confidence.”

In his address he said—

“The question of protection will be decided at the next general election. From that decision there can be no appeal. To abandon you at such a crisis would be a base dereliction of the public duty.”

So far, then, for that Member of the Government. There is one other case to which I wish to call the attention of the House; in fact, I think there are two. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Dorsetshire (Mr. Bankes) said—

“With regard to British labour and British industry in general, he should pursue the same course as he had taken hitherto, provided the different constituencies of the Kingdom would empower him to do so; he would give to British industry every protection to which he thought it so fairly entitled.”

So there is no change in the opinions of that right hon. Gentleman. There is another hon. Member—an hon. and learned Gentleman (Sir F. Kelly) whom I see in his place. I think it fortunate for him that he is a lawyer, because, whatever the reason may be, I fancy the House does allow to lawyers rather more latitude than it concedes to the unlearned. It is, however, a very bad system, and it tends, I think, to produce a very corrupt morality. The hon. and learned Gentleman, long experienced in Parliamentary and public affairs, in addressing some thousands of the constituency of East Suffolk, says—

“The question is, whether you will, by your representatives in Parliament, and by the power with which the constitution has invested you, support and advance what is called the doctrine of free trade in this country, or whether you are satisfied that it has already done enough of evil, and are ready to withstand its further progress, or at least its progress in the same direction, with all the powers which the constitution has enabled you to confer on your representatives in Parliament.”

And then he says, after speaking of the measures of Sir Robert Peel—for it is curious how these things are done—they might have been concocted beforehand at a Cabinet meeting, for they all agree with free trade up to 1846, and dissent from it after 1846—he says—

“When I come to the last, and I lament to say the crowning act of Sir Robert Peel, when I come to the repeal of the Corn Laws, it is there that I stop; it is there that I protest; it is there that I deny any substantial good; and I affirm that that measure was followed by unmitigated evil.”

It is a remarkable fact that the hon. and learned Gentleman was unable to foresee anything of this kind when he voted, as I understood he did, for the repeal of the Corn Law in 1846. He says—

“I here repeat without dread of contradiction that the effect of the free-trade legislation of 1846, and the great influx of corn into this country from abroad, was not to put one additional pound of bread per annum into the mouths of the people of this country.”

Why, the Suffolk farmers themselves cried out, “Oh, oh!” and laughed. The hon. and learned Gentleman said “I will prove it.” There is an opportunity for him on this occasion to prove the assertion which he then made. There is one other Member of the Government, respecting whom I wish to call the attention of the House to one or two observations which he made in that very remarkable borough where the farce of an election is periodically performed, I mean, the borough of Stamford. The right hon. Gentleman to whom I now refer (Mr. Herries), is a Member of the present Government, and I really think that, for the objects of this discussion, this passage is more important than any that I have read. He says—

“We have unfolded our views most fully; we desire to have protection to existing interests; and on looking at the elections, so far as they have gone, it is responded to from most parts of the country. Our side—that is, the protectionist side—“our side are already considerable gainers. Although we have lost sixteen seats, we are gainers of thirty-two seats in the boroughs already declared. In Liverpool the free-trade party have lost two of their ablest advocates, who have been replaced by two staunch protectionists.”

The hon. official Member (Mr. Mackenzie) for Liverpool has gone round the compass before on another question, and I have no doubt he will, from practice, have less difficulty in performing the evolution on this occasion than some of his colleagues. The right hon. Gentleman says further, after enumerating triumphs at Grantham, at Grimsby, at Boston, and at Lincoln, “We may willingly accept the challenge and abide the issue.” Why don’t you accept the challenge and abide the issue? Why don’t you, instead of losing character with your friends in the country—why don’t you, instead of destroying all reputation for morality when you have a seat on that bench—why don’t you, in a manly manner, fall in defence of those out of doors, who, though mistaken, have nevertheless trusted you with a fidelity that can never be exceeded? Come to this side of the House, clear off your old errors, and if there be any question on which you can displace those who succeed you, do it as factiously, as earnestly, and as speedily as you can. Now, my object in reading these extracts was to show that it is not quite so apparent as some hon. Members seem to imagine that we are all agreed on this question. I do not believe—whatever the right hon. Chancellor of the Exchequer may have said with regard to his own opinions upon the policy of the Government—I do not believe that his followers are free-traders; and, not being free-traders, how can they have any confidence in him if they are sincere, and he is sincere? Or how can we have confidence that you will guard the citadel of free trade, and carry out a free-trade policy for the future, when we know that three-fourths of those who keep you in office are as much opposed now as ever they were to the policy which we advocate? But there are other testimonies besides these extracts. I have here a circular which was sent to me the other day containing a long list of subscribers to a publication of an English translation of a speech of M. Thiers. It is dated November 2, 1852; therefore it is a very modern production. Now bear in mind that this is a speech of M. Thiers, one of the greatest speeches perhaps that he ever made, delivered last year in France in favour of protection. Now who are the subscribers? Let me observe that when a man subscribes only for himself, he generally limits his subscription to one copy. In this case the first subscriber is “The National Society for the Protection of British Industry,” 100 copies; the right hon. the Earl of Derby, 10 copies—remember this is since the Government came into office;—the right hon. the Earl of Malmesbury, 10 copies; the right hon. Mr. Walpole, 10 copies. The number increases in proportion to the audacity displayed in avowing protectionist opinions, and hence we find Sir FitzRoy Kelly down for 20 copies. Then, the rule being still consistently observed, we find the Marquess of Granby subscribing for 40 copies; and then, dropping down to the moderate state of the political thermometer, we perceive the hon. Member for North Warwickshire (Mr. Newdegate) subscribing for 20 copies; while the Chancellor of the Exchequer’s name is not amongst them at all. All these copies, however, are subscribed for. The work is a translation of a speech of M. Thiers, to be circulated amongst the manufacturing free-traders in this country. I have observed that here is the name of the Earl of Derby. I find these words: “To which translation has been added that of a note on Russian wheat;” and considering what that noble

Lord knew about Russian wheat a few years ago, I think almost any book that he could read on the subject would add to his information on that point. Well, now, after reading these statements to the House, I ask, can any man who honestly wishes that free trade should receive a final and approving verdict to-night—can any man of that kind doubt the wisdom of the course which my hon. Friend (Mr. C. Villiers) has taken? Shall we doubt on this question whether the Act of 1846 was a just, a wise, and a beneficial measure? Shall we allow any evasion? Shall we act in such a manner that the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer, who is a great master of words, and who, if there be a chink to get out at, is certain to escape, may hereafter say, “The House of Commons never pledged itself in any manner to that Act, so as to preclude itself from considering whether direct compensation should not be made to farmers and landowners in consideration of that Act having been passed?” Now I state distinctly that if any proposition were made in this House by any Government to impose one form of tax upon any other interest, whether less upon farmers or landowners or more, than upon other classes of the community, I have not a particle of sympathy for manufacturers as against farmers and landowners, that would induce me to support any inequality of taxation. I do not believe—I state it from my honest conscience—that there is anything so permanently dangerous to the institutions of a country, as for the Government to go about amongst various classes taxing here on one ground, excusing there on another, and observing an inequality out of which must necessarily grow a distrust of Government, and a contempt for the institutions under which the people live. I deny that we support this Motion from any feeling of factional opposition to the Government; on the contrary, whenever a proposition is brought forward by itself, having no reference to the law of 1846, I am sure that I am only speaking the general sentiments of Gentlemen on this side of the House when I say that we will give it fair and full consideration, and I trust a candid and honest judgment. But now we have something more to do, and it is not a question between the House and the Government. I, for one, would have nothing to do with this Motion, were it a mere Motion of faction. Oh, oh!”] No, I say that apart from protection and free trade, I would not have voted for a Motion of direct want of confidence against the Government. I am not one of those who would be ready to take such a course as that. We advocate a measure and a policy which we understand; but nobody can say of us that we have acted otherwise than consistently with the object for which we have been sent to the House of Commons, or that we have ever made ourselves the tools or servants of any party or Government. But then I want a final verdict on this question, a verdict delivered in terms not liable to be misunderstood, as were the terms of the right hon. Gentleman opposite. Yes, those terms were drawn up purposely to mislead, as was the paragraph in the Queen's Speech. On the other hand, suppose we pass the Resolution of my hon. Friend the Member for Wolverhampton. There is not a man in the United Kingdom who will not know that by it the Parliament have confirmed the Acts of 1846 and 1847, in compliance with the universal wish of the country. When you decide, also, that the Bill of 1846 was a wise and beneficial measure, your newspapers will carry your resolutions to all parts of the world; among others, to the United States, where a free-trade President has been lately returned by an overwhelming majority. The Protectionist party in the United States were in the same position as the Protectionist party were in here; but they did not give up the doctrine of protection, although they were beaten. Now, if Franklin Pierce should learn that this Parliament has given an irreversible verdict in favour of free trade, will not he be likely to promote for you that reciprocity for which you are so anxious? Don't you think that if this country, by supporting the Motion of my hon. Friend, shows that the advantages of free trade are universally appreciated, it may bring other nations round to the doctrine, and so much more will the free-trade policy be advantageous. Let us, then, put upon the books a Resolution that nobody can mistake, and it will have a good effect, not only throughout the United Kingdom, but in every civilised nation in which the subject is under discussion. I cannot help, before I sit down, addressing a few words to the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer, nor can I help contrasting the position of Sir Robert Peel in 1846, with the position which Lord Derby and his friends occupy now.

Sir Robert Peel was a man for whom, up to the time I got a seat in this House, I entertained the greatest aversion. But from the time he took office in 1842, I believe that this country never had a Minister who did more, and more honestly, for his country; and I think the line of conduct he adopted after he left office was calculated, if possible, to make his name more revered than his conduct as Minister. I believe there is not a man in this House who does not believe that Sir Robert Peel was honest. He had no inducements for what he did with a majority of ninety at his back. Finding himself irresistibly compelled to repeal the Corn Law by the justice of the case, he did repeal it, and in so doing exposed himself to an amount of vituperative attack and suspicion which I say no Member of this House would be justified in any like circumstances in inflicting on any other Member. But having repealed the law, Sir Robert Peel did not seek to retain office. Had he taken a selfish course and dissolved Parliament, he would have had a large majority in his favour, and no combination in this House could have turned him out. But his strong apprehensions of the state of things in Ireland, and the consequences that might happen there from a dissolution, made him take the course he did, and thus subject himself to the ignominious treatment he received—ignominious not to him, but to hon. Gentlemen opposite. He followed the course which he deemed just and expedient, and did not hesitate to submit himself to a political martyrdom for his conduct. What is the case with the Earl of Derby, about whose chivalry so much has been said? These are hollow phrases which are now very common, but we may have different notions as to their signification, and the Earl of Derby no doubt looks at the question from a different point of view from that which I occupy. But does it not appear that the noble Lord has clambered into office by holding principles in the country, which his right hon. Colleagues says he never held in this House? Do hon. Gentlemen mean to say that when Mr. Chowler was talking of the farmers having more horses than all the rest of the Kingdom, and being best able to ride them, and Mr. Ball was saying he would rather march on Manchester than Paris—we shall be very glad to see him when he comes, whether on horseback or on foot—does the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer mean to say that his party were not attempting to repeal the Act of 1846? Why, every one knows that your whole agitation for six years has been, the first part of the time calumny of Sir Robert Peel, and during the latter part demands for the protection you had lost, or for some compensation in place of it. I was surprised at the right hon. Gentleman, who is the Will-o'-the-Wisp of the party, when I heard him in his speech of this evening endeavouring to get them out of their difficulty. Why, there is not an agony or contortion the semblance of which he has not submitted to in endeavouring to submit the case of the distressed agriculturists to the House. The right hon. Gentleman objects to the words "just, wise and equitable," which I look upon as being the very pith of the Resolution. No man of sense imagines that Government will attempt to restore protection; but I believe it is for the good of the country, and the character of the House, that we should establish by a final decision to-night, that which was believed by the majority of 1846, namely, that the Act abolishing the duty on foreign corn was a just, a wise, and beneficial measure. I must call the attention of the House to the admissions made as to the prosperous condition of the labouring classes in all parts of the country. Look at their employment, how steady it is, and how satisfactory their wages. Look at their moral and social condition, and observe what tranquillity prevails all over the country. Is that no compensation to you, the holders of five, ten, and 20,000 acres? Is it no advantage to you, even if you had suffered pecuniarily—which, as a body, I believe you have not—but if you had, is it no compensation to you that you can enjoy, without the envy of any class, your high ancestral position—enjoy it without the consciousness that some poor wretch is suffering in order that you may be rich? If you look at it in that light, you will find in the condition of the labouring classes ample compensation for any injury which you suppose the repeal of the Corn Law may have inflicted on you. The right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer, on a recent occasion, I think, in Buckinghamshire—and I should advise him when next he goes there to be a little more careful, for the speeches of eminent men are reported, and what he states in Buckinghamshire he does not repeat elsewhere—charged the revived Anti-Corn Law League with being a Jacobin club. I do not know precisely what that means; but I believe it is looked upon as something rather unpleasant and inconvenient in a country. The right hon. Gentleman ought to have known better. He ought to have known that during the last six years he has not contributed a feather weight, while we, whom he vilifies, have contributed a great deal. Ten or twelve years of our political lives have been devoted to this one object, and although all men should revile us, we stand acquitted by our own consciences, believing that we have worked successfully for the good of our common country. I ask the House to sanction its own policy, to set its seal irrevocably on what it did in 1846, and by its vote of to-night to establish on a firm basis the charter of free industry to the people of this Kingdom.

MR. KER SEYMER said, he did not think it necessary to follow the observations of the hon. Gentleman who had just addressed the House. But he could not help thinking if the hon. Gentleman were anxious for a speedy solution of the question, he had taken a very curious mode of arriving at it. He (Mr. Seymer) had never heard a speech more calculated to provoke a long debate than that of the hon. Gentleman. He (Mr. Seymer) denied that hon. Gentlemen upon the Ministerial benches had, as a party, raised the question of protection. Individual Members of that party, feeling strongly for the sufferings of their constituents, certainly did raise that question. But the hon. Member for the West Riding (Mr. Cobden) used to say he would not meet these petty attacks upon free trade. He said "raise the question upon a specific Motion, and I will meet you." Well, when he (Mr. Seymer) and his friends raised the question of protection, and when the hon. Member for the West Riding met them by a free-trade Motion, he and his friends would do their best to answer the hon. Member. The question for the House was, whether the people were able to understand from the statements of the Ministry the course which would be taken with regard to our commercial policy? He contended that they were. But there was something peculiar in the atmosphere of the House of Commons. He had returned from breathing the pure air in the wilds of agricultural and Protectionist Dorsetshire. In that county there prevailed no political mists; neither were their hopes or fears excited for one party or the other.

They had been told by the Earl of Derby that it was his intention to appeal to the country, and that nothing but the possession of a majority would cause him to attempt to reverse the existing commercial policy. The noble Earl said the question was to be decided—not for ever, for that was absurd—but decided, for the present, by the result of the appeal to the country. On taking his seat in that House, he (Mr. Seymour) found a very different state of affairs. The hon. Member for Montrose (Mr. Hume) declared that the country was paralysed, and that too with the funds above par—in consequence of not knowing the intentions of Her Majesty's Ministers. How very strange that the country could not understand that which was perfectly intelligible to the minds of the Dorsetshire agriculturists. But the reason why the country and that House could not understand the declarations of Her Majesty's Ministers was very plain—it was because of the amount of party spirit by which they were in a great measure affected. It was because hon. Gentlemen sitting on the shady side of the House were anxious to cross to the Ministerial benches again; and if not able to eject the existing Ministry, at least to damage them as much as possible. Of course, after the declaration made by the hon. Mover of these Resolutions (Mr. C. Villiers), he absolved him from such an intention; but at the same time that hon. Gentleman brought forward a series of Resolutions to which it was quite impossible Her Majesty's Ministers could agree. He hoped, however, that the original free-trade champion would be beaten in that free-trade House of Commons; though, no doubt, that would be considered by the free-trade party as advancing the free-trade question. He maintained that the country had no sympathy with these party manœuvres. He was tired of the Whigs, and was anxious that Her Majesty's present Conservative Ministry should try their hands at those practical reforms which might be introduced consistently with the genius of the Constitution, and with which the Whigs had been trifling for the last five years. The noble Lord the Member for the City of London (Lord J. Russell) seemed to wish it to be understood that there was something in the constitution of that House that hindered him from carrying out those reforms, and had left to an ungrateful country a legacy of reform. He could only say that he had no prejudices on the subject of the franchise; and if the subject was brought forward by Her Majesty's present Ministers he should deal with it in a candid and liberal spirit. If the House of Commons, as at present constituted, was to deal with the question of those reforms on which the hearts of the people were said to be set, all that was wanted was that the Ministry should be able and willing to deal with them. Such a Ministry they now had, and they should have his cordial support. It was said that all this had arisen from the ambiguity of the language in the Queen's Speech. It was said, that this Speech first said the industrious classes were prosperous, and then that they were suffering. Suppose, it was said that the labouring classes were prosperous. He freely admitted that the agricultural labouring classes were prosperous, and he rejoiced from his heart at it. He was as sincere a friend to the labouring industrious classes as any hon. Member present. If any illustrious foreigner had been in the House during the debate on the Factory Bill, he would say that humanity was on his (Mr. Seymour's) side of the House, and the flinty hearts on that of the Manchester benches. But they were not the only industrious classes. He supposed that the farmer, who rose early and took his rest late, was one of the industrious classes. He supposed it would be allowed that the master manufacturer, who managed the varied relations of a large concern, was one of the industrious classes. His industry, he rejoiced to say, was prosperous, but he wished he had a little sympathy for others. It might, therefore, be assumed consistently with truth that some of the industrious classes were prosperous, but others were suffering. Now, it should be borne in mind, that owing to the prosperity of the country they had a surplus revenue, and in the distribution of that surplus he thought it but fair that the suffering class should be considered. If any inequalities existed which in their former artificial state were not observed, that class had a right to be considered in any alteration or revision of taxation that might take place. With regard to the terms of the Resolution of the hon. Member for Wolverhampton, he invited the House to say, "that the Act of 1846 was a wise, just, and beneficial measure." Now, a measure might be very successful, and yet not have been a wise measure at the time it was passed; and it might not be just, unless accompanied by those other measures that were required to make it so. He would not detain the House by quoting Hansard to point out the measures which it was said should accompany the repeal of the Corn Laws, but would observe that not one of them had been passed. Then, they were asked to say—“ That the maintenance and further extension of the policy of free trade, as opposed to that of protection, would best enable the property and industry of the country to bear the burdens to which they were exposed.”

He ventured to say that that which would best enable property and industry to bear their burdens would be an equal distribution of taxation; but if he took the Resolution of the hon. Member for Wolverhampton, he would debar himself from obtaining that adjustment of taxation which he believed to be necessary. Then, he was asked to vote that that House was “ ready to take into consideration any measures connected with the principles of the Resolution which might be laid before it by Her Majesty’s Ministers.” It was not, usual, however, for the Opposition to teach them what measures of the Government they should support, and he certainly would rather take information on that point in the usual way from a Secretary of State than from Gentlemen on the other side. The hon. Gentleman had used a great many arguments to prove that there was no distress among the farmers. On this point many balance-sheets had been published and not answered. It was all very well for a fancy farmer to say his books were on the safe side. He did not believe they were ever very safe, for the fancy farmer seldom made such profit. One thing, however, had been done—it had made the farmers all active politicians. There never was a greater mistake than to say that the farmers had been urged on upon that question; they had felt upon the question strongly themselves, and had urged on the class above them. It was well known that the farmers were in the habit of voting in accordance with the wishes of their landlords; but he appealed to hon. Gentlemen opposite whether they could show any instance of a free-trade landlord having induced his tenants to vote for free trade. It had been notoriously the other way. He rejoiced that this valuable class of the community had learnt to value the franchise, and that the agricultural voters would become an enlightened political constituency. That was one good result that had followed free trade. One word with regard to a point which had been touched upon by the hon. Member for Manchester (Mr. Bright), he meant with regard to political morality. Hon. Members could not forget the celebrated debate in 1846, which had led to the resignation of the Peel Ministry. It was not by any combined movement, because at the time there was a great difference of opinion among the Protectionist party. Many hon. Members believed that the obligations of a party leader had been departed from by the right hon. Baronet, and withdrew their confidence; but many still voted with him, and he (Mr. Seymer) was one of those. He did not blame those who took a different course. He thought those hon. Members whom the right hon. Baronet had so often led to victory, and whom he had abandoned, had great cause of complaint, and he (Mr. Seymer) was not surprised at their abandonment. But he must remind the House that the right hon. Baronet was not turned out by the combined action of what was called the Protectionist party. He would say also that that party, which might more properly be called the Conservative party, separated from Sir Robert Peel on the question of protection. In that party there were various shades of distinction. Some thought it impracticable to restore protection; others there were who looked in vain for the signs of reaction which might enable them to restore protection; and he (Mr. Seymer) had looked to his own constituents in that way. Many believed that the country was getting tired of free trade, and that the period would again arrive when protection might be restored. The question was, what were they (the Protectionists) to do after Sir Robert Peel had been displaced? Were they to leave the country to the tender mercies of the noble Lord opposite (Lord J. Russell) and his Friends? Could they look to Sir Robert Peel? Certainly not. They soon found out that by the course the right hon. Baronet took on the question of sugar. He did not blame him; the right hon. Gentleman felt strongly on the question of the admission of slave-grown sugar, but he supported the Bill of the noble Lord (Lord J. Russell). That he took to be the true state of the case with reference to the party which had been accused of turning Sir Robert Peel out of office. But, as regarded the late Ministry, they were not turned out—he might say they fell out. Their most able and distinguished Colleague had been unceremoniously turned out; that tended to weaken the Government, and ultimately compelled their resignation. That being the case, the charge against the Earl of Derby assumes a very different aspect. He did not think the conduct of the noble Lord called for that virulence of language which he had heard that night. Considering the question was a party move, the materials were somewhat incongruous. He saw the noble Lord the Member for the City of London, the author of the Ecclesiastical Titles Bill, sitting by the side of right hon. Baronet (Sir J. Graham) the leader of the opposition to that Bill. On that bench he saw hon. Members from Ireland, supporters of what they were pleased to call religious equality, and who had come there to obtain the repeal of that Bill. He saw there the noble Lord the author of the Militia Bill, which he believed to have been necessary for the defence of the country; and he saw behind him hon. Gentlemen, of what was called the Manchester school, who thought the country sufficiently well defended already, and some of them believed that it was too well defended, believing that free trade would put an end to all prospect of war in future; but in that they were, he was happy to say, opposed to what was the general feeling of the country. He saw an hon. Member the eloquent assailant of the Church, and another who was most ardent in its defence. A certain noble Lord, of some literary reputation (Viscount Maidstone), was reported to have said, that after Lord Derby's Government the "Deluge" might be expected; but he thought he might go back still further, and say, that after the present Ministry there would be chaos, for there never appeared to be a greater confusion of opinion than among hon. Members opposite. In the present instance they had found a valuable gold mine, which they were all intent in working with all the energy of Australian diggers. But the vein would soon be exhausted, and then where would they be? He had confidence in the present Ministry, and did not wish to see the country thrown into confusion. He thought the language of Ministers sufficiently clear not to mislead the country. He did not think it was either generous or right in hon. Members opposite, whatever their political opinions might be, to force those words upon Her Majesty's Government which must necessarily be offensive to hon. Members on that side of the House. How far they might act upon it by their votes, he could not say. It appeared to him unfortunate that the final settlement of the question of free trade should be mixed up with a party Motion, and that in a House where they were prepared to carry out the views of the hon. Member for the West Riding (Mr. Cobden), they should be met by a Motion which they would be obliged to oppose, and, as he thought, successfully. The public would find it difficult to understand these things, and they would fancy that the free-trade party were beaten in a free-trade House. That would be a very remarkable consummation for the question of free trade to arrive at. At that late hour he would not trouble the House further, but would conclude by giving his cordial assent to the Amendment of the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer, and opposing the Motion of the hon. Member for Wolverhampton.

MR. F. PEEL: Sir, however divided in opinion this House may be on the question that is now submitted to us—although one party will vote for the Resolution, and another party will vote for the Amendment—I apprehend that we shall all readily concur in one point, and that is, that Her Majesty's Government have made great advances, and are continuing to advance at a very convenient speed from one set of principles to another—from protection to that which the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer has stated to be popularly but most erroneously called "free trade." Why, I really feel that I ought to make some apology for employing a term apparently so offensive to the right hon. Gentleman as that. I remember a time when Her Majesty's Government, then in opposition, felt some reluctance to make use of the word "protection," and substituted for it the more fashionable phrase of "countervailing duties;" and so in the same way we are now called upon to give currency to the new expression of "unrestricted competition"—a good expression in itself, no doubt, but to my mind not so clear, not so handy, not so intelligible, as that familiar word of "free-trade," which I shall use, using it in the sense in which Her Majesty's Government use the term "unrestricted competition." Now, Sir, I have no desire to enter into the general question of free trade. I conceive that that is a question which is admitted and conceded upon both sides of the House. If any evidence should be required in its favour, we may be safely referred to the speech of the hon. Member for Wolverhampton (Mr. C. Villiers), and the speeches which I have no doubt would be made in support of that great principle by other hon. Gentlemen who will follow in the course of this discussion. But I am desirous of stating shortly what are my reasons for giving the preference to the Resolution of the hon. Member for Wolverhampton over the Amendment of Her Majesty's Government. The right hon. Gentleman has appealed to us to review dispassionately and fairly the position of the Government; and I am sure that, speaking for myself, I have no other wish but to take that course. I acknowledge and have always considered that from the time that Her Majesty's Government acceded to office, they became virtually and substantially free-traders to a considerable extent. I have never thought that any of the great measures in which the principle of free trade is embodied, incurred any risk from Her Majesty's Government succeeding to the responsibilities of office. The Act repealing the corn laws—the Act repealing the navigation laws—the Act admitting sugar the produce of foreign free or slave labour upon equal terms, or, at all events, upon an approximation to equal terms with sugar the produce of our own Colonies, I considered were, from the first moment, placed far out of harm's way, and beyond the reach of any Government to disturb. I did not believe that any Government, however deeply imbued with protectionism, would have the courage to assail the foundations of those great and imperial measures. I never thought that Her Majesty's Government would venture to bring forward any plan, for example, for again preventing the produce of three quarters of the globe from coming to the shores of this country in any but British ships. I never expected any plan to be submitted by a Protectionist Government for again handing over the carrying trade between one colony and another colony, between this dependency and that dependency, or between all our dependencies and the mother country, to a monopoly of British shipowners; and I felt certain that we should never again have any duties imposed upon cotton, or wool, or timber, or any other of the raw materials of our manufactures. I felt certain that no duties would ever again be placed upon our provisions, our live stock, or even upon corn itself. I am now ready to give the Government credit for being free-traders even to a fuller extent than this. It is impossible for me to resist the evidence of the Amendment of which they have given notice. I accept it. I believe it is their desire henceforward heartily to abide by and faithfully to respect the principles of free trade in any measures of financial or administrative reform which they may hereafter submit to this House. But if I am asked whether I am content with this rate of progression, I say at once that I am not. The right hon. Gentleman has said that there is something unfair, something ungenerous, and, what he thought was much worse, something even unwise, striking at the root of all government, in pressing forward a Resolution of the nature of this proposed by the hon. Member for Wolverhampton: it was wounding the susceptibility of hon. Gentlemen opposite—it was an unnecessary outrage upon their feelings. I admit that, in all probability, if left to themselves, what with the combined pressure of public opinion out of doors, and the House of Commons within, Her Majesty's Government might, at no distant period, judging from the rate at which they are now advancing, repeat in the most approved fashion the whole creed and all the formularies of free trade; and the line of argument which they have adopted to-night is that of calling upon us to hail them as converts, rather than to try and brand them with the stigma of apostacy. But, Sir, I must state why I think there is nothing unfair in pressing forward this Resolution. In the first place, it is impossible not to comment upon the manifest opportuneness of this change on the part of the Government, and the obvious bearing it has upon the duration of their tenure of office. It is clear, too, that only the upper part, if I may so express myself, of the Protectionist party, first that portion which has been exposed to the warmth of the rays of official dignity, has accepted free trade. All the residue are as far from adopting it as ever. Why, I must appeal to the extracts which have been read by the hon. Member for Manchester (Mr. Bright) as evidence of what I say. Can it be disputed that in the month of July all that portion of the party of which I am now speaking were as strong Protectionists as ever they were? Is there, then, anything ungenerous to them in assuming that they are still as unripe, as crude, as indigestible as ever was fruit turned away from the light and warmth of the sun? I think, therefore, that it is reasonable to exact from Her Majesty's Government some positive test of their sincerity, something that should act as a line whereby we may probe and fathom the depth of their counsels, their convictions and their plans. It is impossible to forget that for seven long years—eager as the hon. Gentleman who has just sat down now is to disclaim protection—they were the sworn advocates of a policy the very reverse of that which is enunciated in this Resolution of the hon. Member for Wolverhampton, as well as in the Amendment of the Government; and that now only at the last moment are they prepared to abandon that policy, and to discontinue pressing upon us its adoption. I repeat, therefore, that nothing is more reasonable than that we should exact from them some resolution by which they shall recant once for all the false doctrines which they had imbibed, and put it in our power, out of their own mouths, and by their own admission, henceforward to convict them, if occasion should require, of the injurious and obstructive course which they pursued while they were in opposition. Sir, I must also say that I think something is due to the past. We cannot forget how hard a measure the right hon. Gentleman especially, along with his colleagues, dealt out to others for a change of their conviction—and I must add, a change of conviction which had tenfold of the palliation for it, and not one-tenth part of the provocation in it, that has now the course pursued by Her Majesty's Government. Not that I wish—far from it—to embitter the political discussions of the present day with an infusion of personal topics. I neither desire myself, nor do I wish to see anybody else, press invidious points of that description. I have no wish to see Parliamentary passages, which reflect no credit on Her Majesty's Government, reacted in this House; but I do think that some reparation is due to the past, and at this solemn conjuncture it would be a fitting act of retributive justice if those who heaped obloquy upon the authors of the Act of 1846, should now have the candour to come forward and acknowledge that it was a just, wise, and beneficial measure. But, Sir, I entirely agree with the hon. Member for Manchester that this is not a question between the House and the Government; I do not consider that this is in any degree a party move. I can only say that, for my part, I have no desire to see Her Maesty's Government dispossessed of their offices; but I consider on the present occasion the House is discharging a solemn act of duty towards the country. The performance of this act of duty has been imposed upon us by Her Majesty's Government itself. There was no occasion why this duty should have been devolved on the House—on the contrary, there was every probability that it would not be. The Government stated distinctly in the last Parliament that they appealed to the country to know what course they should adopt with reference to their commercial policy; and it was acknowledged by a right hon. Gentleman who is admitted to be familiar with that description of subjects—the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary at War (Major Beresford)—that the sense of the country had been decidedly adverse to them. Nothing, therefore, could have been more simple than for the Government to have come forward, and frankly admitted in Her Majesty's Speech that the question was settled, and that henceforward they abided by the sense of the country. It was not necessary in taking that course for the Government to make Her Majesty a partisan, as has been said by the right hon. Gentleman—nor need She have given an opinion one way or the other—but She might have been allowed to speak as plainly on that question as She did on other topics introduced into the Speech. But, instead of taking that course, the Government adopted one entirely opposite. The right hon. Gentleman the Secretary for the Home Department (Mr. Walpole) admitted that the paragraph of the Speech to which we looked with most interest, was framed with a studied ambiguity, and so as to be capable of a double construction. It was meant to be taken in one sense or the other according to the humour of different parties; it was so framed, that a Protectionist follower of the Government should conceive that it leant to his side, whilst a friend to free trade should accept it as speaking the language of his own doctrines. The real object, no doubt, was to prevent either party, if possible, from proposing an Amendment to the Address. I say, therefore, that that being so, it became absolutely incumbent upon this House to avail itself of the first fitting opportunity which should be presented to place upon record a declaration of its opinions on this important question so clear, so unambiguous, so decided in its precision and its perspicuity, and at the same time so general and comprehensive, as should satisfy every man what are the views of this House—what are the views of the Government which we honour with our confidence, and so as to remove every ground, I do not say only of solid and substantial objection, but to leave not so much as a plausible pretext for taking exception to the Government on the score of their commercial policy. That, I conceive, was the course which the conduct of Government made it incumbent on this House to pursue. Now, Sir, I understand that the hon. Member for Wolverhampton has brought forward his Resolution in pursuance of this plain and imperative duty. Being laid upon the table of the House, I had of course an opportunity of reading it. It appeared to me to effect its object in the manner which I thought was desirable, and I determined in my own mind that I would give it my support. Then came the Amendment of Her Majesty's Government; and I confess I see no reason why I should alter my intention of voting for the Resolution of the hon. Member for Wolverhampton, and support the Amendment of Her Majesty's Government. Some might think it becoming that a proposition emanating from the Government should have preference over one from a private Member; but with respect to this particular question there can be no doubt that a Resolution comes more properly from an independent Member of the House than from Her Majesty's Government, because they have somewhat ostentatiously declared that they have no principle of locomotion in themselves—that whether they were to go backward or forward, was a question to be decided by Parliament and public opinion, and that this House was to pull the strings by which they were to be set in motion. The right hon. Gentleman has threatened us certainly with a resignation of the Government in the event of this Resolution being carried. But I can hardly treat a menace of this kind as very formidable; for this would appear to me a most singular course—a straining at a gnat after swallowing a camel. Will you swallow the substance of free trade, and wince at its shadow? Will you gulp down the whole potion at a draught, and grumble at us because the preparation is made up in a particular way? I confess I am not much deterred by the threat of the Government; I must take this opportunity of saying that I by no means undervalue the admissions which have been made by them, and which

I regard as significant and suggestive. In the first place, they have admitted an improved condition of the working classes, and the general prosperity of the country. It is right, however, that it should be borne in mind that the prosperity is in no degree due to those who now compose Her Majesty's Government; on the contrary, it has accrued in despite of their strenuous and persevering exertions to depress and keep down the condition of the labourers in this country. I make this statement upon the authority of the Government itself—upon their admission that free trade has brought us cheap provisions, and that cheap provisions have done much to secure the prosperity of the working classes. Surely, if that be so, fortune was never more blindfold, never so eccentric in the distribution of her favours, than when she metamorphosed the hon. Gentlemen who sit opposite—who have contributed nothing to that prosperity—into great officers and Ministers of State. Well, then, if this prosperity is not due to hon. Gentlemen opposite, to what is it due? By their own admission, wrung from them reluctantly in the first instance, it is due to unrestricted competition. Here, then, we have the recognition of an important fact, and of its being traceable to a particular cause. Still I think the House ought not to omit to ask what inference we shall draw from this avowal. Do you intend we shall construe it as implying a change of convictions in your minds, or a change of intentions only in your policy? Unless Ministers have really and sincerely changed their convictions, they can hardly expect that we should entrust them implicitly with the charge of this great question. What reason, however, is there to conclude that there has been any such change in their convictions? We know well enough that the Secretary for the Colonies was but the other day of opinion that nothing short of arresting the descending scale of discriminating duties in favour of British colonial sugar could possibly pluck the West Indian colonists from the despondency into which they had sunk, and place them again in the prosperous position they had been wont in former times to occupy. Members of the Government also have declared over and over again in the course of the present year, that whether they should be able to carry their opinions into practice or not, they considered that a moderate fixed duty would alone place the agriculturists of this country in a position of fair competition with foreigners. If, on the other hand, there is only a change of intention in Her Majesty's Ministers, I do not think they are entitled to claim credit for liberality, or any very kindly treatment at our hands. I conceive they have changed their intentions simply because necessity compelled them to do so. Take away the pressure, and what security have you that their ancient errors will not again sprout up with all the rankness and luxuriance of their former vegetation? These are the general views with which I support the Resolution of the hon. Member for Wolverhampton, in preference to the Amendment of the Government. But when I come to look clearly into that Amendment, I find still greater reason for feeling distrust and suspicion of it. The Resolution of the hon. Member looks backward as well as forward; it reviews the past and surveys the future, and does both in the most complete and explicit manner. The Amendment merely glances at the past, and is studiously ambiguous as to the future. I never remember to have read a more frigid and unimpassioned admission of the great blessings which have resulted from free trade. There is not an inhabitant of this country, from the Queen on Her Throne to the humblest peasant in the land, who has not derived advantages of one sort or another from free imports. No one can deny that free trade has added new strength and stability to the institutions of this country, and given us fresh confidence in their durability. No one, I am sure, can deny that it has given us new securities for international tranquillity, and cemented the bonds of peace between different countries. Who will refuse to recognise the magnificent extension of our foreign trade? There is not a loom, not a spindle, not a factory, nor a workshop, which is not producing more than it has ever done before; and it will be found that our foreign trade has increased fifty per cent in ten years, from 50,000,000*l.* to 75,000,000*l.* Yet all that we have in the Ministerial Amendment is a cold and unimpassioned reference to the cheapness of provisions. No doubt this cheapness is one of the greatest benefits derived from the recent policy; but Ministers have taken pains to make this admission as valueless as possible, by declaring that cheapness, if left to its own single operation, would have led to a reduction of wages, commensurate with the fall of prices. They have announced that the reason why wages are so high must be sought for in the imports of gold, and the extensive emigration that is proceeding. I hoped that the right hon. Gentleman would have answered the appeal so pointedly made to him by the hon. Member for Wolverhampton, and explained the manner in which gold and emigration had operated to improve the condition of the labouring classes. I, myself, think that they have influenced it in a very slight degree. Look to the agricultural districts—we know that there are not more employed in agriculture now than there were thirty years ago, and the emigration of this year, though more extensive than ever before, has certainly not come up to the natural increase of births over deaths; whilst with regard to the manufacturing districts I believe that emigration, so far from raising the rate of wages, has rather had a contrary effect, because the multitudes coming from Ireland have inundated Lancashire, Yorkshire, and the midland counties, with numbers of labourers competing for employment and depressing the scale of wages and the standard of living amongst our own working classes. With reference again to that part of the Amendment which is prospective, it appears to me to be unsatisfactory in omitting all reference to the important question of compensation. We know the position which Government holds on this subject. They have told us recently, in Her Majesty's Speech, that the agricultural classes are suffering from competition, not because it is unrestricted, but because they are burdened with special taxes, imposed to countervail in some respect the advantages they enjoyed in the way of protection. I have no wish to prevent the Government from bringing forward those measures of a general character which they have promised; but they do not affect the question of compensation. The agricultural classes, according to the Ministerial view, are asserted to be in a position of disadvantage as compared with the rest of the community, and to be subjected to a disproportionate share of taxation. If you bring forward measures of general advantage to all classes, what peculiar advantage do the agriculturists derive? They will remain in the same relative position that they were in before; and there will still remain the special injustice to be redressed, and inequality to be removed. I think it important, therefore, to take this opportunity of setting at rest once for all the question of compensation. I will only add that the more I examine the Resolution and the Amendment, the more reason I see to approve the one, and disapprove the other. I see nothing factious, nothing like what the right hon. Gentleman called a vexatious movement, in this proceeding. I do see two things clearly enough—I see a Government halting between two opinions, trying to shape their course between difficulties that present an unpleasant alternative on either side, and to reconcile the retention of office with a character for consistency. On the other hand, the country is clear, decided, and explicit in its views. The right hon. Gentleman, in concluding his speech, appealed to the new Members of this House to lend him their support on this occasion; I hardly venture to make an appeal to them on behalf of my own views. I am as young in years, almost as young in public life, as they; but I am sure of this, that if they wish to earn a title to the confidence of the country, they will record their vote in support of this Resolution, and prove thereby that they are the true representatives of the sense of the country, and that their conduct breathes the spirit of the people, and is stamped, as it should be stamped, with the impress and image of its mind.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON: Sir, I shall not detain the House but for a few minutes in requesting their indulgence to allow me to state shortly the view which I take of the propositions which have been submitted to the House, and of the position in which the House seems likely to be placed. I have stated on a former occasion, and I repeat it now, that I think it was not only proper, but under the circumstances in which we were placed, absolutely necessary, that some Member should propose to the House a Resolution answering the question which Her Majesty's Government put to the country by the dissolution of the last Parliament. If, indeed, that portion of the Speech from the Throne which treated of the question of free trade and protection had been couched in language more plain and unambiguous, it is possible that the Address in reply to the Speech might have been accepted as the answer of the House on the part of the country to the question of preference between the two opposite principles of commercial policy. The Speech, however, was in that respect undoubtedly as ambiguous as words could make it; and that fact increased the necessity, in my opinion, for such a course as that which has been now taken. Now, Sir, it was not necessary, indeed, with a view to settling what should be the policy of the Government and of the Parliament, that any opinion should be expressed upon the subject; because I think that those who have watched the progress of public opinion, and have observed events in this country, must have long since made up their mind to a full conviction that a reversal of the policy which was adopted in 1846 and the succeeding years, was as impossible as any physical event that could be mentioned. But it was fitting that Parliament should express an opinion, and in many respects it is most desirable that that opinion should be expressed with all the weight that the opinion of the Parliament could carry; and in order to give to that expression the weight which is proper that the expression of its opinion should carry, it is, in my humble opinion, most desirable that the opinion should be expressed, if not with unanimity, at least by as large a majority as possible. Now, Sir, in regard to the Resolution which my hon. and learned Friend (Mr. C. Villiers) has proposed, there is not one word in that Resolution to which I, for my own part, should not be ready most implicitly to subscribe. I concur in the opinions expressed in that Resolution—with regard to the past, with regard to the present, with regard to the future, I think the measures of policy of which I treat were wise, were just, and have been beneficial. I think with him and with the Government, according to the opinions expressed in Her Majesty's Speech and in their addresses, that the improved condition of the country, and especially of the industrious classes, has been mainly the result of that recent legislation which has removed protective duties, and which has established the principle of unrestricted competition. I need not say that I concur with my hon. Friend and with Her Majesty's Government in being ready to affirm that that system ought to be, and must henceforward be, the guiding rule of the legislation of this country. Well, then, Sir, if the Motion of my hon. Friend were put by you to this House "Aye" or "No," I should be compelled by my own convictions to say "Aye" to that Resolution, and to concur with him in all the affirmations which it contains. But, Sir, I cannot but consider also, not only my own convictions and opinions, but the opinions of others who are desired to concur in the process

it is suggested to men to give victions to the force of counterents and circumstances. If every his country were to be chained for be opinions which he entertained arliest part of his career, there no progress or improvement in
. We meet here from day to day her purpose than to convince each and every man who endeavours to people to come round to his opin-are himself, I think, in justice from of reproaching them when he has
d. Then I say that I think that, us casting reproaches upon that ty in this House and in the coun-have surrendered their original me to the convictions which an ming course of events has pros should consider that course as de to them as it is beneficial to try. And the Resolution proposed Majesty's Government does in my entain the fullest acknowledgment profits which the present system mercial legislation has produced, pledge every man who votes for tribute to render that system ward permanent. And I am wholly to understand how it is possible ween to conceive that a man who that Resolution can afterwards himself under any ambiguity in its to back out of an opinion to think that Resolution irrevocably him. Now, with regard to the and to the future, I really see little that the country cares about, in my opinion, is, what Parliament means to do in this matter—what is to be the principle upon which the legislation of the country is to be founded. I do not think that the country cares, and I do not think that it has much right to care, what may be the private opinions of Gentlemen as to that policy. I think it is rather following the example of tribunals whose conduct we are not much in the habit of approving; it is somewhat like the practice of the Inquisition to compel people to come before you; and, not content with declaring that their conduct will be in conformity with your views and intentions, to force them to go down on their knees and recant their opinions, or to profess opinions which you choose to impose upon them. Sir, we are here an assembly of Gentlemen—and we who are Gentlemen on this side of the House should remember that we are dealing with Gentlemen on the other side; and I, for one, cannot at all reconcile it to my feelings to call upon a set of English Gentlemen unnecessarily, for any purpose that I have in view, to express opinions they do not entertain, or to recant opinions which may be still lingering in their minds. I will grant, if you like, that they still think that the measures of free trade were not just; wise, I think, they can hardly refuse to acknowledge them, when they say that those measures have mainly contributed to produce the improved condition of the country generally, and of the industrious classes opinion, unnecessary, and is nothing to the purpose, to know what they think as to the original justice or injustice of this policy. I should, therefore, Sir, very much wish that some middle course could be suggested, and that some Resolution might be proposed, which, on the one hand asserting in the broadest manner the determination of this House to further and continue the policy which we approve of, should, on the other hand, be free from those expressions which prevent the Resolution of my hon. and learned Friend from being unanimously adopted. I must say, Sir, that part of what has passed in this evening's debate, seems to have been somewhat full of practical inconsistencies. The hon. Member for Manchester (Mr. Bright), while urging the Government, and those who sit behind them, to adopt the Resolution of my hon. and learned Friend, has done his best to render it impossible for them to do so. The hon. Gentleman wants, he says, to have the authority of a vote of this House go forth, not only over the length and breadth of the land, but across the Atlantic ocean to America, in order to convince, at this critical moment, not only the people of England, but the people of the United States, that the free-trade policy is built upon a rock, never to be shaken, and that nothing can ever change the course of our legislation upon that point. But at the same time the hon. Gentleman, by a very amusing catalogue of quoted speeches, and by the general tenor of his taunts about changes of opinion, appears to me to have done all that he could to reduce the majority—if the majority is to be in favour of the Resolution of my hon. and learned Friend—to the smallest possible amount. Now, I would beg my hon. Friend, if he would allow me to call him so, to consider the consequences of turning into a party movement—into an ordinary party struggle—that which I think should be purely a Motion tending to elicit from this House a solemn affirmation of a great principle of domestic policy. Now, when I say “the consequences,” I do not allude to those contingent results which were indicated by the Chancellor of the Exchequer, and which have also, I think, been pretty well adverted to by those who have spoken upon this side of the House. I speak not of the result of this debate with regard to the stability of the present Cabinet; I treat the matter upon other and different grounds. Suppose that the Motion of my hon. and learned Friend is that which is first brought under the consideration of this House. Well, that Resolution will either be carried or it will be rejected. But I think it is plain enough to be seen from the tone and temper of the House, that whether it be carried or whether it be rejected, it will be carried or rejected by a very small and narrow majority. Now, I will first suppose that it will be rejected—not at all an impossible supposition. [Laughter.] I say that is not at all an impossible supposition; because I think I am not mistaken in believing that there are many Members of this House, not only many of those younger greenhorns who have been appealed to by the speakers on both sides, but many of the more experienced old stagers of Parliament—I believe, I say, that there are some, if not many, who would be disinclined to convert this Motion into an opportunity for overturning the Government; and I confess I am one of those holding that opinion. I think that this is a separate question altogether, and ought to be kept separate from any considerations of confidence or want of confidence in the Administration. I think that it is, I may say, profaning a great principle of domestic policy to convert it into a mere engine of temporary party warfare. But supposing it were to happen that the hon. and learned Gentleman's Motion were to be rejected—what, I would ask, would be the impression which would go forth over the length and breadth of the land, and over the Atlantic to the United States? Why, the impression would naturally be, that the free-trade party was in a minority in this House of Commons—that the verdict of the country, as expressed by the House of Commons, was against free trade; and if anybody doubted whether the fact was so or not, they would appeal to the speech of my hon. Friend the Member for Manchester, who roundly declares that all who vote for the Amendment must be Protectionists at heart; and consequently it would be inferred that those who rejected the Motion of my hon. and learned Friend must be still Protectionists, and then people must say, “You have got a Protectionist House of Commons, and how can we possibly rely upon the permanence of a system which is at variance with the settled convictions and declared opinions of the majority of the House of Commons?” That would certainly be a great calamity and is a thing to be avoided, as one which would be very mischievous in its effects. But suppose the Resolution to be carried by

ity, say of ten, twenty, or thirty. ask any really sincere free-trader he can think that that would be a very result? Can it be a satisfactory result, compared with a vote unanimous, as it might be, I should hope, whole House of Commons, affirming principle of free trade as the permanent policy of the commercial policy of this country? Now, it is very natural that men who have spent many years in worthy endeavours to carry a particular proposition—who have been thwarted in whom they thought actuated by passion or by interest—and who at last carried their point and enjoyed their triumph—it is not unnatural, I say, that they could wish to carry their victory to the most possible extremity, and to trample on their defeated antagonists. But on an occasion like this, when the interests of the country are the subject of discussion, and when the decision of the majority may have, on the one hand, a very advantageous result to the cause of so many persons are so honourably employed, and when, on the other hand, evil consequences might be produced by interests which they wish to support, I think we might, all of us, cast aside feelings arising from the contest and, over, that we might accept the policy which is tendered by those with whom we have hitherto been fighting, and that we should not be too nice in requiring or obliging them to state what is the decision of conviction that has been wrought in their minds. If they consent to act on the policy I think we ought to be satisfied with it; and I think it is ungenerous on the part of the majority—if majority there endeavour to compel the minority to subscribe to opinions of which they may not really approve. Such a course, in the name of unanimity—or almost unanimity—is a fact I should prefer to have just three voting against the proposition, in favour of the thing, and for the sake of contrast—such a course would carry its own opinion, not only ungenerous, but would fail of its purpose, and we only deprive ourselves of the authority which a unanimous vote would give to this House. I think it is not only ungenerous to the Gentlemen to express opinions which they do not conscientiously entertain, but it is impolitic and unwise, as well as—that we are defeating our own ends, and depriving ourselves of the benefit of a policy which we think essential to the interests of our country—we are depriving those principles of a great amount of support which is now tendered to us, and which only rests with us to accept. Now, we have been discussing two propositions. I do not presume to lay a third proposition on the table; but at the same time, I will just read that form of words which, if they were encouraged by any manifestation of opinion on the part of any great body of the Gentlemen in the House, I should be ready to tender for your acceptance. The form of words I think required is one which, on the one hand, affirms the doctrine of free trade and its permanent establishment; while on the other hand, it is not liable to the objection of requiring those who may agree to it to recant opinions which they may have honestly at a former period have entertained. What I propose will appear, I fear, almost a plagiarism upon my hon. and learned Friend, the terms are so near alike. The Resolution I would propose would run thus:—

“That it is the opinion of this House that the improved condition of the country, and especially of the industrious classes, is mainly the result of recent legislation, which has established the principle of unrestricted competition, and abolished taxes imposed for purposes of protection, and has thereby diminished the cost and increased the abundance of the principal articles of food to the people.”

Nobody can object to that.

“That it is the opinion of this House, that that policy, firmly maintained and prudently extended, will best enable the industry of the country to bear its burdens, and will thereby most surely promote the welfare and contentment of the people.”

“That this House will be ready to take into consideration any measures consistent with those principles which, in pursuance of Her Majesty’s gracious Speech and recommendation, may be laid before it.”

Well, now, I really would submit that these words contain everything which my hon. and learned Friend has proposed in regard to the future, while they contain nothing which any hon. Member who has yielded his opinions to the inevitable force of events might not with perfect honour to himself subscribe to and support. But, now I shall be told that this form of words, by omitting the word “just,” opens a door for the question of compensation; and that I take to be the real point. But now I say the insertion of the word “just” does not shut the door at all to the question of compensation. It will be equally competent to the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer, or any other Member, when we come to consider the financial arrangements for the year, to propose changes of taxation for the purpose of giving what they may call "relief," or what others may call "compensation" to the agricultural classes, with the word "just" there as if it were not there; and I hold we should not stand in any degree the worse—we who may be disposed to resist that proposal—because the word "just" was not in the Resolution, though we should if the word "just" were inserted. I think there is nothing so undesirable as mixing up together questions which are not connected, but essentially different. I hold that these two questions are quite distinct—the one question, whether the commercial policy shall be maintained, and the other whether, in consequence of that policy, any particular class of men have a claim for what they may call compensation or relief. You may affirm the maintenance of the principle of free trade, and you may with that maintenance entertain one or the other of the two opinions in regard to compensation. It is perfectly competent for any man to think that the principle of unrestricted competition ought to be maintained, and that its maintenance entitles no man to compensation; or he may entertain the opinion that it has inflicted hardship on certain classes, and that those classes have an equitable claim to consideration. My own opinion is, that the compensation to the agricultural classes is to be found in those circumstances which were so well adverted to by the hon. Gentleman the Member for Manchester—in the improved condition of the country, in the cheapness of everything which they have to buy out of what I must admit in many cases must have been their diminished rents, in the contentment of the people, in the cordiality of feeling which has been established between the upper and the lower classes—in the love and affection of all around them, and in the absence of all that invidious jealousy which, before, the lower classes were naturally led to feel towards their superiors, from a belief that the laws were calculated to put money into the pockets of the landlords at the expense of the great mass of the consumers in the country. I say that that is the compensation which I think the landed interest are entitled to; and that is the compensation which they have already obtained. This is my opinion. I do not quarrel with any man for entertaining a different notion. But when these questions come before us, let them come distinctly, and we shall not be the less able to negative any proposal which we may disapprove of, because we have united in voting and affirming the establishment of free trade. Now, what is the calculation of those who insist on the insertion of those words? I suspect they hope to be in a majority. If they are in a majority to-night in affirming the insertion of the word "just," cannot they make the same muster on any future day, when any proposal is brought forward the effect of which will be to give that compensation which they think ought not to be afforded? Those who wish to shut the door against the principle of compensation would be just as able—and I say, better able—to shut that door when the proposal comes, than they would be to-night, by an indirect expression, a side-wind, to shut out a claim we do not distinctly negative, and which is not distinctly brought under the consideration of Parliament. I have only to say I deplore the condition in which I think the House is about to find itself. I do not think it is to the credit of Parliament, when a great question of domestic policy has been put to the country, and when the House is called on to make an answer to that question, that we should turn it at once into a mere party struggle; that those who get up on one side should say they mean it as a censure on the Government, when they only mean it as an affirmation of a principle; and that a Resolution should be so worded, as it were studiously, to prevent a large portion of the House, who would be disposed to agree in the affirmation of that principle, from concurring in the Resolution. It is evident, Sir, this debate cannot end to-night; and I can only hope that hon. Gentlemen will well consider this matter between this and the time when the debate shall be resumed, and that a spirit of conciliation may be found to animate both sides of the House. If, on the one hand, those who sit opposite would be disposed to take such an Amendment as I have ventured to suggest; on the other hand, my hon. Friends who sit on this side might be contented with something like what they have proposed, free from those expressions which hurt the feelings of hon. Members opposite; and the result would be that we should all unite in what would then be an overwhelming affirmation of a great principle of domestic policy—an affirmation which would not only be satisfactory to nine hundred and ninety-nine men out of every thousand in the country, but which would be of the utmost importance to our relations with every foreign country in the world.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Wednesday, November 24, 1852.

MINUTES.] PUBLIC BILL.—2^o County Elections Polls.

Order for Second Reading read.

LORD ROBERT GROSVENOR said, he now begged to move the Second Reading of this Bill; Motion made and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a Second Time."

MR. BECKETT DENISON said, he should be disposed to support the second reading of this Bill, because he was decidedly in favour of polls at County Elections being restricted to one day. He thought such polls could be taken in one day without any inconvenience. But the Bill went much farther than that, and he thought the House ought to be exceedingly cautious, lest in endeavouring to promote despatch, it did not commit a much greater evil than the one sought to be remedied. The Bill proposed that the poll should take place on the day after the day of nomination. He thought that would be too early a period for the poll to begin after the day of nomination. In the West Riding of Yorkshire, which he represented, more than once, under the existing system, had the candidates been taken by surprise on the eve of an election by the appearance of a new candidate, and once they were forced to be specially on their guard against a similar surprise. If, therefore, the poll took place so soon after the nomination as this Bill proposed, candidates would have more than ever to be prepared for a contest, and they might expend in that way nearly as large a sum as that which would be incident to a contested election. In 1847, when Lord Morpeth and himself were candidates for the West Riding, they heard no rumour of a third candidate coming forward until their arrival at Wakefield on the evening before the nomination day. Neither of them was, therefore, prepared for a contest; and feeling the very great responsibility of throwing so large a constituency into the confusion of a contest, he (Mr. B. Denison) himself thought it prudent to retire from the contest. His present Colleague (Mr. Cobden) was not in Yorkshire on that occasion, being abroad; but if he had been present, he (Mr. B. Denison) believed he would not have allowed himself to be put in nomination. Lord Morpeth and himself had no reasonable notice of the intention to nominate his present Colleague (Mr. Cobden) at that election; and it was solely to prevent the expense of going to the poll that he (Mr. B. Denison) was induced to retire from the contest. With respect again to the election which took place in the summer of the present year, although it was generally rumoured that his Colleague and himself would be elected, they were neither of them very confident that another candidate would not be put up at the eleventh hour to oppose them; and certain arrangements were made and expenses incurred throughout the riding in anticipation of any surprise. Now, he was thoroughly convinced that if only one day was to elapse between the day of nomination and the day of poll, candidates would be driven to make all the preparations for a contest, and much unnecessary expense would be incurred throughout the Kingdom. Previous to the Reform Bill, it was the practice for county meetings to be held at which Gentlemen were named as candidates, and thus it was known before the election came on, who were the parties soliciting the suffrages of the electors. This prevented any surprise—the candidates had plenty of time to canvass the constituency, and the matter consequently proceeded more satisfactorily than it would do under the proposed alteration. He would suggest, as preferable to the proposition in the Bill, that the poll in counties should take place on the day week after the nomination of the candidates; the result of which would be, that none of the candidates would think of going to any expense until they were all fairly in the field. He owned he felt a good deal on this subject, because he represented the largest constituency in the Kingdom, and that constituency could not be moved for a contest without almost incredible expense. For those reasons, he should certainly vote against that clause of the Bill when it came before the Committee. He wished to touch upon another question. He thought the taking of the poll might be accomplished much more satisfactorily and cheaply than at present; and the suggestion he would throw out was, that after the candidates for an election were named, the sheriff for the county or division of a county should send out printed lists to every voter, whose name and residence he must know, and those should be returned within a week, giving the names of those for whom he wished to vote, and signed by the voter. He thought this mode of taking the votes would have a very salutary effect. Everything would be done in a quiet and tranquil manner, and the electors would not be subjected to the annoyance of leaving their homes. He did not mean to propose that now, as it was an alteration in the mode of taking the votes at elections, but he threw out the suggestion for consideration.

MR. ROBERT PALMER said, he had given this subject some consideration, and he could not help saying that the more he considered it the less expedient he thought it was to alter the present system of taking the polls in counties. His decided impression was, that the effect of limiting the poll to one day would be to subject the persons who had to give their votes to great personal inconvenience. He confessed he was much struck to find the representative of so large a constituency as the West Riding of Yorkshire in favour of a proposition for limiting the poll to one day. He (Mr. Palmer) had no doubt that the poll might be taken in one day, if there was a considerable increase of the arrangements for accomplishing that end. But then came the question of expense. His strong belief, however, was, that if they were to increase the polling places to a very considerable extent, the result would be, that so far from diminishing the expense by limiting the poll to one day, they would increase it. They would require additional deputy-sheriffs, additional clerks, and additional arrangements of every kind. The great body of voters in counties were agriculturists, and it was a matter of considerable importance to them that they should be allowed two days in which to record their votes at their polling places, some of which were at great distances from their residences, rather than one. For example, it would be very inconvenient if the single day on which they were at liberty to give their votes happened on any great fair or market at which their business compelled them to be present. It was necessary, too, that the voters should be secured from surprise. In his own county, at the last election, they were taken by surprise on the day of nomination. He was satisfied that that part of the Bill which limited the time between the nomination and the polling to one day would be impracticable. Some of the polling places were thirty or forty miles from the town where the nomination took place, and much inconvenience would also be caused by the sheriff being bound to have all his men ready within twenty-four hours of the time when he announced the poll to take place. He was putting this question simply as one of expediency and convenience, for there was no principle involved in the measure. At his own election recently, several of his constituents intimated to him how glad they were that the Bill of the noble Lord (Lord R. Grosvenor) did not pass in the last Session of Parliament, seeing the inconvenience it would have occasioned them. Besides, supposing the poll was limited to one day in counties, he thought it would be a matter of the greatest difficulty, if, indeed, it would not be altogether impossible, to procure conveyances in a large county to take the voters to the poll. That was a material point, though he admitted it might be managed in the metropolitan county. But, in his opinion, the proposition of the noble Lord was inexpedient. The time for taking the poll in counties was short enough already. He would move, in the meantime, that the Bill be read a second time that day six months, though, if he found the sense of the House against him, he would not press it to a division.

Amendment proposed, "To leave out the word 'now,' and at the end of the Question to add the words 'upon this day six months.'"

Question proposed, "That the word 'now' stand part of the Question."

LORD HARRY VANE said, he must confess he entertained very considerable doubts as to the expediency of this Bill, but he was not prepared at once to vote against the second reading in the mode proposed by the hon. Member for Berkshire (Mr. Palmer). There was, however, a part of the Bill to which he (Lord H. Vane) entertained a very decided objection, namely, the interposition of only one day between the nomination and the polling day; and if his noble Friend (Lord R. Grosvenor) should be inclined to persevere with that part of the Bill, he would feel it his duty to oppose it on its third reading. This was only a question of expense; there was no principle whatever involved in it. Every one, he thought, would admit that it was desirable to diminish the expenses at County Election contests, but it was equally desirable to prevent confusion; and it was equally necessary that the opinions of the constituencies should be fairly taken, and that there should be ample time given to enable candidates to canvass the voters. With respect to the limitation of the poll to one day in counties, he thought the poll might be taken in that short space of time in the metropolitan county, and in counties adjacent to the metropolis; but in other counties, where there was a scattered constituency, consisting of every description of voters, it would be found to be a matter of great practical difficulty to procure conveyances sufficient to take them to the poll, and that the price of such conveyances would be very materially enhanced on such occasions. He confessed he did not think it advisable to adopt the suggestions thrown out by the hon. Member for the West Riding (Mr. B. Denison), that a week should elapse between the nomination and the polling days. He did not see any necessity for the interposition of so long a period. Indeed, he thought the present time was sufficient to elapse between the nomination and the poll, for all the necessary purposes of the election. He was prepared to vote for the second reading of the Bill, but on the express understanding that he should oppose the third reading if the proposition interposing only a single day between the nomination and the poll was not withdrawn.

MR. WALPOLE: Sir, I quite agree with the observation which fell from my hon. Friend the Member for Berkshire (Mr. Palmer), that there is no actual principle involved in the Bill as proposed by the noble Lord (Lord R. Grosvenor), and that the question to be considered is a question of convenience, expediency, and expense. Now, there are two propositions contained in this Bill: the first is, that the days of polling in counties shall be reduced from two to one; and the second is, that the day of polling shall immediately follow the day of nomination, without allowing an interval, as now, between them. [Lord R. GROSVENOR: An interval of one day.] Very well, an interval of one day. Now, upon the question whether the polling in counties shall be reduced from two days to one, as in the boroughs, provided you can do it conveniently, and with as little expense as is now incurred, I think there would be great convenience attending such a proposal. If, therefore, I can see my way to such an alteration being made with reference to polling in the counties, I should be prepared to support this Bill; and I am prepared to support the second reading of it for the purpose of seeing in the Committee how that can be expediently, conveniently, and advantageously carried out. But let me call the attention of the noble Lord to what I called his attention to in the last Session of Parliament, that I think he does not provide sufficiently by this Bill for a proper number of polling places being ensured in the different counties, so as to admit of every voter recording his vote at County Elections. How did the Legislature proceed on this subject when the Reform Bill was introduced? By the Reform Bill it was provided that there should be a convenient number of polling places; and in the Schedules to 2 & 3 Will. IV., c. 64, the different polling places were specified in the different counties. But, the noble Lord purposes, without providing different polling places in the different counties, that the days of polling shall be reduced from two to one. Everything turns upon the question, whether there will be a sufficient number of polling places for all the voters that come up to record their votes. As the Bill now stands, you are leaving that question open and undetermined, and only to be determined upon an application made by the Justices of Peace to the Government, upon whose recommendation the Queen in Council shall have the power of fixing more polling places than are now fixed in the different counties. Now, I think, before Parliament assents to that, they ought to see that the polling places in the different counties are specified in a Schedule to the Bill which you are about to introduce, so that the rights of the voters in this respect should not depend on the mere requisition by the justices or the magistrates of the counties, but should be prescribed in such a way as to convince the House that every voter would have the power of recording his vote. Now, as to the other point, whether there should be an interval of one or two days between the day of nomination and the day of polling, I feel very strongly upon it. I think one day is not a sufficient interval, for supposing a contest arises at the last moment, there will not be a sufficient opportunity for all the voters in large counties to know who the candidates are, and for whom they ought to record their votes. I have a strong objection to that part of the Bill; and I cannot but express my surprise that the hon. Member for the West Riding (Mr. B. Denison) should have put his name to this Bill, containing, as it does, that very proposition to which he now objects. I mention this, because I think it expedient, when Gentlemen put their names to the backs of Bills brought into this House, that we should think they have received the consideration of those Members whose names are appended to them. It is not my intention, however, to oppose the second reading of the Bill, for, I assent to it with pleasure, because I think it will be convenient, if you can do it with as little expense as possible, that the number of polling days should be the same as in boroughs, namely, one. But that part of the Bill providing for polling places, and that part which reduces the interval from two days to one between the day of nomination and the day of election, I own I think ought not to pass into a law, because I think wrong would be done to the different constituencies unless they had proper facilities for recording their votes.

MR. ALCOCK said, he could not understand what objections the hon. Member for Berkshire (Mr. Palmer) could have to this Bill. Did the experience of the hon. Member in that county to which he had adverted, refer to the ousting from the representation of Mr. Pusey, a man who more thoroughly understood the whole question of the agricultural interest than perhaps any Member in that House. He was surprised to think that the hon. Member for Berkshire could not think it possible to do in one day in that county with only 5,000 electors what 20,000 electors had done in one day in the city of London. Besides, as a matter of time, there were now more facilities for taking the poll effectually in counties in one day, than there were in two days in 1832—at the passing of the Reform Bill. At that time they had solely to rely on conveying the voters to the poll by horse power; but now they could everywhere take advantage of the facilities for locomotion by railways. At present a nomination for a county might take place on a Wednesday, and the elections would not be until the following Monday, because if the polling commenced on the Saturday they would have the Sunday intervening. He would ask if that was a proper or reasonable state of things? When the Reform Bill passed, two days for taking the poll were allowed for cities and boroughs as well as for counties, but it was afterwards found expedient to alter that arrangement with respect to cities and boroughs; and the Act repealing that part of the Reform Bill contained these words in its preamble: “Whereas it would tend to promote the purity of election and diminution of expense, if the poll were taken in one day.” Was it the object of the hon. Member for Berkshire and other hon. Members who opposed the Bill to perpetuate the expense of elections, and so, by the power of wealth, prevent the electors having an unrestricted choice of candidates? If the object of hon. Gentlemen was to diminish expense and promote the purity of election, they ought immediately to reduce the number of polling days to one. With respect to the other proposition, for shortening the interval between the nomination and polling day, it might not perhaps be desirable to adopt that provision.

MR. SPOONER said, there was no ground whatever for the imputations on the part of the hon. Member for East Surrey (Mr. Alcock), that those who opposed the Bill did so with the view of giving power to the wealthy, and of preventing the poorer classes of persons coming up to the elections. The noble Lord who proposed the Bill, said he did so only to save expense. He (Mr. Spooner) opposed the Bill, because, instead of diminishing the expenses of elections, he thought it would greatly increase them. In the county which he represented (Warwickshire), many of the voters lived at great distances from their polling places; and he was sure it would be impossible, in the event of a contested election, to give to every freeholder in that county the means of exercising his franchise in one day. He hoped his hon. Friend the Member for Berkshire would press his Amendment to a division, and if he did so, he (Mr. Spooner) would most undoubtedly vote with him.

SIR GEORGE PECELL hoped the hon. Member for Berkshire would not take the advice given him by the hon. Member who last addressed the House, and who came before them on that occasion with the old Tory story of the Reform Bill. The principal objection of the hon. Member who last addressed the House appeared to be whether sufficient time would be allowed, under the Bill, for all the electors to give their votes. He believed there was no foundation for such an objection.

Mr. Walpole

MR. MONSELL said, he thought that great as might be the benefit of the Bill to England, it would be of far greater importance and benefit in Ireland. He believed that a great number of the scenes which they all deplored, and which had taken place in Ireland during the late elections, would be prevented by the passing of such a measure. The system of "housing" now carried on at elections in Ireland was mainly owing to the two days which were occupied by County Elections. He would suggest that the right hon. the Secretary of State for the Home Department should consider the propriety of introducing a clause, if the Bill were extended to Ireland, for abridging the oaths required to be taken by electors, as it frequently happened that in contested elections the persons employed by the sheriffs to administer the oaths read them over extremely slowly or very rapidly, as they conceived might best promote the interests of their favourite candidates, by allowing a larger or smaller number of electors to record their votes in a given time.

MR. SCOTT said, he hoped that the Bill would not be extended either to Ireland or Scotland until some experience had been attained of its working in England. He conceived that in many instances considerable hardship would result from limiting the time of County Elections to one day. Hon. Gentlemen who supported the Bill seemed to forget the convenience of those electors who lived at a distance from the polling places. One of the first contested elections he had been engaged in for the county of Roxburgh took place in the depth of winter, when the roads were almost impassable; the friends of his opponent resided chiefly in the towns, whilst his (Mr. Scott's) friends resided in the country districts. If in that case the polling had been confined to one day, there could be no doubt that great hardship and injustice would have been inflicted. As to intimidation at elections, he believed that the effect of the Bill would be merely to concentrate the efforts of parties to intimidate and coerce the electors more than at present.

LORD MONCK said, he must protest against England being made the ground for an experiment of this nature, and he contended that the Bill ought to be applied equally to Ireland and Scotland. He advocated the limitation of polling to one day, as having a tendency to stop intimidation in Ireland. With regard to the provision shortening the interval between the nomination and polling day, that was a question that could, if it gave rise to objections, be settled in Committee.

MR. W. BROWN said, that no more difficulty would arise from confining the election to one day, than from allowing it to extend as at present, to two days, inasmuch as the voters could come up the day before the day of polling if necessary.

MR. ELLIOT said, that, so far as he could ascertain the opinions of the electors of that part of Scotland with which he was connected, there was a strong desire on their part to have the polling limited to one day; and he would give notice of his intention, at a future stage, to move that the Bill should be extended to Scotland.

MR. LOCKE KING said, he was of opinion that the Bill did not go far enough. One important point was omitted, which was that of reducing the time between the proclamation and the day of election, and he should move in Committee the insertion of a clause to that effect. He supported the Motion for the second reading.

SIR JOHN BULLER said, he trusted that, as the feeling of the great majority appeared to be in favour of the second reading of the Bill, the hon. Member for Berkshire would withdraw his opposition to that Motion. In considering the Bill the Committee ought not to overlook the case of those counties which had not the advantage of great railway communication; and, on the other hand, should not increase expense by giving too large a power for the addition of polling places. With respect to purity of election, he could not anticipate that this Bill would tend very much to that effect. He was happy to say, as regarded English counties, very few complaints of bribery and corruption were ever substantiated, and he believed that there was no probability of the return for any county in England during the last election being disputed.

MR. ROBERT PALMER said, in accordance with the wishes of the House he would withdraw his Amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Main Question put, and agreed to.

Bill read 2^o.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be committed."

MR. VANSITTART said, he begged to move as an Amendment that the Bill, together with that of which the hon. Baronet the Member for the Tower Hamlets (Sir W. Clay) had given notice, should be referred to a Select Committee, in order to ascertain whether any alteration might not be effected in the mode of taking the poll, as well as limiting the time of polling.

Amendment proposed, at the end of the Question to add the words “to a Select Committee.”

Question proposed, “That those words be there added.”

Mr. WALPOLE said, he concurred in the suggestion of referring the Bill to a Select Committee, with a view of ascertaining particularly the position of the various counties with respect to the facilities for the conveyance of electors, and for taking the poll at elections. The Government would state, before Wednesday next, the course which it would be prepared to adopt with respect to the Bill in Committee.

A short discussion then ensued, in which Mr. Spooner, Mr. B. Denison, Mr. Walpole, and Mr. Alcock, took part, when Mr. Vansittart said, he would not press his Amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Bill committed for Wednesday next.

House adjourned at a quarter before Three o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

COMMERCIAL LEGISLATION—FREE TRADE—EXPLANATIONS.

SIR WILLIAM CLAY: Sir, I rise for the purpose of asking, first, of my hon. Friend the Member for Wolverhampton (Mr. C. Villiers), and in the next place of the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer, questions which, not in my own estimation only, but I believe also in the estimation of many other hon. Members, have an important bearing on the proceedings of this House. In so doing I am happy to say that I shall not have occasion, or at least in the very slightest degree, to claim that indulgence which the House ordinarily extends to Members who have questions publicly to ask, namely, the permission to make such previous statement as may render such questions intelligible. [“Order, order!”] I shall not, I repeat, have occasion to avail myself of that—

Mr. COBDEN: Sir, I rise to order. I think it will be admitted on both sides of the House that it will be exceedingly inconvenient that a question should be put, accompanied by a speech, unless it is under circumstances which would admit of a reply. The hon. Gentleman, I submit, would, therefore, better promote the object he has in view if he wishes to make a statement by letting it be understood that he will finish with a Motion.

SIR WILLIAM CLAY: Sir, I have no intention to make any speech, but it is important that I should put the question, because I think it will have an important bearing on our proceedings here to-night. With these simple words of preface then, as my hon. Friend the Member for the West Riding will not permit me the smallest indulgence in that respect, I ask, first, of the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer, because I believe, in so doing, it will be more in accordance with the usage of this House in similar cases, whether he will be willing to withdraw that Amendment which he has put into your hand on the Motion of my hon. Friend the Member for Wolverhampton, on the understanding that if it be withdrawn the House will acquiesce in the Resolution proposed by the noble Lord the Member for Tiverton (Viscount Palmerston)? I ask of my hon. Friend the Member for Wolverhampton whether, on a like understanding, he will be prepared to withdraw his Motion? And again I ask as a second question of the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer, whether, in the event of the hon. Member for Wolverhampton refusing to withdraw his Motion, he (the Chancellor of the Exchequer) will accept the Resolution proposed by my noble Friend the Member for Tiverton as a substitute for his own Amendment?

SIR JAMES GRAHAM: My sense, Sir, of public duty will, I am sorry to say, compel me to make a speech, and to bring myself strictly within the rules of the House. I shall conclude with making a Motion. Sir, I beg in the first place to state, that in a new Parliament—having had long experience in this House—I am one of the last persons who would be disposed to strain the privileges of an individual Member to an undue extent, inconsistent with the transaction of public business; and I shall trust, after the statement which I have to make to the House, that they will be of opinion that this is an exceptional case, and that I am justified in the course I am about to pursue when I make a formal Motion "that this House do now adjourn." Having, Sir, placed myself strictly within the rules of the House, and having given to every Member of the House who may think proper to follow me the opportunity of stating his opinion with respect to the matter now pending, I think it right, after the question put by the hon. Baronet the Member for the Tower Hamlets (Sir Wm. Clay), and before Her Majesty's Government give an answer to the question he put, to make the statement which I am anxious, with the permission of the House, to address to them. The noble Viscount the Member for Tiverton (Viscount Palmerston), at the close of the discussion on Tuesday evening, tendered to the House, not in the form of a direct Motion, but rather in the shape of a suggestion, certain words in lieu both of the original Motion and of the Amendment, which he thought constituted a middle course, and one upon which, consistently with the honour of all parties, we might arrive at an agreement. Now, Sir, it is impossible that I, who am one of the surviving colleagues of the late Sir Robert Peel—who took a most active part in 1846 in pressing on the attention of Parliament the policy of a repeal of the Corn Laws—who had the good fortune, after the dissolution of that Government, to enjoy the confidential friendship of Sir Robert Peel to the last hour of his life—it is impossible I should not feel a deep and peculiar interest in the subject which stands for further discussion on the present occasion. And it is right, Sir, that I should state to the House the exact truth with respect to the part which I have taken, both with reference to the original Motion and with respect to certain words which the noble Lord has suggested as the medium of a possible agreement on both sides of the House. I hope the House will not regard it as presumption on my part if I state frankly all the concern I have had both in the framing of the original Motion, and in reference to the words in question. I did not arrive in London until late in the evening preceding Her Majesty's Speech from the Throne, and on the morning of that Speech, having to take my seat before two o'clock in the afternoon of that day, I had not an opportunity of conferring with any one, except my noble Friend the Earl of Aberdeen, one of my former colleagues, with whom happily I maintain the most cordial and sincere friendship. My noble Friend told me what were the terms of Her Majesty's Speech on the question of an unrestricted policy with respect to matters of trade. He told me, also, that he had, in concert with my former colleagues, considered those words, and that they had come to the conclusion that, upon the whole, it was not expedient to be a party to moving an Amendment on the Address on the occasion; and he added, that he had also had an intimation that the noble Lord the Member for the City of London (Lord John Russell) and his former colleagues had arrived at the same conclusion. Sir, I saw no other person until you took your seat in the chair on that day; but I think I met in the lobby of the House the hon. Member for Manchester (Mr. Bright), who addressed you with so much ability on Tuesday evening, and he informed me that although the opinion of himself and several of his friends had been decidedly in favour of moving an Amendment to the Address on that occasion, yet, to prevent disunion among the friends of free trade in this House, and in a new Parliament, that he had declared his readiness to abstain from moving an Amendment; but that as he, as well as myself and my former Colleagues, and the noble Lord the Member for London, were of opinion that the words of the Speech on the subject of free trade were unsatisfactory, it had been suggested that my hon. Friend the Member for Wolverhampton, on the part of the free-trade party generally, should give notice of a substantive Motion on that subject; and that it was thought on all hands that, considering the part he had taken in these discussions, that he had fought the battle manfully from the beginning, it was due to him, in the last hour of the success of that policy which he had so long and so earnestly advocated, that he should take a prominent part. I told my hon. Friend the Member for Manchester that I entirely agreed in that arrangement—that I was extremely glad there would not be an Amendment to the Address, and that I thought a substantive Motion was preferable, and particularly rejoiced in the selection of my hon. Friend the Member for Wolverhampton as the organ of the Free-trade party in this House on that occasion. So matters stood when I came into the House; and I certainly fully expected, considering that the terms of the Speech were somewhat ambiguous, that the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer, on the part of Her Majesty's Government, would avail himself of the ordinary opportunity, before the commencement of the discussion on the Address, to give notice for a particular day of his intention to introduce the promised measure on the part of the Government. You, Sir, are always most particular on that day, when the mover and seconder of the Address are present, that the discussion should commence at the appointed hour. That hour is half-past four. You waited until twenty minutes to five—longer than usual—in consequence of the absence of the Chancellor of the Exchequer; and when the right hon. Gentleman entered the House, my impression was—and I do not think I was singular in that impression—that he was about to give notice for a particular day on which the measures of the Government would be introduced. He did not do so. The noble Lord the Member for North Northumberland (Lord Lovaine) moved the Address in a speech of great ability; but still I could not fail to remember that he had displaced in the representation of the county of Northumberland one of the most distinguished Members of the Free-trade party—my right hon. Friend Sir George Grey—that he had effected that victory in Northumberland principally on the ground of advocating protection as against free trade, and I could not believe that if protection was to be abandoned, it was a Percy that was to perform that operation in this House. When the speech of the seconder of the Address was nearly concluded, my hon. Friend the Member for Wolverhampton, sitting immediately behind me, stretched forward and asked, "Shall I still give notice of my Motion?"—I did not know what others said—I said, "Certainly, give your notice." That notice was given in point of time before any declaration of the policy of the Government had been pronounced in either House of Parliament, and it was made in the absence of any day being appropriated by the Government for the introduction of those measures which had been promised. I listened with attention to the debate which followed; I weighed well the terms of Her Majesty's Speech; and on the following morning, in addition to the information which I had derived from the discussion here, and from hearing the announcement on the part of the Government, made by the Chancellor of the Exchequer, I had the advantage, through the ordinary channels, of reading what passed elsewhere, and of considering the statement made by the head of the Government. Having been a party to a notice given of a Motion, I frankly avow—considering the position to which I have alluded—that I took particular interest in reference to the mode in which that Motion should be framed; and on the morning of the 12th, having Her Majesty's Speech before me, and the speech to which I have alluded as having been made elsewhere, I endeavoured to frame the terms of that Motion. I shall state to the House without disguise what was the spirit in which I endeavoured to frame that Resolution. I remembered, as the noble Viscount the Member for Tiverton reminded us the other night, that this—whatever may be our differences of opinion—is an assembly of Gentlemen; and I was most anxious, in framing that Resolution, to insert nothing in it which I thought would wound the feelings of any of those who perhaps, without changing their opinions, were ready to change their course with reference to a specific policy about to be triumphant. And also I am bound to say I did not forget that I myself had been a convert from former opinions, and was the very last person in the House who ought not to have some regard for the feelings of others in such circumstances. Now, will the House bear with me whilst I state how I proceeded in framing that Resolution? I took the Speech of Her Majesty and the paragraph which refers to protection and free trade, and I took the speech also made elsewhere, to which I have referred, and I endeavoured to insert in the shape of a Resolution everything which I thought necessary for the distinct assertion of the principle for which those who were attached to the policy of free trade contended, and to omit everything in the Resolution to which those who were willing, under the circumstances, to depart from the policy of protection, and to adopt that of free trade, could reasonably object. That is the spirit in which I endeavoured to frame the Resolution. I have the original Resolution before me as so drawn, and with the permission of the House I will read it. The words are—

"That it is the opinion of this House that the improved condition of the country, and especially of the industrious classes, is in a great measure the result of recent legislation, which has abolished taxes imposed for the purpose of protection, which has thereby diminished the cost of the principal articles of food, and which has established unrestricted competition.

"It is the opinion of this House that, without inflicting injury on any important interest, this policy, firmly maintained and prudently extended, will best enable the industry of the country to bear its burdens, and will thereby most surely promote the welfare and contentment of the community."

These were the original Resolutions; I have already told the House that, though inadequate yet honestly, I do consider myself a representative of the policy to which I was a party, under the guidance of my late most distinguished Friend Sir Robert Peel; and I put to myself the question—if my right hon. Friend were still alive, in the present circumstances, with no sinister object in view—for he disregarded all sinister objects—what with reference to the good of the country and to the security of the policy he had at heart, and its firm maintenance on the surest ground—what, under the present circumstances, would be the line he would take? And I assure you, Sir, and this House, on my honour, that to the best of my judgment, with my intimate knowledge both of his feelings and his general course of proceeding, I believe he would have framed a better Resolution, but a Resolution in the spirit of the one which I have read. Now, I sent this Resolution to my noble Friend the Member for the City of London, with whom, I am happy to say, I have been in cordial and friendly communication. ["Hear!"] Now, that cheer convinces me that there is an undue and an erroneous suspicion that there is a factious party spirit at work; but I am about to show to you—I think conclusively—that you have been premature in coming to that conclusion. What was the answer of my noble Friend? He said to me—

"On the whole, I approve of your words; I have seen none which I prefer; but I think there is an objection to the Resolutions, as they stand without some safeguard. If carried adversely, the Government will be of opinion that they are intended to obstruct the course which they deem it their duty to take, and that it is not desired by the House to see the measures which they have announced as prepared."

And my noble Friend, so far from desiring to pursue a factious course towards the Government, recommended the insertion of the third clause, to which I will now call the attention of the House. It is in these words:—

"That this House will be ready to take into consideration any measures consistent with these principles which, in pursuance of Her Majesty's gracious Speech and recommendation, may be laid before it."

I thought that suggestion admirable; I thought it a great improvement; and it was in entire accordance with my desire that the Government should not be interrupted unduly in the presentation of their measures for the consideration of the House. Having obtained the opinion and sanction of my noble Friend, I then met my Lord Aberdeen and my Colleagues in the Government of the late Sir Robert Peel who had been officially responsible for the repeal of the corn laws. We discussed most carefully the words of the two Resolutions: they underwent some alterations, and the terms of some of them were changed. But in a matter of this kind, the entire truth ought to be stated to the House. I shall state exactly the result of those deliberations, and the changes which were effected in consequence of the interview which I had with my former Colleagues. I will now read how the Resolutions stood after that interview. The first Resolution was in these words:—

"It is the opinion of this House that the improved condition of the country, and especially of the industrious classes, is in a great measure the result of recent legislation, which has established the principle of unrestricted competition, has abolished taxes imposed for the purpose of protection, and has thereby diminished the cost of the principal articles of food."

Now, Sir, I must state to the House that in framing this Resolution, I had particular attention to the words of Her Majesty's Speech; and if the House will allow me, I will call their attention to those words. The part to which I am about to call the attention of the House states the matter hypothetically—

"If you should be of opinion that recent legislation, in contributing, with other causes, to this unhappy"—

[Laughter.] I beg pardon of the House—

—"this happy result has, at the same time, inflicted unavoidable injury on certain important interests, I recommend you dispassionately to consider how far it may be practicable equitably to mitigate their injury, and to enable the industry of the country to meet successfully that unrestricted competition to which Parliament in its wisdom has decided that it should be subjected."

Now, understanding distinctly from the various speeches made, both in this House and elsewhere, that if the policy of a countervailing duty on corn were abandoned, it was thought indispensable by the Government that compensation for alleged injury should then be sought by some other mode than by a countervailing duty, I thought that these words, which had been deliberately adopted by the Cabinet, and which Her Majesty under such advice had delivered from the Throne, studiously raised the presumption that such "injury" had been inflicted, and opened the door to the admission of compensation. Now, I will tell the House frankly, that in framing the second Resolution, I sought to traverse that presumption, and to assert—at least by implication—that there was no such injury, and that in reference to the future, the policy of free trade might be firmly maintained, and even prudently extended, without inflicting any injury upon any class—thereby shutting the door against compensation. Now, it is rather a nicety—but it is necessary that the whole truth should be stated. As I drew the Resolution at first, I had put these words:—

"It is the opinion of this House that without inflicting injury upon any important interest, this policy, firmly maintained and prudently extended, will enable the industry of the country to bear its burdens."

Thus placed, the Resolution might be supposed to have a retrospective effect, as well as a prospective. I individually had the strongest opinion that there is no case which gives a retrospective claim to compensation; but still I am bound to say that some of my former Colleagues in the Government of the late Sir Robert Peel thought that that question would be more fairly left open—that the Resolution should be merely prospective in its effect, and not combine the retrospective and prospective assertion of the principle. It was thought better that these words just quoted should follow after the word "will," rather than precede it, thus giving it entirely a prospective, and removing altogether the retrospective character of the sentence. It was accordingly thus amended:—

"It is the opinion of this House that this policy, firmly maintained and prudently extended, will, without inflicting injury upon any important interests, best enable the industry of the country to bear its burdens, and will thereby most surely promote the welfare and contentment of the people."

I was willing to adopt that suggestion, because I felt that whenever the question arose, and the Government thought fit to raise it with respect to compensation for the past, I should be enabled then to say,

"this policy strictly maintained did not give rise to any just claim for compensation." I was content, therefore, to withdraw those words which might be supposed to have reference to the past, leaving only those which had a prospective effect. Subject to these observations, I adopted the Resolutions as I have read them to the House; and I placed them at the disposal of the noble Lord the Member for the City of London, in order that he might see whether it were possible to obtain a common consent to them. The Resolutions became the subject of discussion among the most distinguished Members who had been the consistent advocates of the repeal of the corn laws. It was deemed by them that the reference to the repeal of the corn laws should be more specific, and that it should be declared in express terms that that "Act was a wise, just, and beneficial measure." Now, Sir, considering the course which I have taken with respect to that repeal, if the question were put to me absolutely, Will you or can you dissent from the terms of that Resolution? I could not, as an honest man, say that I dissented from them. I certainly say that I should have infinitely preferred—perhaps from an overweening parental partiality—adherence to my own words; but when I found that they would not command general assent, I said at once, "If it be the opinion of a majority—a decided majority—of free-traders that there should be that special reference in these terms to the repeal of the corn laws, I cannot refuse my assent to that proposition." I heard no more of this until the Government—I think on the Friday following—presented the terms of their Amendment. I looked deliberately at that Amendment; and I must say that, weighing the difference of those terms, and considering the grave objections which I entertained to them—to which it would be inexpedient now to refer, but which, if the discussion should proceed, I hope by the kind indulgence of the House to be allowed to state—considering that I had to decide between the Amendment laid upon the table and the original Resolution as proposed by my hon. Friend the Member for Wolverhampton, I had no doubt that it would be my duty to support the original Motion. And I must add, that if the question of free trade is to turn upon words, I was more disposed to adopt the words of the consistent advocate of the repeal of the corn laws, in the person of my hon. Friend the Member for Wolver-hampton, rather than take the words of the Government suggested by the Chancellor of the Exchequer. I heard no more of this until nearly the close of the debate on Tuesday evening, when the noble Viscount the Member for Tiverton, certainly without any previous concert with me, proposed the Amendment which is now upon the table of the House. The terms of this Amendment are conditional—in the event of either the original Resolution or Amendment being withdrawn, the noble Lord will move it. The House will recollect the words of the Resolution as agreed upon between the noble Lord the Member for the City of London and myself; and the House will now see how nearly the words in the Amendment of the noble Viscount are in conformity with them. The Amendment of the noble Viscount proceeds as follows:—

“That it is the opinion of this House that the improved condition of the country, and especially of the industrious classes, is mainly the result of recent legislation, which has established the principle of unrestricted competition, has abolished taxes for the purpose of protection”—

Then comes a small alteration. In my Resolution the words were

In the Amendment of the noble Viscount there is an insertion which I think of importance. The words inserted are, “and increased the abundance.” The sentence runs thus: “—and has thereby diminished the cost and increased the abundance of the principal articles of food.” Now, Sir, the reason which has induced me, from a sense of duty, to rise before the right hon. Gentleman answers the question of the hon. Baronet the Member for the Tower Hamlets (Sir W. Clay) is a most important variation in the words tendered by the noble Viscount, as contrasted with the words to which the noble Lord the Member for the City of London and myself had given our previous consent. The noble Viscount says—

I had inserted here the words

—“without inflicting injury upon any important interest—”

These words have entirely disappeared, and the proposition now is, that, these words being omitted, the sentence shall run to bear its burdens, and will thereby most surely promote the welfare and contentment of the people”

I told the House distinctly that these words, “without inflicting injury on any important interest,” with the Queen’s Speech before me, were deliberately inserted by me, and adopted by my noble Friend and my Colleagues in the Government of the late Sir Robert Peel, prospectively for the purpose of barring the question of compensation for the future. I attach the greatest importance to those words; and whatever may be the feelings of others—before the Government gives the answer as to whether they will adopt or reject the proposal of the noble Viscount—I thought it but fair to tell Her Majesty’s Government and the House the course I had taken, and that, so far as I am concerned, I could not be a party to a compromise of the question if these words are omitted. On the other hand, if there could be common consent to the insertion of these words—if the Government would assent to the reinsertion, I, for one—having no authority to speak for others, but still, for the sake of free trade itself, and for the sake of combining the largest possible support to a Resolution fixing great principles, upon the eve of the introduction of a measure by Her Majesty’s Government having reference to those principles, and from an anxious desire that those principles should be sustained by the largest possible majority, if not by the common consent of the House—I would earnestly, sincerely, and, if it be necessary for me to say so, would honestly entreat my hon. Friend the Member for Wolverhampton in that case, with the consent of the House, to withdraw his original Motion, and to adopt the Amendment. I am ashamed of having trespassed upon the time of the House, but I thought it might consider my intrusion an exceptional case, in reference to this subject; but I can assure you that I was actuated by no motive whatever of a personal or a sinister kind. If it would not be considered as inconsistent with the honour of the Government, I believe that, with the concurrence of my friends on this side, we might arrive at a most reasonable settlement, and one satisfactory to the great majority of the House; so that to-morrow the Government, without any interruption or difficulty, might have the opportunity of introducing its measures. We then should have the opportunity of giving them the fairest and fullest consideration. For my part, I am ready to consider them, not in a hostile, but in a friendly spirit—since they are to be founded on the principles for which I am contending—and I shall fairly try any measure of compensation which might be proposed by the most rigid rules of equity and justice.

The Motion for the adjournment of the House having been seconded,

LORD LOVAINE said, that he should not now have intruded himself upon the attention of the House, after having so lately addressed it, had it not been for the personal allusion made to him by the right hon. Baronet the Member for Carlisle (Sir J. Graham). It was true that he (Lord Lovaine) did beat Sir George Grey at the last election for North Northumberland. It was true, also, that he beat that right hon. Gentleman by polling a larger number of votes than the right hon. Gentleman had polled at the previous election. It was true, likewise, that he beat the right hon. Gentleman after he had been tried five years as the representative of that county. But it was equally true that the contest was conducted in the fairest, most open, and most gentleman-like manner; and he believed Sir George Grey left the hustings, on that occasion, with the same good feeling that he (Lord Lovaine) had entertained when he himself was a beaten candidate at the election before. He was aware that with the gratification of the victory, he had likewise to incur the difficulty of maintaining this high position, but he certainly did not expect that, upon entering the House for the first time after a lapse of twenty years, he should be subjected thus early to a direct and personal attack. It was the more extraordinary when he reflected that amongst the many changes and chances of the political career of the right hon. Baronet's (Sir J. Graham's), he was only a few years ago in direct opposition to Sir George Grey. ["Question!"] He would speak to the question, and he would declare his conviction that the object of the debate was not the triumph of the principle of Free Trade, but it was merely the effort of a faction to procure the defect and discomfiture of the opposite party. He believed that the right hon. Baronet had stated that the house of Percy ought to be the last to abandon the cause of Protection. He supposed that it was owing to the changes already alluded to that the right hon. Baronet had forgotten that upon his side of the question, under the late Sir Robert Peel, stood the heads of the house of Percy. And why had he (Lord Lovaine) come forward for the county of Northumberland? Simply and solely because, though the heads of the house of Percy had voted for the introduction of corn free of duty, because they believed that it would be for the public good, they were determined not to see the farmers run down, not to allow their complaints to pass unheeded, and their sufferings to remain unredressed. He had been misrepresented the first night of the Session, and that for the sake of a poor antithesis. What he had stated then, and upon the hustings broadly and openly was, that in his opinion duties should be imposed for revenue and not for Protection; but that efforts should be made to secure justice to the farmer by the abolition of all the restrictions to which he was subjected; and he would appeal to the right hon. the Member for Oxford, if there was anything in that statement contrary to the doctrines of Free Trade. He had to apologise to the House for thus trespassing upon their patience in a matter personal to himself; but he trusted that it would be remembered that it was hardly possible for him to sit still, when called upon in so personal and unusual a manner.

MR. GLADSTONE: I wish, Sir, to say a few words with respect to the question raised by my right hon. Friend (Sir J. Graham), and I rise simply in the hope that anything which may fall from me may only be of such a character as to contribute to an issue of these discussions such as shall be at once satisfactory to the feelings of the great body of the people and likely to promote the undisputed permanence of the present commercial policy of the country. I venture to hope that some progress has been made towards a settlement of that question, and that if we can agree upon the question which has been raised by the right hon. Baronet with respect to the insertion of certain words in the Amendment, suggested by my noble Friend near me (Viscount Palmerston), that then, although we should not be entitled, in point of form, to say that either the Amendment of the Government or the original Motion of the hon. Member for Wolverhampton (Mr. C. Villiers) had been withdrawn, yet that both these concessions would be made by both parties respectively interested to the general feeling, and that we might come to something like a common agreement. Now, the whole question before us relates to one only of the two changes which have been made in the Resolution. There is a change in the Resolution of the phrase "in a great measure" to the word "mainly." I do not believe that any Gentleman considers that any objection is to be taken to that change, and shall therefore speak only of the words proposed to be inserted in the second Resolution. It is proposed to insert after the word "policy," the words "firmly maintained and prudently extended;" and the question we have to consider is, what will be the bearing of these words upon the sense of the Amendments, and how far it will be agreeable to the feelings and wishes of the great body of the House that those words should be inserted. It is now necessary for me to state what my responsibility is with respect to the present Motion. I am one of those, I confess, who strongly felt that it was necessary, under the circumstances of the election of the present Parliament, that a sanction, the most full and formal which our Constitution contemplates, should, so far as depends upon Parliament, be given in express words to the policy of free trade. And, therefore, I have been entirely favourable to the view of a proposition being submitted to this House on the subject, failing a distinct declaration on the subject in the Speech from the Throne. At the same time I so entirely sympathise with my right hon. Friend (Sir J. Graham) in the feeling that it was most desirable, if it could be obtained, to avoid the introduction into such a Motion of any words—I will not say which were disgraceful, but—which were deemed or thought disparaging to any body of Gentlemen in this House—I go to a further point, and do not hesitate to accept the responsibility for myself individually which the right hon. Baronet has just ascribed to several of his Colleagues in the Government of my illustrious Friend the late Sir Robert Peel—the responsibility of holding the opinion that the question of compensation, or relief, or redress, or whatever you may choose to call it, to the agricultural interest, important as that question may be, and strong as our opinions may be upon the one part of it or another, was a question which ought not to be settled in a Motion directed simply to the purpose of establishing the policy of free trade. It appeared to me that we had but one of two alternatives to adopt. We knew quite well that the Members of the Government had given out to their constituents, and had universally held out to them, either that Protection would be restored, or that, if Protection was not restored, endeavours would be made to afford specific relief to that interest supposed to be injured by the effects of the free-trade policy. The right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer had given notice that, on the 26th of this month, he would propose his Budget to the House, and it was to be presumed that in that Budget proposals of this nature would be included. I do not think, I confess, whether rightly or wrongly, that in respect to these questions of compensation which are supposed to be connected with the repeal of the Corn Laws, that we ought to preclude the Government from submitting any measures whatever which in their opinion they might think right by an anticipatory vote of this House. I held that it was plain we had but one of two courses to take—either to allow the Government to go forward with unfettered hands, and to propose their Budget upon the principles owned and acknowledged by them, among which I am happy now to include the principle of free trade; or else, by meeting them at once with a vote of want of confidence, in a true, sound, and constitutional manner to exercise the functions of the House to put a period at once to the existence of the Administration. So far, therefore, as regards this question, it appeared to me that it was not our duty to take a vote at the present moment on the subject of relief to any interest supposed to be injured by recent legislation, but that we ought to wait for the proposal of the measures of the Government, and to try their measures upon their merits, objecting, of course, to measures of compensation, should we find such measures included among them, where our opinion leads us to decline to follow such a course of conduct. My right hon. Friend the Member for Carlisle, on the other hand, attaches, I believe, considerable importance to the readmission of these words, and I understand the right hon. Baronet to have given to the House in the most distinct manner the construction which he fixes upon them. I frankly say that his construction is wholly unexceptionable to me. He says that he proposes to exclude the claim of compensation with respect to prospective measures, by the phrase in his Motion—that in deference to others, more than in pursuance of his own views, he has been content to leave the question of compensation or relief, so far as it grows out of past measures of policy, to be tried when we come to consider the proposals of Her Majesty's Government. If this be so, I think, if the House has a sense of what is due to its own dignity and to its own character in the country—that if there be happily a disposition in the various parties and sections of which this House is composed to seek for grounds of agreement, rather than of occasions of difference—I think I may say that the Resolution of the right hon. Baronet, admirably drawn up by a master hand as I think it was, and filled up with the words he proposes to insert, would be a Resolution which may be adopted both by the hon. Mover of the original Motion, and the right hon. Proposer of the Amendment of the Government, without the slightest dishonour or disparagement, and without the slightest sacrifice of consistency on either side. The Resolution so adopted will leave open every question which the Government can wish should be left open, and it will finally close up that great Imperial question which, upon this side of the House, we all feel the time has arrived finally to close. If this view be taken—such, at any rate, is my conviction—this Resolution will afford us the means of meeting on common ground for the purpose of considering measures alike beneficial to the country and honourable to the moderation and good sense of the parties of which this House is composed. I venture, therefore, for myself, earnestly and respectfully, to make an appeal to my noble Friend (Viscount Palmerston) near me. The spirit with which he has entered into the discussion is one with which I do not hesitate entirely to concur. I cannot, however, refrain from saying that, although my mind was fully made up to support the Motion of the hon. Member for Wolverhampton in preference to the Amendment of the Government, had that been the issue raised, yet I cannot help saying that, while there are several grounds which would have made it painful to me, as well as to my right hon. Friend, to take that course in opposition to the Government, I should still have taken it without the slightest doubt or hesitation, though not without regret. My noble Friend near me has by his Amendment saved us from this alternative, which would not have been satisfactory to the great bulk of the House; and I must also say that I think the country would have been perplexed and puzzled by a close division, upon whichever side, between the two Motions so nearly approximating in their terms the original Motion of the hon. Member for Wolverhampton and the Amendment of the right hon. the Chancellor of the Exchequer. I believe that the interests of the Free-trade policy, which are to be considered as paramount, will be infinitely better served by the concurrence of the great bulk and body of this House in the adoption of the Amendment of the noble Lord the Member for Tiverton, with the addition of those words referred to by the right hon. Baronet the Member for Carlisle (Sir J. Graham), than they could possibly be by the defeat of the Motion of the hon. Member for Wolverhampton by a narrow majority, or even by its acceptance by a majority in all probability not much larger.

MR. T. DUNCOMBE said: We have been reminded, over and over again, that this is a new House of Commons, and that it is so is evident not only from the nature of the opposition, but from the whole course of proceeding on this debate on both sides; for in the nine Parliaments during which I have sat in this House, I never before saw anything like the manner in which it appears the House, and, what is still more to the purpose, the people out of doors, are about to be trifled with. It was only the other evening (Friday) that it was resolved there should be a call of the House on Monday. Monday came, and 400 or 500 Members assembled to answer to their names; but instead of calling them over as they had resolved, and for which purpose only those Members had been summoned, the House immediately proceeded to vote what it had voted on the previous Friday, and that in the absence of the hon. Member for Montrose (Mr. Hume), at whose instance the Resolution had been passed. I confess I should like to have seen my hon. Friend's face when he learned that the call of the House had been abandoned. But we were told the whole purpose of the call was answered, some thirty or forty Members having come to the table and taken the oath of abjuration, which having done, of course they immediately went out of town again. Well, we have had one night's debate on the Resolution of my hon. Friend (Mr. C. Villiers), and some of the best speeches I ever heard, particularly that of the hon. Member for Manchester (Mr. Bright), have been spoken. We were told that we had a great duty to perform to the people. We were to declare that the legislation of 1846 was wise, just, and beneficial, and that not a word of the Resolution of my hon. Friend, in which that declaration was contained, was to be changed. And not only that, we were told that there was a tribute, a debt, due to the memory of that illustrious man who passed the Act of 1846, which could only be paid by a public recognition of the policy on which that Act was founded. Now, after all this, we have these various Amendments. First, there is the Amendment of the Government; then we have the Amendment of the noble Lord the Member for Tiverton (Viscount Palmerston); and now, it appears, we are to have something more recent from the right hon. Baronet the Member for Carlisle (Sir James Graham). What next were they to have? The right hon. Member for Oxford University (Mr. Gladstone), told them that the country would be puzzled and perplexed at their proceedings; the country might well be puzzled and perplexed at them. Now, what I should recommend is this: the right hon. Baronet the Member for Carlisle has moved that the House should now adjourn. The right hon. Gentleman has moved that as a matter of form. Now, I say, we had better take the right hon. Gentleman at his word, and let the House adjourn until it can make up its mind—or that we should constitute a Committee, and put the hon. Member for the Tower Hamlets (Sir W. Clay) at its head, to draw out this Amendment—this Amendment upon an Amendment—which we are to have, to which all are to agree, which is to settle the whole question, and make us all friendly, and prevent anything more being said either about Protection or Free Trade. I see no reason why we should not adopt the Motion, and adjourn at once for that purpose. But as questions appear to be the order of the day, there is one party, I think, of whom a question should be asked, and that is the noble Viscount the Member for Tiverton. How came the noble Viscount by the right hon. Baronet's Amendment? By what method of "appropriation" did he obtain that document? But this new Amendment is conditional, it will be observed—it is only to be brought forward in case the Resolution of my hon. Friend (Mr. C. Villiers), and the Amendment of the Government, should be withdrawn. Are we to understand, then, that there is to be no division? But suppose the debate proceeds—and I thought it a very pretty quarrel as it stood, and am truly sorry it was disturbed—but suppose the debate is continued, and the Amendment of the Government should be carried, and my hon. Friend (Mr. C. Villiers) should be defeated—what I want to know is, will the noble Viscount then move his Amendment to the Resolution of the Government, which will then become the main question, and which it will of course be competent for him to do? If he do not, the country will not be much perplexed—they will then say the whole affair is a cross. The country will begin to think that those Gentlemen below me—the Whigs—and I only wish Whiggery was about to be buried for ever with Protection—feel they are not quite ripe for office—that they have not quite made up their minds for office—though no doubt the right hon. Baronet the Member for Carlisle has been rewhiggied for the occasion. They—the country—will understand that the cause of all this mess in which we find ourselves involved is, that the party below me are not quite prepared to turn out the Gentlemen opposite. We were made fools of on Monday last, as though it had been the 1st of April—we have discussed the question brought forward by my hon. Friend (Mr. C. Villiers) a whole night, and we are on the point of discussing it again, and bringing it to a conclusion, as I hoped, satisfactory to the people of this country—and now we suddenly find ourselves removed further than ever from that settlement. Under these circumstances, I hope the House will agree to adjourn, and leave hon. Gentlemen below me some time to settle amicably as they may the difference that appears to exist between them.

MR. CAYLEY trusted that he might be allowed to address the House upon the point at issue, the more especially as he was an old soldier upon this question, and he hoped that he had been a consistent one. Ever since protection had been abolished in 1846, he for one had never endeavoured to restore it. He was perfectly conscious that it never could be restored. When the hon. Member for Wolverhampton made his speech the other night upon the Address, he thought that if that hon. Member did not know that protection was dead, and that there was no possibility of restoring it, he was the only man in the country who was ignorant of the fact. It seemed to him, therefore, to be somewhat unfair that he should be placed in such a position as that predicament in which he now found himself—without any locus pœnitentia—without any means of escape. He admitted that free trade had conquered protection. After the verdict of the country pronounced by the recent election, he for one would never attempt to restore protection, nor try to obtain compensation, except for financial injustice. The passage in the Address which was the subject of criticism, as he understood it, meant that, if the finances of the country did not correspond with the recent commercial legislation, then the Chancellor of the Exchequer would propose such measures as were equitable and just. With less than justice he should not be content. That was what he understood was recommended in the Speech from the Throne. For his part he was ready to be loyal to the law; and it was unfair, when he was willing to obey the law and carry it out with simplicity and singleness of purpose, that he should be asked to recant everything which he had ever said. Freedom of person, freedom of speech, were still left them, and he was in hope that a liberal Opposition would have also allowed them liberty of thought. He did not recant his opinions, although he might have modified them. At the same time he saw the House placed in a most unusual dilemma, and he thought that it would be for the national interest, and for the benefit of the public service, if some concessions were made upon all sides. He, for one, was perfectly willing to permit the words of the right hon. Baronet the Member for Carlisle to pass without opposition, if the hon. Members for the West Riding and Manchester should consent to them; and he entreated his hon. Friends whom he saw around him to allow the discussion to come to an end, and to leave the policy of free trade, which they could not reverse, free from attack. As to Sir Robert Peel, he always gave him credit for the honesty of his convictions. He did not object, on the contrary he thought he was quite right, having changed his convictions, to change his policy. There was only some difference between them as to the mode in which he carried out his change of opinion, as regarded his party. Wishing to see this unseemly discussion closed, he implored the House to forget all party dissensions, and at once to proceed to transact the other business of the nation, contenting themselves with the acknowledgment by Gentlemen upon his side that protection is dead, and cannot, under circumstances like the present, by any possibility be restored.

MR. ROBERT PALMER said, he thought the matter had been quite sufficiently debated. The question at issue was, whether the Government should be called upon to assert an abstract proposition, or whether the House would adopt the Amendment moved by the Government. Now he had no hesitation in saying that his own feelings, and that of a large number of his friends, were in direct antagonism to the Motion of the hon. Member for Wolverhampton (Mr. C. Villiers), and that he should record his vote against it. He could not possibly concur in the first paragraph of that Resolution, namely, that the Act of 1846 was wise, just, and beneficial. He had had some experience in that House, and had hardly expected to be called upon, and certainly was not prepared, to turn round and recant all he had said for the last twenty-six years. He did not concur that in the opinion of the House the maintenance and further extension of the policy of Free Trade, as opposed to that of Protection, would best enable the property and industry of the nation to bear the burdens to which they are exposed, and would most contribute to the general prosperity, welfare, and contentment of the people. If he accepted that paragraph, he would be casting a slur, he would be pronouncing a condemnation of all their previous conduct. For his part, he was not prepared to recant the opinions which he had previously expressed and previously advocated; opinions which he begged the House to remember were not formed to-day or yesterday, upon this subject of protection to native industry. They were opinions which had been framed on the opinions of Mr. Huskisson, on the opinions of Mr. Canning, on the opinions of Sir Robert Peel, on the opinions of the noble Lord the Member for London (Lord John Russell), and last, not least, upon the authority of the right hon. Baronet the Member for Carlisle (Sir J. Graham). He had not adopted them hastily, or without consideration. They were, however, perfectly aware that the sense of the country was against their opinions. They felt perfectly confident that if they were to propose a direct Motion to renew the duty on corn, they would be left in a small minority. He was totally ignorant what course the Government would pursue. All he wished to say was, that if they adopted the proposition of the noble Lord the Member for Tiverton (Viscount Palmerston), he protested against being made a party to that Resolution. The country might be in favour of Free Trade, and he bowed to its decision; but if it were put to him "aye, or no," to say whether for the last six-and-twenty years he had been all wrong, and that he would on no occasion endeavour to procure means of remedying or alleviating the distresses of that class which, he believed, had been injured—he must protest against being made a party to such a Resolution.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON: I cannot but hope, Sir, that the conversation which has taken place this afternoon affords an indication that we have a prospect of coming nearer to an agreement upon this great question than I had ventured to anticipate. I must say that what we have heard from the hon. Member for the North Riding of Yorkshire (Mr. Cayley) is alike honourable to him and gratifying to us, as coming from a man of his position in the House and in the country, who, always perfectly independent, always respected for his excellent judgment and sound sense, has hitherto strongly supported Protection; and who now, finding himself defeated on that question, gracefully acknowledges his defeat, and yields his private convictions to his sense of public duty and national interest. I should hope, also, that his example will influence those who have acted with him, and that others on that side of the House will adopt the advice which my hon. Friend—if he will allow me to call him so—has so judiciously propounded to the House. My hon. Friend the Member for Finsbury (Mr. T. Duncombe) has put a question to me; he wants to know how I came by the Resolution that was originally framed by my right hon. Friend (Sir J. Graham). I can only tell the hon. Gentleman that I came by it by very lawful means. I made a slight alteration in it, for the purpose, as I imagined, of avoiding discussion now on collateral points—as to compensation, for example—it being understood that the words proposed by my right hon. Friend apply to the future, and leave the Government open to propose such measures as they please with regard to the past, leaving us equally open to object to those measures if they ever should be brought forward. I have no objection to the insertion of those words, and I understand the hon. Member for the North Riding also to assent to those words. Now, Sir, my hon. Friend the Member for Finsbury has asked a more practical question. My hon. Friend asks what shall I do, supposing the Resolution of my hon. Friend (Mr. C. Villiers) to be rejected—will I then propose my Amendment as a substitute for the Amendment which Her Majesty's Government have tendered? I will answer that question by asking another question. Will he support me if I do so? [Mr. T. DUNCOMBE: Yes; I will, as against the Government.] Well, I assure him that if I am encouraged to expect adequate support in that Motion, I shall undoubtedly propose it; and I should really hope, from what has passed this night, supposing the Motion of my hon. Friend to be either withdrawn or to be negatived—that is to say, the putting of it to be negatived—that I might hope to have a general acquiescence in the Resolution of which I have given notice, and for which, as the House is aware, I am greatly indebted to my right hon. Friend the Member for Carlisle (Sir J. Graham). But, Sir, I do trust that both sides of the House will agree that it really is of great national importance that this great question should be set at rest; the question being, not what hon. Gentlemen on one side of the House or on the other side think of the justice or the wisdom of the measures of 1846, but what they determine to do in regard to the maintenance of that policy, and to its prudent extension, so far as it may yet remain to extend it; and if the House be of opinion that that policy must be maintained—and I think there can hardly be ten Members of the House of a different opinion, because all must see, whatever they may wish, that its reversal is unattainable—if the House, or a majority of the House, have opened their eyes to the truth that that policy is irresistibly established, and that it is beyond the power of any party in this country to reverse it—I say let them calm the public mind; let them set at rest those expectations which may still linger in the breasts of persons out of doors, that by some change on the part of the Government that policy may by possibility be reversed; let this House answer by a solemn affirmation the question put to it by Her Majesty's Government when the present Parliament assembled; and, without inquiring what are the opinions of individual Members on past transactions, let us, unanimously if possible—if not, by the largest possible majority—affirm what is to be henceforward the foundation of the commercial legislation of the country.

SIR BULWER LYTTON said, that the sole question which the House had to decide was, the adoption of a form of words affirming the principle of free trade, which should satisfy the common sense of the great body of the people out of doors, and, at the same time, should not inflict an insidious condemnation on Gentlemen upon his side of the House for having conscientiously advocated the principles which they believed to be true. For his part, he could not accept the Resolution of the hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for Wolverhampton, because it did insinuate a condemnation upon the motives and past conduct of his hon. Friends. The noble Lord the Member for Tiverton had, however, proposed a Resolution which was worthy of one who had been long accustomed to unite our national honour with our political interests. He had listened with very great attention to the speeches of the right hon. Member for the University of Oxford, and of the right hon. Baronet the Member for Carlisle. In the Resolution they proposed there were certain expressions in it which made him prefer the Amendment of the Chancellor of the Exchequer; but he felt that having agreed upon the thing they meant to do, there was no necessity for extreme niceness of verbal criticism, provided the honour of Gentlemen was sufficiently protected. He did not consider, in having accepted the Resolution, that he was thereby precluded from doing his best for his constituents in the way of relief—not, indeed, attempting to obtain a renewal of protection under false names, but by a fair and impartial application of free trade, which, indeed, was what the farmers themselves demanded. Cordially agreeing in what had fallen from the hon. Member for the North Riding of Yorkshire, he called upon Gentlemen opposite to exhibit the same conciliatory spirit. It seemed to him that it would be something majestic and worthy of them, as a representative assembly, if they could on such an occasion lay aside their party interests and political jealousies, and join unanimously in the affirmation of a principle which was to guide their future policy. It was for the interest of the principle itself that its affirmation should not be carried by an insignificant majority; when the evil incurred by the bitterness of contest would be ill compensated by the insignificance of the triumph. He, therefore, earnestly recommended hon. Gentlemen to follow the example his hon. Friend had set, and thus propose the final and peaceful settlement of this momentous question.

The MARQUESS of GRANBY: Sir, I
Sir B. Lytton

was anxious to ascertain, whether or no the hon. Member for Wolverhampton (Mr. C. Villiers) would accept or reject the proposal made to him.

MR. BRIGHT: The question was put to the Government, and not to him.

The MARQUESS of GRANBY: Well, of course, I must leave the hon. Gentleman the Member for Wolverhampton to decide for himself whether or not he will persevere with his Motion. For my own part, Sir, I have no hesitation in saying, that I hope the hon. Gentleman will persevere with his Motion. ["Hear, hear!"] Yes, I say, I hope he will. I heard the hon. Member for Manchester (Mr. Bright) declare the other evening that those hon. Gentlemen who pretended to be free-traders, but who were not prepared to vote for the Motion of the hon. Member for Wolverhampton in approval of "recent legislation," were no free-traders at all. Now, my own opinion is, and I tell the noble Lord the Member for Tiverton (Viscount Palmerston), that if he does not divide upon his Amendment, the opinion will go out to America that the House of Commons is in favour of Protection—that he dared not divide the House on the question. Last year a similar Motion was proposed in this House, and I received no answer to the speech which I then made—no answer to it is made now, and I foresee that, in the present House, unless the hon. Member perseveres with his Motion, that I will not have an opportunity of addressing it. Sir, I, for one, cannot give my assent to any one of these Resolutions. I totally dissent from each and all of them. I agree with an hon. Gentleman who has spoken, that there is so much confusion—so much mystification—so much doubt and obscurity about them, that I, as well as others, am quite at a loss to make out what the difference between the several propositions is. I own, Sir, that I am completely baffled. So that, if this debate be continued, I hope that I may not be debarred from expressing my opinion; but, in case I should not have that opportunity, I now distinctly avow my determination to dissent from all those Resolutions or Amendments. I do not think, whilst I admit the general prosperity of the country, that that prosperity is owing to recent commercial legislation. I think it is owing to other causes. I believe that the Free Trade system itself has not as yet been fully developed. I must repeat a hope that the House will give me another opportunity of relieving my mind upon this question—upon the question whether or no the country at large has been benefited by those commercial measures—I mean permanently benefited; for I do not deny that the poorer classes are better off now than they were previously to 1846; and I say, further, that if this be so, I think that some apology—some acknowledgment—is due to the memory of that distinguished individual. [“Hear, hear!”] Yes, Sir, I say that some acknowledgment is due to the memory of that man whose patriotism I, for one, never doubted—and the purity of whose motives I never impugned. I say that, if what is alleged in the Resolution proposed to us be true, which I deny—then that some acknowledgment is due to his memory—an acknowledgment that he was not only patriotic and conscientious, but that he was also foreseeing and sagacious. May I add one word; may I address myself for one moment to my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer—may I tell him that I cordially agree with him in what he stated the other night? I fully admit that the right hon. Gentleman never brought the question of Protection before the House of Commons. But I am sure that he, too, will be ready to admit that, at all events, he has been generously, and without reserve, supported by the Protectionist party on this question, both in this House and out of it. Sir, with these few words I quit the subject for the present. I am not about to oppose myself to the deliberate verdict of the country as expressed against Protection. It is not my wish to agitate England in favour of that principle; but, entertaining the opinion as I do, that the prosperity which I admit exists, and which, I fear, will not last, is owing to other causes than Free Trade, I beg to conclude, thanking the House for the indulgence with which they have listened to me, by saying that I reserve to myself the right to maintain those opinions whenever and wherever I may think fit to advocate them.

MR. BUTLER JOHNSTONE said, that he had listened with the greatest attention to the remarks of hon. Gentlemen on both sides of the House, and had come to the conclusion that there was but little use in the House of Commons wasting its time about a mere abstract form of words. He believed the real question was the passing a formal Resolution as to whether Free Trade was to be adopted or not. After the frank admission of the noble Lord at the head of the Government, and the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer, that they bowed to the decision of the country, he thought it useless to discuss the subject further. For his own part he entirely coincided in the Amendment, and in the observations of his right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer. As for Protection itself, there was no longer any use in talking about it—never was an enemy so stabbed, maimed, and mutilated. As an independent Member of that House, and exercising a free and unbiassed opinion, he would vote against the Resolutions of the hon. Member for Wolverhampton, because they contained an indirect attack upon the policy, character, and conduct of hon. Members on his (Mr. Johnstone's) side of the House.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: My hon. Friend the Member for Berkshire seems somewhat to complain that I have not before replied to the question of the hon. Baronet the Member for the Tower Hamlets; but I confess that that question was of so peculiar a character that it was difficult for me to address myself to it. It seemed, in fact, to be a contingency dependent upon an hypothesis—“If an hon. Gentleman with whom I have no political connexion is prepared to do something, am I then prepared to do something else?” I naturally thought that the most logical and legitimate course would have been for the hon. and learned Member for Wolverhampton, or his friends, to have expressed their feelings upon the subject first; and then, when I was acquainted with their views, I could, of course, communicate my own to the House. But as the hon. and learned Gentleman has not risen, I, on the part of the Government, take the liberty now of addressing you. My noble Friend the Member for North Leicestershire (the Marquess of Granby) has reminded me how generously, and without reserve, I have been supported by the Protectionist party in this House and in the country; and I can truly say, Sir, that ever since I have been honoured by that confidence, of which till the last hour of my life I shall be proud, I have done every thing that any ability I possess could command, or any energy I had could accomplish, in behalf of the cause of the land of England. I think it has been unjustly treated by recent legislation; but, as far as the terms go which I have used in the Amendment I have laid upon the table of the House, I cannot resist the conviction that recent legislation, so far as it has produced cheapness of provisions, has contributed to the welfare of the working classes. One would suppose, Sir, from some observations that have been made, and from the derisive cheers which occasionally arise from Gentlemen opposite, that a Protectionist Government had suddenly come down to the House of Commons to announce that they had changed their opinions. I can only say that if any Gentleman supposes that to be the case, he must take a very erroneous and perverted view of what has occurred. Here is a Government which in no way succeeded to office in connexion with that question. With the consent and concurrence, not only of the House, but of the whole country, it was determined that the question of protection should be left to the decision of the country, to be declared by a general election. The verdict of the country has been of an unmistakeable character. We have bowed to that unequivocal declaration. If we had acceded to office in order to advocate a system of protection—if we had dissolved Parliament on that question, and found that the country would not support us, we should have felt it our duty immediately to relinquish the posts which we now occupy; but, Sir, I am not aware, from all that has occurred, that that is at all our duty; and if there be any Gentleman in this House who thinks that it is our duty, and if it is the opinion of the majority of this House that it is our duty, that is an issue which can easily and speedily be tried. Sir, I have said myself that this was a question of taxation. No one has pretended, for example, that the native industry of any country has a right to any artificial support unless it be subjected to some peculiar burdens or to some weight of taxation which otherwise might not be considered of an equitable character. If I find that protection, as it is called, being now abrogated, it is yet possible to recommend to the House a policy which will relieve the interests that are suffering from the withdrawal of that system, and which will allow them to compete with the industry of the world as fair rivals, I think that that is not only a consistent course for one who has advocated the principle of protection in former times, but that I am still doing my duty to that party in this House and out of it who have so generously supported me; and I declare most sincerely that it is only because I think I can bring forward measures which will have the effect of relieving all those interests that have suffered from the precipitate abrogation of past laws, and at the same time of contributing to the general advantage of the community, that I consent for a moment to hold the position which I now occupy. Sir, I shall now advert—although physically, as you will perceive, I feel it almost impossible to address the House—I shall now advert to the point which is particularly before us—the Motion of the hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for Wolverhampton, as amended by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Carlisle, and the contingent Amendment of the noble Lord the Member for Tiverton. Now, Sir, we have heard from the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Carlisle a minute narrative of his connexion with the documents now upon the table of the House. The House will perhaps permit me, on the part of the Government, with equal frankness, and I hope with not less brevity, to detail the course which we have thought it right to pursue, and the cause which induced us to take such a course. We have heard to-night from the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Carlisle a complete vindication of the passage once so much criticised in Her Majesty's Speech. That right hon. Gentleman told us to-night, that although, in his opinion, there was no claim for compensation by any interest in the country for any injury they may have experienced from recent legislation, still he thought it was a legitimate subject for Parliamentary decision. I think the right hon. Gentleman took a constitutional course, and used constitutional language in speaking on that subject. For what, Sir, were the words of Her Majesty's Speech? After laying down in an unequivocal manner that the principle of our commercial legislation had, after due deliberation, been settled by the country in favour of the principle of unrestricted competition, Her Majesty said that if the House should be of opinion that any great interests had suffered by the recent legislation, which had contributed to the common weal, Her Majesty recommended that the House should take their claims into consideration. Why, Sir, that is exactly the course which the right hon. Gentleman approves of. The right hon. Gentleman used the word "compensation" again and again; and upon that word, indeed, he based most of his observations, and the course which he recommended to the House. But I must say, Sir, that it would have been convenient to the House, when a person of such high authority founded the recommendation of a certain policy upon a phrase, if he had at least referred to some authentic record for the sentiment which he quoted. I have had no opportunity of previous investigation, but I confess I don't remember that in any Parliamentary discussion of the question the word "compensation" was ever brought forward. It is possible that the right hon. Gentleman may or may not have found such a phrase in some electioneering speech or another, by some Member or another sitting on this side of the House; but the right hon. Gentleman is the last person in this House who ought to encourage our having recourse to electioneering speeches, in order to deduce from them the opinions of great statesmen, and the maxims that ought to regulate the policy of the English Parliament. Well, Sir, I contend that upon the declaration of the right hon. Gentleman himself, the passage in Her Majesty's Speech is fully vindicated; that that Speech was drawn up on the true principle—of course, with that due reserve which should always exist in all Royal documents of the kind—that there was a clear and definite statement as to the state of the country, and other important points, and also allusions equally Parliamentary and constitutional with reference to points of other importance which were left to further consideration. I say that the expositions of the First Minister of the Crown, and the humble words which I may have used, would have removed any doubt, had any doubt existed, as to the meaning of that particular passage in Her Majesty's Speech. But the right hon. Gentleman says that a doubt did exist on the subject, because I did not, before the Address was moved, name the day on which I would bring forward my financial statement. Why, Sir, there were peculiar reasons which rendered it impossible to fix the day for that purpose then; and I thought that, before the Address was moved, to say that on an early day I should bring forward my statement, without fixing the precise day, would have had an air of a not very satisfactory kind, and that it would be much better, as the day could not be fixed, to refer to it in the few words which I should probably have to address to the House in the course of the evening. But, Sir, there is no doubt that, from the first, there was some misconception on the subject; a misconception which I must say, was eagerly fostered by those who found it convenient for their own purposes to do so. At last it became evident that there was a general feeling in the House that there should be some declaration on the part of Parliament, expressing their opinion that the verdict of the country had been decisively unfavourable to the principle of a protective policy; and, although I think myself, as a general rule, that declarations of that kind by new Parliaments are not extremely expedient; because, after all, they do not settle any question—they do not bind even the next Session—they do not in any way affect opinion; and I should be sorry myself—wishing most sincerely that the principle of unrestricted competition should not now be disturbed—I say, I should be very sorry if the only security for that result was a hasty vote at the commencement of a new Parliament. But, hearing that there was a general feeling on the subject, and believing from many indications which I met with in the House that the Resolution to be proposed was not of a party character—that is, not of a party character in the more limited and odious sense of the phrase—we were of opinion that no opposition should be made, if some Resolution was brought forward which was in its character quite unequivocal as to the fact that the country had decided in favour of the system of free trade, and that it was the duty of the Government hereafter sincerely to adhere to the principle of unrestricted competition in their financial and commercial legislation. For myself individually, of course I could have no objection to such a Resolution, because in the measures which I have to recommend to the House, if there be one feature more decided than another, it is that they are based upon the principle of unrestricted competition—that that principle must be hereafter the basis of our whole commercial system; for, unless unrestricted competition be the principle of our financial and commercial policy, that which I would recommend cannot be supported. I will not now—as I could not feel justified in doing so on a previous occasion—I will not now, I say, be led into any reference to the character of those measures; for I am sure the House will feel that it would be most unfair to do so. All I can say, in answer to my noble Friend (the Marquess of Granby) is, that, as he acknowledges, and all must acknowledge, that the verdict of the country is opposed to that principle which for so many years we supported—feeling that it is impossible for any man in this House to propose legislation founded upon that principle with any success, or with any hope of carrying such measures, I trust he will find, when those measures are brought forward, that I have not been unmindful of the just claims of those who, I think, have been unfairly treated by recent legislation. Under these circumstances, what was the course which Her Majesty's Government took? My noble Friend (the Earl of Derby), to whose opinion we deferred, met his friends, and communicated to them frankly his opinion that, if a Resolution were brought forward declaring that the verdict of the country had been expressed in an unequivocal manner, and announcing that it would be the duty of Her Majesty's Ministers to adhere to and develop the principle of unrestricted competition, it would be most unwise in any way to keep alive the controversy by opposing it; but that it was perfectly open to any Gentleman on this side of the House who objected in any way to acknowledging what may be called almost a fact rather than a prevailing dogma, to take no part in the debate or in the division, if there were one. It was the noble Lord's opinion, however, that, as to the fact, we should heartily and unequivocally endeavour that the declaration should be unanimously adopted by the House of Commons. Now, the draft of a Resolution also reached me which I was told was to be submitted to the House. I am sure that what has occurred to-night must be very instructive, especially to those who have taken their seats in this House for the first time. They must have received a rich lesson as to the mode by which the opposition is carried on. All I know is, that when we sat on the benches opposite we were more discreet. I do not remember any such frank confessions having ever been made in our time. When we change sides, our youthful adherents will have received a lesson as to how it is possible to combine and manage mankind. Well, I say, a Resolution—I suppose it came from the clouds—fell into my hands, and although it was most precise and unequivocal in the declaration that the country had decided that the principle of unrestricted competition was to be the principle of our commercial policy—and that in all their future measures it was the duty of Ministers to adhere to that principle, there was nothing in that Resolution which I or any other Gentleman on this side of the House could not have accepted. Under these circumstances, my noble Friend recommended those who are proud to be his followers frankly to accept that Resolution, if it were brought forward. There was no secret made of the advice which he gave. We should not have cared if it had been made known at Charing-cross; and probably it was made known at Charing-cross. But the most remarkable circumstance is, that the moment this advice was known, three odious epithets were put into the Resolution. Now, that is not the way to bring about a unanimous decision of the House upon a subject of such vast importance; for the only consequence of such a course must be, that the hon. Member for Manchester and his Friends will never obtain their object by it; because, whether they gain the division or not, it can only be by a small majority, which would necessarily give the country and the world the idea that upon this vital question, which we are all agreed is settled at last, there are arrayed two great parties. Well, Sir, a Resolution very different from the Resolution which I first saw, was at length placed on the table of the House, and it became us then to consider what was the course which we should pursue. It was quite clear that, if the hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for Wolverhampton persisted in moving his Resolution, there would not only be a division, but a division of a most balanced kind; that, instead of commencing the new Parliament by a declaration which would stop further agitation on this controversial topic, we should commence the new Parliament by a movement which would render this question again the means of demarcation between parties. It was suggested, I believe, that the Resolution of the hon. and learned Gentleman would not only be injurious to the feelings of Gentlemen on this side of the House, but that it had not been received with much favour by many Gentlemen on the other side. It was, therefore, not impossible that we might have moved the previous question with some prospect of success. To have recommended our friends, for the sake of unanimity, to have acceded to the Resolution, was quite impossible. It is all very well to say that these are only words—that many who did not think the legislation of 1846 wise and beneficial may be of that opinion now, though they thought otherwise then. But, Sir, no one can have two opinions as to the meaning and the motive with which these words were inserted; and we were of opinion that in public as in private life, it was a mistake to submit to insult. Under these circumstances, we endeavoured to draw out a distinct Resolution which we considered would conciliate your opinions to such a degree that we hoped it might be accepted. I have not the Resolution at hand, but I can sufficiently recollect to know that it most unequivocally declared our opinion that the welfare of the working classes was attributable to the cheapness of provisions occasioned by recent legislation. We thought that that was a declaration which would have been received by hon. Gentlemen opposite as a sign of a conciliatory feeling on our side; and we did hope that hon. Gentlemen on this side of the House—however they might object to the policy which produced that result—although they might still be of opinion that great and unnecessary injuries had been incurred by a particular class occasioned by the precipitate legislation on the question—would still not attempt to deny the fact that cheapness of provisions had contributed to the welfare of the working classes. We therefore made that declaration most unequivocally. We laid down, as we thought, in language which could not be mistaken, what our opinion was as to the principle of our commercial legislation. We did that in language so distinct and so precise, that the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the University of Oxford himself said, that language could go no further on that point. We said more than that; we said that it was the duty of the Government rigidly and unreservedly to adhere to this principle in all the measures we should bring forward in future. And this Resolution has been called a frigid Resolution. I can assure the House that it was not conceived in any spirit of that kind—it was brought forward in a spirit of conciliation to all parties, and we were in hopes that it might have been accepted by the House as sufficient for the purpose. There is another Amendment—the Amendment of the noble Lord the Member for Tiverton—which is contingent upon the Amendment which I have proposed. And, besides the Amendment of the noble Lord, there is a fourth Amendment, which has been announced to-night by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Carlisle. It is difficult to discuss an Amendment which is not printed;

but, as far as I could follow the right hon. Gentleman, his Amendment means this—that if Ministers bring forward measures which injure certain classes in the country, those classes shall have no claim to compensation. I understand this to be the result of the right hon. Gentleman's Amendment: that in subsequent legislation, such as we have intimated, there shall be no compensation claimed, but that the House will reserve to itself the right of considering the propriety of compensation for legislation that has passed. If that be his meaning, I shall not be very captious on the subject. But we have to decide what we shall do if the hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for Wolverhampton persists in the course which he has taken. I shall certainly resist the Resolution of the hon. and learned Gentleman on the grounds which I have already stated to the House. I think it unjust, ungenerous, and unwise; and I think that the House will regret the day that they adopt or sanction that Resolution. With respect to the two Amendments before the House, I confess that the question is really assuming too trifling a character. Between the hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for Wolverhampton and ourselves there is a clear case of difference. He has asserted his opinion in a way which is most injurious to us, and in a way which I think, as a matter of general policy, is unwise. To such a Resolution, therefore, I shall give my unhesitating opposition. But, with respect to the Amendment which has been suggested by the noble Lord, I confess, that although I may have that parental fondness which has been already confessed in the debate, I cannot feel that I should be justified in opposing the general feeling of the House in any respect whatever. In the noble Lord's Resolution there may be expressions to which I might demur; there may be expressions in it which I might regret to see placed on the Journals of the House with my individual responsibility and sanction; but, after all, that is a mere fighting about words, and not about facts. There is no difference of opinion between the noble Lord the Member for Tiverton and the Government respecting the fact that the country has adopted in an unequivocal manner the system of free trade; and I must say that nothing surprises me more than the deep regret which some hon. Members opposite show that the country has adopted that system. It seems always to occasion them irritation that the question does not still remain an unsettled question, to divide the House as before. I believe that there is no difference between us with respect to facts; that it is a mere question of phrases; and I certainly shall not oppose the general feeling of the House as regards any preference they may have for the Amendment of the noble Lord over that of the Government. That is a question of very minor importance. The real question before us is, whether the hon. and learned Member for Wolverhampton and his friends are to outrage the feelings of this side of the House, and of many Gentlemen on the other side, by a course which I think—totally irrespective of personal feeling—is most impolitic and unwise.

LORD JOHN RUSSELL: I hope, Sir, notwithstanding some parts of the speech of the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer, and the tone of his concluding observations, that the House may yet be able to arrive at a decision on this subject which will, at least, include the great majority of the House, and settle the important question which has so long been in dispute between what is called "Free Trade" and what goes by the name of "Protection." I shall not now enter into the early part of the remarks of the right hon. Gentleman as to whether the Government are or are not properly a Protectionist Government—whether they came in on the ground of Protection, or were at all bound to adhere to the system. I hope, Sir, there may come another day when I shall have an opportunity of expressing my entire dissent from the statements of the right hon. Gentleman. But this is not the time to do so. It has appeared to me that when this Parliament was assembled, it was desirable, in the first place, that some decision should be come to on the great question of commercial and financial policy on which the country has been so long divided; and that, in the next place, it was desirable that those who had made themselves the peculiar advocates, and styled themselves the sole defenders, of the interest which had been affected by recent legislation, should have a full and ample opportunity of laying before this House and the country the measures which they consider will repair any evils which may have been done, and at the same time conduce to the general interests of the country. These two principles have guided my conduct since the commencement of the present Session. I own that with respect to the first of them it appeared to me that a great mistake had been made by Her Majesty's Ministers in not advising Her Majesty in the Speech from the Throne to make a clear and explicit declaration upon the subject of Free Trade. I quite agree with the right hon. Secretary of State for the Home Department in the general prudence, on ordinary occasions, of not giving advice to the Crown to allude in the Speech from the Throne to questions and topics which may immediately excite debate. But, Sir, this is no ordinary occasion. This is a great and extraordinary occasion; and, whatever might have been the previous opinions—whatever might have been the views of Her Majesty's Ministers, I think it was a duty which they owed to the people of this country to advise Her Majesty to place upon record in the Speech from the Throne a decision upon the question, whether or no the commercial policy which has now been in existence for the last eight years, was to be maintained and extended, whether it was to be reversed, or whether it was to be altered. Sir, I am confirmed in this view by the course the right hon. Gentleman has taken, because there is no question now as to whether it was wise or not to have an abstract Resolution. The right hon. Gentleman himself has proposed a Resolution in regard to our commercial legislation, and has thus, as it were, introduced a sort of supplement to the Queen's Speech, supplying what was deficient in that Speech. My opinion is, that those who sit on this side of the House, and all those who have taken an interest in this great question of Free Trade, showed remarkable forbearance in not moving an Amendment to the Address in answer to the Speech from the Throne. The terms of the Speech I hardly ventured at the time to criticise with the severity which I think they fairly provoked, because I felt that it was desirable to avoid a division upon the Address, in consequence of the melancholy occasion which was adverted to in the first paragraph of the Speech. I think, however, that if any hon. Member had pointed out in all their force the deficiencies and obscurities of that part of the Speech which adverted to this subject, it would have been almost impossible that some hon. Gentleman would not have said, "We cannot separate without an Amendment to such an Address. Now, the Speech, after stating, among other things, that certain important interests had been affected, proceeded to say that this House was not only to consider whether or no those interests might be relieved from the effects of the unavoidable injury which had been inflicted upon them, but that we should also consider whether we could enable the industry of the country to meet the unrestricted competition to which Parliament, in its wisdom, had subjected it. Why I hold, Sir, in the first place, that the industry of the country—taking it in its large and general sense—is fully able to meet competition, and has never been so able to do so as it is at the present moment; and the slightest reference to any official documents will show what is the state of the industry of the country in that respect. In fact, if it were not able to meet the existing competition, that prosperity of the working classes which is admitted on all sides could not possibly exist. But I say, further, that if the industry of the country could not meet unrestricted competition, it is impossible for you to enable it to meet such competition; and that the Parliament which had subjected the industry of the country to a competition which it could not meet should not be described as a wise Parliament, but it should be said that Parliament, in its folly, had submitted the industry of this great country to a competition which it could not successfully encounter. Such were the obvious defects of the Speech, and I repeat that I think great forbearance was shown by hon. Members in abstaining from moving any Amendment. It was not, therefore, I think, surprising that some hon. Gentleman should immediately bring forward a Resolution on the subject; and no one was so much entitled to be heard with respect in this House on such a question as the hon. Member for Wolverhampton. My hon. Friend gave notice of a Motion on the subject. The right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer says that Her Majesty's Ministers were disposed to accept the Motion when they heard it; and that immediately on their acquiescence becoming known three odious epithets were added to the Resolution. Now, I must say the fact is—and it is a fact within my own knowledge—that the very first suggestions made to my hon. Friend upon the subject all contained the words “wise and just,” as words fit to be introduced into the Resolution; and I myself was one of those who, long before the meeting in Downing-street which has been noticed, advised my hon. Friend to put the words “wise and just” into his Resolution. It appeared to me that, Parliament having sanctioned this legislation, the principal act of all those by which the condition of the country had been improved was a wise act. I also consider that the epithet “just” was equally applicable to these measures. The epithets are said to be “odious.” I cannot conceive why they should be regarded as odious. The existing commercial system was established by an Act of Parliament, and are we to declare that Parliament was unjust in carrying such an Act? I certainly never shall consent to such a declaration. But, besides this, I have in mind, and I dare say others have in mind, and that my hon. Friend the Member for Wolverhampton had in mind, that which was so properly and so honourably said by as honourable a Member as this House contains—the noble Lord the Member for North Leicestershire (the Marquess of Granby)—that if the Act of 1846 was a wise Act, some tribute is due to the memory of that illustrious statesman, who in the debates upon that measure, when it was passing through this House, and in his last words with respect to it, enforced the justice of that Act above all other considerations. Well, it appeared to be thought, however, that although this epithet was not an odious one, still its use would raise a controversy and a doubt and hesitation on the part of some of the free-traders in this House, which I think it was not desirable to create; and, therefore, when my right hon. Friend the Member for Carlisle (Sir James Graham) showed me the words that he had drawn, I said I thought that those words, with the addition which I ventured to suggest, were fully sufficient, and answered the purpose which I conceived we ought to have in view. I thought that, on the one side, the words would be sufficiently explicit, and that, on the other, they would not give any unnecessary offence. I proposed to add the words “with respect to the consideration of future measures,” in order that it might be clear that the proposed Motion was not a vote of want of confidence, because I thought that, if a vote of want of confidence was to be proposed, it ought to be proposed directly, and not by a side-wind. My hon. Friend the Member for Wolverhampton was, of course, the person to decide upon the various suggestions he might receive, and he thought, upon the whole, that those considerations which I have already mentioned in favour of calling this “a wise, just, and beneficial measure" preponderated, and he placed his Resolution in that form upon the table of the House. The question was thus fairly before the House, and the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer placed his Resolution upon the table as an Amendment. I own it appears to me that the Resolutions he has proposed are so equivocal—falling so far short of the length to which any Resolutions should go—that they would leave it hereafter a matter of dispute whether the Act of 1846 was not an Act of injustice and folly—a measure the injustice of which we should remedy as soon as we can, and the folly of which we should attempt to correct, by reversing the system as soon as popular opinion would allow us. I think the right hon. Gentleman's Amendment so much open to such an interpretation that I, for one, could never consent to its substitution for the words proposed either by the hon. Member for Wolverhampton or by the right hon. Member for Carlisle. The question, Sir, however, is one between Free Trade and Protection. The right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer the other night accused me of audacity in saying that such was the question; but still that is the question to which my mind is turned, and to which the mind of the country is turned. The right hon. Chancellor of the Exchequer thinks the only question is whether he should continue to hold office. [Cries of "Oh, oh!"] The right hon. Gentleman accused me of audacity for saying that this was a question of Free Trade or of Protection. I say that is the question for the Representatives of the People in this House to consider. Hon. Gentlemen opposite are not indignant at my being accused of audacity; that does not offend them; but that the Chancellor of the Exchequer should attach any importance to holding office is a suggestion which they cannot bear to hear. I think, however, that the Chancellor of the Exchequer said this was nothing but a question between those who sit on this side of the House and Her Majesty's Ministers, and whether hon. Gentlemen opposite, by their conduct during the last five years, are bound or not to support Protection. Now, I say that is not the question. If the debate should continue, I may make some comments upon the right hon. Gentleman's statements upon this subject; but I do not hold that that is at all the question. An occasion may arise

when we can discuss that subject; but the question now before us is one large enough to hide out of our sight anything behind it—namely, whether that great system of commercial policy which the late Sir Robert Peel from 1842 to 1846 proposed and carried, and which we carried on from 1846 to 1852, in the shape of the Sugar Duties and the Navigation Laws, is, as a whole, a system beneficial to the country, and which ought to be persevered in, maintained, and extended. Now, I say it is desirable that all those who are of that opinion—all those who think it is a beneficial system—should unite, if possible, in one vote for the assertion of that doctrine. Don't tell me that what you are pleased to call abstract Resolutions are of no importance. Why, Sir, the stability of our currency has stood upon these abstract, or rather not abstract, but practical, Resolutions. When the currency was defaced in the reign of William III., in 1696, the Ministers of the Crown came to the House of Commons, and said they would not change the standard of value of the gold and silver coins of the realm in fineness, weight, or denomination. From 1696 to the time of Mr. Huskisson, that Resolution regulated and prescribed the laws with reference to the currency. Mr. Huskisson, when a question arose about the currency, got the House of Commons to reaffirm that Resolution. Other questions about the currency were raised when Lord Althorp was Chancellor of the Exchequer, and he proposed and carried the same Resolution; so that from 1696 to 1852 the stability of our currency may be said to have stood upon that Resolution, and on the firmness of Parliament in adhering to that standard. Why, then, Sir, should it not be the case that after a dissolution of Parliament—after the opinion of the country has been fully taken—we should solemnly decide what is to be the general policy of the nation? and why should it not be the case that the Resolutions we may adopt should control and govern the commercial policy of this country for generations to come? Why should it not be the case that that great country which was alluded to the other day—the United States of America—which has recently chosen by an immense majority a President known to be favourable to Free Trade—why should not that country unite with us in promoting such a policy, so that these two great States of the same race, and governed by institutions very nearly similar, may make this great principle of Free Trade the rule of the intercourse of nations throughout the world? Such is the issue which this contest is to decide, and not that petty issue which the right hon. Chancellor of the Exchequer has put before us. Then, if I may venture to give advice to my hon. Friend the Member for Wolverhampton, it is, that, as the Chancellor of the Exchequer has declared, though not in very gracious terms certainly, his willingness to substitute for his own Resolution the Resolution which was first drawn out by my right hon. Friend the Member for Carlisle (Sir J. Graham), and which was placed on the table of the House by the noble Lord the Member for Tiverton (Viscount Palmerston), that my hon. Friend (Mr. C. Villiers) should declare likewise his willingness to accept that Resolution, and that all those in this House who are in favour of Free Trade—whether they are like my hon. Friend the Member for Wolverhampton, or like my hon. Friend the Member for the West Riding of Yorkshire (Mr. Cobden), and other hon. Gentlemen, free-traders of very long date, or whether they date from 1842 or 1856, or whether they date from the month of November in the present year—whatever may be the date of their Free-trade professions, should unite, and that they should give to the Resolution the stamp of the authority of the British Parliament.

MR. COBDEN: Sir, in the early part of this conversation, I felt considerable difficulty to comprehend what was the tendency of the remarks of some of the speakers, and it was only by degrees that I arrived at a full understanding of what is the question at present at issue. When I listened to what was said by the noble Lord the Member for Tiverton (Viscount Palmerston), and other hon. Members, about behaving in a gentlemanly way to each other, and coming to a unanimous agreement on this great question, I was almost for a moment unconscious of what really was at issue between us; but the speech of the right hon. Baronet the Member for Carlisle (Sir J. Graham), and the remarks of other speakers, have completely developed what we are now discussing and disputing about. It appears that a Resolution prepared by the right hon. Baronet the Member for Carlisle, which contained a phrase asserting that the free-trade measures which had been passed since 1846 had not had the effect of inflicting injury on any great interests—a phrase inserted, as the right hon. Gentleman now distinctly tells us, to meet any claims for compensation by certain interests, and to bar all claims by asserting that no injury had been done to important interests—it appears that this Resolution, by what means we have not heard, dropped into the hands of the noble Lord the Member for Tiverton; and that he—taking this Resolution, and cutting out that important passage asserting that free trade had inflicted no injury, and, therefore, no compensation was called for—and having dispossessed the Resolution of that all-important phrase, it somehow found its way to the Carlton Club, and there, at a meeting of the Protectionist party it was resolved unanimously that they would accept this Resolution. [“No, no!”] Oh, not unanimously? [“No!”] Well, then, it seems we are not going to be that happy family which is so much desired. It appears that we cannot manage this matter in this drawing-room, gentlemanly fashion. I admit the excellent tone, and to a great extent I admit the soundness and the sufficiency, of the Resolution drawn up by the right hon. Baronet the Member for Carlisle; but it seems to be assumed by the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer, that those whom he is pleased to call the free-trade party had agreed to that Resolution, and then, after finding that the Carlton Club and Downing-street— [“No, no!”] Not the Carlton Club, then, but Downing-street, for it seems the Carlton Club are not free-traders yet, and that the Reform Club and the Carlton Club are not shaking hands yet—after finding that at a meeting in Downing-street, that place which was once called a barracoon when hon. Members were summoned there—it was resolved, though not unanimously, that the Protectionist party would endorse that Resolution, that the free-traders afterwards infused into it three odious epithets, with the view of preventing a portion of that body from adopting it. Now, I beg to say, and I think it is no presumption on my part in doing so, on this question, that it might not be unreasonable to expect that, before a Resolution had been adopted by the free-trade party, I should have had the perusal of it. I can say this, I never saw that Resolution before it was handed to the Carlton Club or Downing-street. I never read that Resolution, and I was no assenting party to it. I was from the first of opinion that, whatever the phraseology, the Resolution should affirm the justice and wisdom of the policy of 1846. I have always said, "Affirm its justice and its wisdom, and I will not quarrel with you about the phraseology of the Resolution." We therefore stand in this position: you have adopted, at least a majority of you have adopted, a Resolution, from which you have expunged the assertion of the justice and wisdom of the policy of Sir Robert Peel, and erased that phrase which bars you from compensation. That question of compensation has assumed immense importance since this discussion arose, because we have the evidence of the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer, which the noble Member for North Leicestershire (the Marquess of Granby) has elicited, that in the Budget which he is preparing there are measures to ameliorate the condition of the agricultural classes. He has told us that the policy of 1846 was injurious to the interests of the landowners, and he is prepared to apply remedial measures. What does the hon. Baronet the Member for the Tower Hamlets (Sir W. Clay) say to that? The last time I met him was on the platform of the Free Trade Hall at Manchester. I never knew any one who had gone through the ordeal of standing on those boards in any danger of being seduced in this House. Least of all should I have supposed that the hon. Baronet would nibble at a bait deprived of half its goodness and virtue. If the hon. Baronet had the whole Resolution of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Carlisle, there might be something to excuse him; but to take the bait, after it was modified, at the hands of the noble Lord the Member for Tiverton admits of no excuse. I am astonished at the hon. Baronet the Member for the Tower Hamlets not having had more sagacity. We have certainly been talking over matters without much reserve, and it seems to have come out in the course of this discussion, that there has been some little dexterity used in framing the right hon. Baronet's Resolution, in order to meet the difficulties of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the University of Oxford (Mr. Gladstone). It seems that with the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the University of Oxford, who on one occasion did vote with the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer, on a Motion for compensation, it was feared some scruples might arise, and this Resolution was so framed that, whilst it should bar prospective compensation, it should not shut out the Protectionists from retrospective compensation. It bars compensation for future free-trade, but leaves the door open for compensation for past free trade. That reduced to plain common sense—the test by which I would try everything—means compensation for corn and cattle, but no compensation for butter and cheese. I think the right hon. Gentleman, if he applies his mind to this question, will find better reasons to alter his judgment, than to abide by a precipitate vote given on a former occasion. I think if he compares the actual condition of things now with what they were in 1849, he will find novel arguments, which are every day developed, for asserting that no great interest has been affected by the change which has taken place. I will just allude at this point to the question, whether we are to give compensation at the expense of the taxpayers for the measures already passed; because if you admit that principle, then I say we have gained nothing, because it will be very easy for you, if you are determined to take money out of the pockets of the people in any other way, it will be quite as easy to do so by way of the tax-gatherer as by Protection. I myself will undertake to abolish Customs Duties, and to put down the Excise, and yet to levy a tax which by its incidence shall inflict greater injustice, and produce greater miseries, than a revival of Protection. I beg you not to dally with this question. You say because a majority of the House is ready to affirm principles contrary to your views, you are ready to make your bow. Now we do not bow to majorities—and I give hon. Gentlemen warning, that if they raise this question of compensation in the shape of taxation, you are beginning a struggle which, if my past consistency be any warrant for truth-telling, I will venture to say you will find just as disastrous as that through which you have passed. What I am most anxious to do is this—I am not going into, nor do I wish to go into, the question, but I want to bring this House to a vote to test the question whether, after the dissolution, we stand in as good a position as we did before; for in the last Parliament, not only did we affirm the free-trade policy to such an extent that no one could be found to impugn or dispute it, but in two instances, when the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer brought forward Motions to give compensation—that was the meaning in which they were understood by the country—the late Parliament on each occasion in a very large House refused compensation. Now I want, as early as possible, to have a division to know the starting point; and after the elections—after the turmoil in which the country has been placed by those elections—after the scenes of extravagance, riot, and corruption by which we are told the country has gained a great triumph—to see whether we stand in as good a position as we did before. Now, let us bring it to a test. We have a question pure and simple submitted to the House, and therefore I entreat my hon. Friend the Member for Wolverhampton (Mr. C. Villiers) that he will not shrink from the Resolutions he has moved, that we may at once go into the discussion of the main question, and get a division, when, in the result of that division, we shall know what is to be the work of free-traders in future.

MR. NEWDEGATE acknowledged the distinct manner in which the hon. Member for the West Riding of Yorkshire expressed his views at all times; but the hon. Member did not always make the same statement with respect to the same circumstance in two different places. The hon. Member for the West Riding said, that whatever might be the issue which the House wished to try, the issue he wished to try upon the Resolution of the hon. and learned Member for Wolverhampton was, whether the claims of those who held themselves to have been injured by recent legislation should or should not be considered. He (Mr. Newdegate) had been tolerably consistent as a Protectionist, and perhaps, in some degree, he represented the Protection societies, and he believed he was correct in saying of those with whom he had acted, that they acknowledged the decision of the country to be against protection. They believed that the question had not been decided by those to whom he addressed himself, but by circumstances, to which, however, he did not intend then further to allude. Acknowledging that decision, those with whom he acted were determined to see whether the present Government would not consider the injuries, the pressure of which they knew to exist. If this House were pleased to affirm a simple free-trade Resolution, he, being a Protectionist, but acting on a conviction that the majority of the country had declared in favour of free imports, would take no part till he saw whether measures for relief would be proposed by Her Majesty's Government. The hon. Member for the West Riding adverted to the presence of the hon. Member for the Tower Hamlets at the Free Trade Hall, at Manchester. It was well known that the hon. Member for the West Riding was the most successful demagogue of his day, with good will, he (Mr. Newdegate) believed, to become an autocrat. The hon. Gentleman had given them at that meeting the means of knowing how the present Resolution was to be interpreted; for the hon. Member told the people at Manchester what was the interpretation they should place on the votes of any Protectionists who should vote for such a Resolution as that proposed by the hon. and learned Member for Wolverhampton. He (Mr. Newdegate) had constantly endeavoured to do his duty as a Protectionist, and the Times newspaper asked what he had gained by it? He had gained nothing but hard labour; but he had secured his honour—he had secured the respect of honest men; and, after the House had heard the words he was about to read, he should ask hon. Members to consider what would be his position if he voted for the Resolution of the hon. and learned Member for Wolverhampton? Let the House judge from what was said at a meeting summoned by the hon. Member for the West Riding, preliminary to the discussion of this very question now brought before the House, on the Resolution of the hon. and learned Member for Wolverhampton. The hon. Member for the West Riding said—

“ I think we are fairly entitled to say this, that whatever else the men may be, we insist upon having a free-trade Administration; and when I say a free-trade Administration, I mean a body of men, if they are the men now in office, who shall distinctly and emphatically repudiate all the doctrines they have been promulgating in their past lives upon this great question. We have seen that done before by greater and better men than they. . . . But it (their recantation) must be emphatic. They must say that free trade does not lower wages. They must say that free trade does not cause a drain of gold from this country. They must say that free trade has not thrown land out of cultivation in this country. They must say that the land of this country is still worth something.”

Who had denied it?

“ And they must say that wheat—good wheat—has not been imported into this country, and cannot be, at 24s. per quarter?”

Who ever said that?

“ Those are a few things they must say, when they said the very opposite before; and we must have no accompaniment about compensation. Compensation! Well, but I deny that there has been any loss. I boldly declare, and challenge the adversary to deny it, that the value of land in this country—agricultural land—taking one acre with another, is greater now than it was in 1844.” That is, before the repeal of the corn laws. The hon. Gentleman seemed to have felt that he had overstrained the credulity of his audience, and went on to speak about compensation. He (Mr. Newdegate) rejoiced that the Government had resolved to resist the proposition brought forward by the hon. and learned Member for Wolverhampton. They were bound, as men of honour, to resist it, unless they were prepared to turn round upon and condemn their whole previous conduct. If they did resist this Motion, they should have his vote; because, of all circumstances that were to be lamented in 1846, he had most lamented the shock which had been given to public confidence in public men by the Government of the late Sir Robert Peel on that occasion. If a second Conservative Government, by any similar act, gave a similar shock to public confidence in public men, it would do more to subvert the institutions of the country than the worst efforts of the wildest democrat. The noble Lord at the head of the Government took the only means by which to bring this question between the farmer and the present commercial legislation to a legitimate solution, when he submitted it to the decision of the country. He (Mr. Newdegate) would not dispute any Motion merely affirming free trade, so far as the present Parliament could command the future legislation of the country. In deference to the decision of the country, he should wait, because he wished to reserve his opinion until he should see whether justice was to be done to the classes which had been injured. He had not thought fit to let the speech of the hon. Member for the West Riding pass without noticing the gloss which that hon. Gentleman had put upon the question at issue. The question which the House had really to decide was, in fact, according to the hon. Member’s formal declaration at the meeting in Manchester, which was preliminary to this Resolution, not whether compensation should be given, but whether the character of public men should be maintained.

MR. GLADSTONE said, he rose to explain a misunderstanding into which the hon. Member for the West Riding (Mr. Cobden) had fallen. The hon. Member seemed to think, and of course thinking so he could not help resenting it, that there was some connexion between the vote given by him (Mr. Gladstone) in 1850, and the framing of the Resolution. He begged to say there was no such connexion. He would not at that moment discuss the grounds of that vote, but he considered he approached the question of compensation or relief with hands entirely free. The opinion he had formed was, that in framing the Resolution, certain general principles should be declared—principles which he had endeavoured to state to-night in the plainest terms he could command.

MR. STAPLETON said, as a Member who had never sat in Parliament before, he owed no allegiance to any one, and he was as willing to vote for a Resolution of the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer as for a Resolution of the hon. Gentleman the Member for Wolverhampton (Mr. C. Villiers). In a proper and logical way, taking the Resolution of the hon. Member for Wolverhampton first, he had to consider whether he could conscientiously support it, and whether in supporting it he should be carrying out those views he had professed upon the hustings—whether he should be fulfilling the promises he had then made, and answering the expectations of those who sent him. The constituency he had the honour to represent had sent him there in preference to a gentleman who had sat on the opposite (the Government) side of the House, and who had declared himself a free-trader as fully and as frankly as the right hon. Chancellor of the Exchequer had done; but he said nothing on the point of compensation, and because he said nothing on that point the constituency would not re-elect him. He marked between these two Resolutions a very great distinction, which had not yet been noticed, and it was this—that whilst Gentlemen of the Manchester school regarded the question from one point, as consumers, and as the great mass of the people regarded it, those on the Ministerial side of the House regarded it from another point, as producers, subjected to unrestricted competition. The question presented different aspects, according to the point from which it was viewed, and in choosing between them he confessed he preferred that aspect in which it was regarded by the great body of the population, rather than that in which it was regarded by particular men. He understood from the speech of the right hon. Chancellor of the Exchequer, that it was the intention of Her Majesty’s Government to grant some kind of compensation for this unrestricted competition. Now, he said unrestricted competition with compensation at the expense of those who were to have the advantage of it, was no Free Trade at all. If they gave the people Free Trade, only on condition that they paid for licence to enjoy its advantages, it was not Free Trade. In conclusion, he begged to observe, that it struck him that no decision could be come to with unanimity which would satisfy free-traders in the country, because the people would not believe that those who till now had been united against Free Trade, were as anxious for it as the hon. Gentlemen who composed the Manchester school.

MR. C. VILLIERS: I rise, Sir, in consequence of the call which is now made upon me; but, as the old Members of this House must know, I have, as having already moved the Resolution, but small discretion in dealing with it now. I was summoned to this House to-day about half an hour before it met, by a letter from the hon. Member for the Tower Hamlets (Sir W. Clay), who said that he had some very important communications to make to the House, as well as some questions to put in which I might be interested; and he begged that I would be in my place. Well, I came, accordingly, and having heard that the object was for me to withdraw the Resolution, I have been listening for some time to hear some reasons assigned by him or by anybody else, why I was to do so, and accept the Resolution of the noble Lord the Member for Tiverton instead. Now, Sir, I think there is no doubt that I am the mover, though I am told that I am not the author of this Resolution. Although I have not, it seems, the honour of its paternity, I have the liability of its support, and that I am willing to accept and to vindicate. Now, Sir, my statement on this matter will, I am afraid, be different from those that have preceded it, for it will be very simple. My purpose has been very simple throughout this matter, and that is, perhaps, why I cannot understand the new views that I hear to-night, and why I cannot understand some Amendments which have been proposed. On this side, if I am not mistaken, there was a general agreement as to the propriety of the Motion; and my right hon. Friend the Member for Carlisle (Sir J. Graham) has, in a very friendly spirit to myself, stated that there was also some propriety in my being the mover. It was then agreed upon, that I was to submit a Resolution on the subject of Free Trade to the House. Well, Sir, I had to ask myself what was the purpose and the occasion of such a Resolution. I think that I state the general opinion on this matter correctly to be, as looking to the purpose of the late dissolution, and to the verdict on the subject of free trade given by the country, that there was not explicitness enough in the Queen's Speech, or clearness enough on the part of the Government, to satisfy the opinion of the House or the country on the subject—that the verdict upon the question which the First Minister had submitted to the country should be solemnly recorded by this House. The opinion of the country was taken upon the question of our recent commercial policy, and that has emphatically been, that this policy has produced great advantages, and improved the condition of all classes, especially the industrious classes, and that it was wise, just, and beneficial. It was my object to introduce these views into my Resolution, and I have done so; I have farther done what I believe the country has as much at heart, declared that this policy should be extended as well as maintained. It then proceeded to affirm the distinct and positive principle, that it was the opinion of the country that it should be further extended and maintained, as being to the interest of all classes, and the best mode of promoting the welfare and contentment of the people. The Resolution so drawn was submitted to many Gentlemen on this side for their approbation, and they considered that it was in accordance precisely with the views that ought to be expressed. The Resolution was drawn in the spirit which I have stated, and no other whatever. That Resolution was framed for no other earthly purpose but that. I had instructions, if I may call them so, to draw up this Resolution, and to submit it to the House. I do not deny that a great number of Gentlemen did favour me by sending suggestions. They all embodied the views which I have expressed, and seemed to have no other object but my own. I had no less than ten or twelve Resolutions sent me, and every one of them, without exception, expressed an opinion that recent legislation had been wise and just. I venture to say it never entered the mind of a human being—certainly, I venture to say that nothing would surprise the public at large more than to hear that in calling that legislation wise, just, and beneficial, it was designating it by three odious epithets. The right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer has alluded to the very open way in which the proceedings of different parties in this House are communicated to each other; but I must say that there is some danger in that kind of openness, because the right hon. Gentleman has been induced by it to trust to information of the most unfounded kind. The right hon. Gentleman stated distinctly that he had it as an undoubted fact that the three odious epithets—"wise, just, and beneficial," were introduced the moment after it was discovered by the Mover or his Friend that the meeting at Lord Derby's consented to acknowledge the principle of Free Trade. I acquit the right hon. Gentleman of any intentional misrepresentation; but I should not be doing justice to myself or my friends, did I not give the most complete contradiction to that statement which it is possible for me to give consistently with Parliamentary language, because it is most undisguisedly and unequivocally untrue. My noble Friend (Lord J. Russell) has stated to the House, that, in drawing up a Resolution on the subject several days before the meeting at Lord Derby's, he also inserted these offensive words. I have said that every other Resolution that was sent to me contained these words; and I will say, further, that this Resolution that I have moved was not altered at all after the meeting in question, it having been agreed upon before; and at this moment I don't know whether it is because I was never in diplomacy, or that I am not in office, or that, perhaps, according to the new rule, that I am not a gentleman, but I cannot understand what there is offensive in these words. I don't know how such a construction can be put upon them. It is the truth, and an opinion generally formed upon experience of the policy. If hon. Gentlemen have been in error, they must take the consequences, and allow that measures that they thought would be hurtful have been the contrary. A confession of error is rather humiliating, perhaps; but Gentlemen who have enjoyed the very highest degree of respect in this country have not been ashamed to avow that they have been in error, and there is no reason why they should. I cannot see what there is offensive in this Resolution, unless there is something ulterior which these words interfere with, but which I know nothing about. Certainly, one would not have thought it odious that this language should be applied, after hon. Gentleman had admitted that they were mistaken in objecting to the Free-Trade policy, but are now ready to adopt it. I wish this could be explained. It was not the intention of anybody in using these words. Why is that construction to be put upon them? It must have some bearing on their ulterior projects which they do not see fit to disclose to the House. As I have before said, I proposed those Resolutions for the simple purpose of recording the opinion of the House. I believe that they express what was the opinion of the last—I believe that it is the opinion of the new—Parliament; and I believe it is the opinion of the country at large, that the recent legislation was wise, just, and beneficial; and they wish to have it so declared by their representatives. And if Gentlemen opposite did not think so before, experience ought to justify them in concluding that it is so now. I was surprised to hear the hon. Gentleman the Member for Berkshire (Mr. R. Palmer) declare himself proof against experience. "Don't tell me," said the hon. Member, "about the country having flourished under Free Trade, or about experience. I have been in this House for twenty-five years, and during that time all the great men have at some time declared against the adoption of Free Trade." Why, such a rule of action would shut out all improvement; we all of us here profit by experience every day, or ought to do so. I do not deny that some Gentlemen who supported Protection may have done so from a conscientious but, however, erroneous belief, that it was the proper policy to pursue; but why should they now hesitate to declare that, although they believed its effects would be most disastrous to the country, they find it has been just the contrary? We hear much of recent and sincere conversions; but I own that the specimens of these kinds of conversions have not been so apparent to me. If those conversions are genuine, it is indeed a marvel how those words in the Resolution can be incompatible with the honour of Gentlemen opposite. Since this conversation began, as far as I have heard, the declarations of hon. Members opposite do not go beyond that of the hon. Gentleman the Member for the North Riding (Mr. Cayley), who assures the House that he will never do again that which it is impossible for him to do, and restore Protection; but they don't say they would not if they could, or that they think themselves wrong; and with respect to many Gentlemen on the other side, I do not think there are any symptoms at all of despair as to the ultimate triumph of their views. They admit themselves to be under difficulties at present; but give them time, and they do not at all abandon the question of Protection. Are we, then, to be tender about their consciences, or their particular position with reference to this question? and am I, in my connexion with this subject, to consult the views of Protectionists? Why, I never thought of drawing up a Resolution to please hon. Gentlemen opposite; I had no such intention. My idea was that there was a majority in this House in favour of Free-Trade policy, and a minority against it; and if the Ministers of the Crown had been really Free Traders, they would probably have declared themselves so in the Speech from the Throne, or have made it quite obvious to the House that they were honestly in favour of this principle. It is because there is evidently yet a serious difference of opinion upon the success of the Free Trade policy, and because the majority feel bound to declare their opinion, that I have proposed this Resolution, and that I now feel bound to adhere to it as truly and simply declaring the opinion of the country.

SIR WILLIAM CLAY said, that he had been called upon to state the reasons why he had asked the hon. Member for Wolverhampton (Mr. C. Villiers) and the right hon. the Chancellor of the Exchequer to withdraw their respective Motions, so as to admit of the Motion of the noble Lord the Member for Tiverton (Viscount Palmerston) being adopted. He would reply to that call. But, in the first place, he wished to set right an inaccuracy in the speech of his hon. Friend the Member for Wolverhampton. The hon. Gentleman said that he (Sir W. Clay) sent him a note half an hour before the House met, in which he did not specify the nature of the question which he was about to put to him. On the contrary, he had himself left the note at twelve o'clock at a place where he understood the hon. Gentleman's letters were generally left, and in that note he told him that he would suggest that the hon. Gentleman should withdraw his Motion, and adopt as a substitute the Motion of the noble Lord (Viscount Palmerston). Now, if he (Sir W. Clay) wanted any justification for putting that question, he should find it in what had passed during the debate, because a very large proportion of the leaders of parties and most prominent Members of the House had declared that it would be the better course to accept the Resolution of the noble Lord, in preference to the Resolution of his hon. Friend. That had been declared by the noble Lord the Member for London (Lord J. Russell); it had been declared in substance by the right hon. Baronet the Member for Carlisle (Sir J. Graham), as well as by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the University of Oxford (Mr. Gladstone). It had been assented to by the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer, and assented to, as he (Sir W. Clay) distinctly understood, with the addition of the words on which his hon. Friend near him laid so much stress. He thought it strange that he should be asked, after this all but universal consent, why he should object to the Motion of his hon. Friend. He would tell him, however, why he objected to it, and why he thought it could not have the effect which his hon. Friend desired and anticipated from its adoption. He objected to it, because, instead of merely affirming the justice of a Free-Trade policy, it insisted on the humiliation of the large party opposite. He (Sir W. Clay) wished, for his part, to obtain the widest possible assent of the House to a declaration that the policy of Free Trade was to be the policy of the country. He was therefore persuaded he was doing right in endeavouring to stop the debate, because it appeared to him to tend to no useful purpose—that its only effect could be to widen existing differences of opinion, to embitter feelings of irritation which we ought rather to seek to soothe and to allay, and thus to alienate those whose union it was desirable to promote for the general welfare of the country. Did his hon. Friend near him doubt his (Sir W. Clay's) devotion to the principles of Free Trade? He did not believe that any man would venture to doubt it. Nine years before the year 1846, he proposed a Resolution for the repeal of the corn laws; indeed, if he recollected rightly, his hon. Friend the Member for Wolverhampton commenced the career in which he had so honourably distinguished himself by seconding that Resolution. His objection to the Motion was, that it called on a great party to admit, in terms, that a particular measure which they opposed, was, at the time they opposed it, "just, wise, and beneficial." That was a humiliation which it was neither wise nor generous to attempt to force upon men of honour, and to which it could not be expected that they should submit. What was the course taken by men of good sense and kind feeling in private life? If they found persons with whom they were engaged in pursuit of some common object (and had not all the Members of that House a common object—the good of their country?), and who had formerly differed with them, disposed to agree with them in opinion, and co-operate in action, did they refuse to accept their co-operation unless they would recant every word they had ever said? The noble Lord the Member for London said that it was justifiable for the House to accept an abstract Resolution. He (Sir W. Clay) had never denied it. It was because the Motion of the hon. Member for Wolverhampton made it impossible to have as large an assent as possible that he objected to it. He wanted the abstract Resolution to be carried by the largest possible majority. The difference between the two propositions before the House was this, that one asserted simply, although in the most emphatic terms, the principles of free trade, while the other was couched in terms that inflicted a feeling of mortification upon their political opponents. This was not an occasion for the indulgence of any petty personal or party triumph. He hailed with joy the accession of the great party opposite to the ranks of Free Trade, and he was very sorry that his hon. Friend had not thought fit to accede to his proposal. If his hon. Friend persevered in his Motion, and he (Sir W. Clay) had no choice but to vote for that Motion or the Amendment proposed by the Government, he should, although with very great regret, vote for the Motion; but if the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer withdrew his Amendment in favour of the Resolution proposed by the noble Lord the Member for Tiverton, then he should vote for the noble Lord's Resolution, in preference to the Motion of his hon. Friend.

MR. SPEAKER: I think it necessary to remind the House, that the question before the House is not the Motion of the hon. Member for Wolverhampton, but that this House do now adjourn. I will also remind them that this is a day devoted to Notices of Motion, which, by our Rules, will take precedence of the Orders of the Day; but owing to this Motion for adjournment, the House has been drawn into a discussion on an Order of the Day, instead of the Notices of Motion.

MR. BARROW said, he was ignorant of Parliamentary tactics, but he rose to prevent mistake as to any change in his opinions. He would remind the hon. Member for Manchester (Mr. Bright), that constituencies in general did not adopt the opinions of candidates, but sought candidates whose opinions coincided with their own. This had occurred in his case: he was not returned by the overwhelming power of great landowners to aid in keeping up their rents, but because he was known to have a strong opinion as to the injuries inflicted on the farming class, who were entitled to relief from peculiar taxation as a matter of justice rather than compensation. If the change of 1846 had been injurious to them because it was hasty, it was an act of injustice, and could not come within the category of "wise, just, and beneficial." He thought with Mr. Huskisson that the right kind of Free Trade was to have moderate protective but not prohibitory duties; and that, he believed, was the only policy under which the country would prosper in future. If they were to have unrestricted competition, it should be unrestricted; all burdens should be removed from farming produce; and farmers should not be prevented from using that produce free from duty in the most advantageous manner as regarded consumption by themselves, their labourers, and their cattle. He objected to the term compensation being fastened upon the farmer, in an offensive sense; he claimed the removal of restrictions by unjust taxes and burdens.

MR. STANHOPE said, he could not admit that the agricultural interest had suffered no injury. His county (North Lincolnshire) was a fair test of the operation of the Free Trade policy. The farmers held their land at moderate rents; they had a laborious and excellent peasantry; and if any men could have withstood the evil of free trade, those were the men who would have done it. He had seen men once independent obliged to rely for their bread on the charity of their landlords. In that county, where men received a higher remuneration than in any other, the labourers were in a far worse condition since the Act of 1846 than before. Without sufficient employment and sufficient remuneration, the cheapness of provisions was no benefit. Believing that great injury had been inflicted, he could not assent to the words "wise, just, and beneficial;" and, consistently with his duty to his constituents as tenant-farmers, he could not affirm any of the Resolutions now before the House. He was aware the question was settled by the decision of the country, and to that decision he thought it his duty to bow. The only constitutional course for a Member of Parliament, when a question was decided by the country, was to apply himself, however strong his personal feelings might be, to carry out that principle. If they were to have unrestricted competition, their industry ought not to be trammelled by any fiscal or unnatural regulation. If the soil of England was to compete with the soil of the whole world, they should be permitted to grow any crop they could possibly cultivate. He trusted that if they were obliged to accept of the principle of Free Trade, that the agriculturists would no longer be compelled to contribute so much to the revenue of the country.

SIR JAMES GRAHAM said, that under the circumstances of the case, he would ask the leave of the House to withdraw his Motion for its adjournment.

TENANT RIGHT (IRELAND) BILL.

MR. C. VILLIERS said, that the hon. and learned Member for Kilkenny County had a Motion on the paper relative to Tenant Right, but he would appeal to the hon. and learned Gentleman to waive his right to precedence, and to allow the adjourned debate on the Resolutions he (Mr. Villiers) had proposed, and the Amendment of the Chancellor of the Exchequer to go on.

MR. SERJEANT SHEE said, the question he had to bring under the notice of the House was one of no ordinary importance. It was, indeed, a matter most important to Irish Members, and to himself, as well as to the constituencies they represented. If those constituencies could be present, and see with their own eyes what was going on, they might, however, understand the importance of the question which the House was anxious to discuss, and of the various propositions before them. If it was the general sense of the House that he ought to give way, he should be very sorry to interpose his Motion, and he was sure he would do no good to his constituents, or to the people of Ireland, in opposing himself to the strongly-declared sense of the House. But, on the other hand, if he gave up this point to the House, he thought the House ought to do something for him. He would ask the right hon. Chancellor of the Exchequer, therefore, on behalf of the Government, so far to assist him as to give him an opportunity of bringing in his Bill before the right hon. Gentleman the Attorney General for Ireland (Mr. Napier) moved the second reading of the Bills he had introduced.

The CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, he thought the hon. and learned Gentleman, in yielding to the general feeling of the House on a subject of great interest, had exercised a wise discretion, and he was sure his constituents would not be dissatisfied with his conduct on that occasion. He would not object to the hon. and learned Gentleman bringing in his Bill, but he was afraid that if the hon. and learned Gentleman liked to put it down for to-morrow night, which was a Government night, the debate on the question now before the House might take up the whole time. He would assist the hon. and learned Member to bring in his Bill, but he could not pledge himself to support it. He might at the same time observe that he would not be able to make his financial statement to-morrow night (Friday), as he had given notice he would.

MR. SERJEANT SHEE said, he wished to have had an opportunity of stating the principles of the Bill; but as the House appeared so anxious to resume the debate on Commercial Legislation, he would only ask permission of the House for leave to bring in the Bill.

Leave given. Bill read 1^o.

COMMERCIAL LEGISLATION—FREE TRADE—ADJOURNED DEBATE.

Order read, for resuming adjourned Debate on Amendment proposed to Question [23rd November]. "That it is the opinion of this House that the improved condition of the Country, and particularly of the Industrious Classes, is mainly the result of recent Commercial Legislation, and especially of the Act of 1846, which established the free admission of Foreign Corn; and that that Act was a wise, just, and beneficial measure:"—(Mr. Charles Villiers:)—And which Amendment was to leave out from the first word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "this House acknowledges, with satisfaction, that the cheapness of provisions, occasioned by recent Legislation, has mainly contributed to improve the condition and increase the comforts of the Working Classes; and that unrestricted competition having been adopted, after due deliberation, as the principle of our Commercial System, this House is of opinion that it is the duty of the Government unreservedly to adhere to that policy in those measures of Financial and Administrative Reform which, under the circumstances of the Country, they may deem it their duty to introduce,"—(Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer,)—instead thereof.

The CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: I hope the House will allow me to make a remark as to the course Her Majesty's Government are prepared to take. With respect to the Amendment which I proposed, and that which has been proposed by the noble Lord the Member for Tiverton (Viscount Palmerston), I have to say that I shall defer to what appears to be the feeling of the House. I shall not press the Amendment I have given notice of, and the question may now be taken on the Resolution of the hon. Member for Wolverhampton (Mr. C. Villiers), and the Amendment of the noble Lord (Viscount Palmerston).

MR. BRIGHT said, he wished to say by way of explanation, before the House began the debate, that in his speech the other night he had referred to the fact that the Lord Advocate of Scotland had gone as a candidate to Lisburn, and had stood for that borough under the patronage of the Marquess of Hertford. It had been stated in at least one of the papers that he had asserted the gentleman in question had gone to Lisburn under the patronage of the Marquess of Londonderry; and as he did not wish to be supposed capable of making a mistake on such an important question and matter of fact, and as he had received a letter from the son of the noble Lord (the Marquess of Londonderry), who sat in that House, in reference to it, he wished to make that statement, and to correct any erroneous impression which might prevail on the subject.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. GLADSTONE: As a matter of form I wish to observe, that I understand the Amendment of the noble Lord (Viscount Palmerston) was to be moved in case the Amendment of Government was withdrawn. The noble Lord's Amendment has not yet been moved.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON: I intend to move— [An Hon. MEMBER: Do you move it?] Yes, I do. I beg leave to move the Amendment of which I have given notice.

Amendment proposed—

"To leave out from the word 'Country,' to the end of the Question, in order to add the words 'and especially of the Industrious Classes, is mainly the result of recent Legislation, which has established the principle of unrestricted competition, has abolished Taxes imposed for the purposes of Protection, and has thereby diminished the cost and increased the abundance of the principal articles of the Food of the People,' instead thereof."

MR. BOOKER: Before I proceed to discuss the important question now before the House, I will beg to assure the noble Viscount opposite (Viscount Palmerston), of the high and grateful sense I entertain of the kindness and consideration which prompted him to step forward, under motives and feelings towards this side of the House which he has so well expressed, to make the conciliatory proposition which he has made, and which has been accepted by the Government. I hope, however, the noble Lord will not receive it as any mark of public or personal disrespect, if I, and those who act with me, feel ourselves unable to assent to his Amendment. Sir, there is no Member of this Assembly more thoroughly convinced of the hollowness and unsoundness of that system of commercial legislation now attempted to be forced permanently upon us, or who is more deeply but voluntarily committed to the opposite system, to which I still firmly adhere, than I am: and, notwithstanding I escaped the lash of the hon. Member for Manchester the other night, I desire to avow this—that there is no one who more deeply deplores than I do the course which Her Majesty's Government have been compelled, or have felt it their duty, to pursue, on this question of our future legislation. The speech of the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer may have been a triumphant vindication of the Government—certainly it was a masterly exposition of the position in which the Government have found themselves placed. But in that speech there was no vindication of the course which I have openly and consistently pursued. I have been a member of that great party which has been called the Country party, which I have ever understood to have been united together by a principle, and that principle was, and is, protection to our native industry and capital. That principle, on the platform and the hustings, as well as in this House, I have endeavoured, to the utmost of my power, to maintain. I have done so, through good report and evil report, under much of obloquy, some of which I may have justly merited, but much of which I have felt was harsh, and not justly deserved. Before, then, I can consent to read a recantation, and abjure the principles of a whole life, I trust the House will grant me its indulgence, while I give my reasons for the faith which is still in me. Now, Sir, I have always understood that the system of free trade, now to be extended to free and unrestricted competition, was ushered in by a system of relaxation of our commercial tariff in the year 1842. I admit that, under the circumstances of the country, that was a wise and beneficial measure, and that great advantages flowed from it to the country at large. I will also allow, what indeed it would be foolish and idle to deny, that the years 1843, 1844 and 1845, were years of great national prosperity. Let me, however, pause here for a moment, and inquire what financial and commercial measures passed the Legislature during this period: in 1844, the Charter of the Bank of England was passed, and in 1845 those of Scotland and Ireland followed: in the year 1844 money was abundant, and as easy of attainment as it is at the present moment; the Bank of England fixed its rate of interest at 2 per cent, and advances could be had, as now, from private sources at $1\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. And now, Sir, what followed? The year 1846 was confessedly a period of the wildest speculation ever known in the annals of the country. In addition to private and joint-stock adventures of every sort and kind, railway speculations, requiring capital to the extent of nearly four hundred millions, received the sanction of the Legislature. In 1846, too, the Corn Laws were repealed; and now commenced in earnest, and without restriction, the application of the principle, and the development of the effects, of your boasted system and policy of free trade. Well, Sir, the very next succeeding year, 1847, brought a collapse in the commercial world, and a convulsion which shook commercial credit to its very centre. In the crash, mercantile and commercial capital, to the extent, I think, of upwards of fifty millions, in a few months was swept away, and many of the highest, and some of the oldest of our commercial firms were levelled to the dust. Money, wealth, prosperity, all disappeared; the Government fixed the rate of interest for advances by the Bank of England at 8 per cent, and in private transactions it rose to 12, 15, and even, under the severity of the pressure, to 18 and 20 per cent: and this was under your boasted system of free trade. It certainly was an extraordinary and unexpected retribution, that trade and commerce should have felt and staggered under the first shock. You persevered in your system, and our domestic agriculture next reeled under the blow. During the succeeding years an amount of agricultural depression was experienced never before known. Agricultural capital was swept away by millions, as we have a ready witness in the hon. and learned Mover of these Resolutions. This, too, occurred under your boasted system of free trade; and the pressure continued with increased and accumulating violence from year to year, until Providence opened to us those vast regions and stores of mineral wealth, whence have flowed, ever since, riches to an enormous extent. Providence, Sir, and not human legislation, nor any efforts or results of human wisdom, has removed the pressure, and produced these blessings under which the country is now beginning to revive; and, Sir, if the principle of protection to our native industry and capital were now prevailing—firmly maintained and prudently extended or relaxed, as occasion justified—I know of no limit within which our national prosperity would now be confined. Sir, I have felt this, and still feel it, that it is incontrovertible and true. I have endeavoured to fight the battle of protection honestly and manfully, but I am perfectly willing to admit that we have suffered defeat. I am willing to admit that Manchester has proved too strong for us. But I am of opinion, as the noble Viscount the Member for Tiverton seems to be of opinion, that, if we are vanquished and acknowledge it frankly, to require of us to abjure and surrender all the fixed opinions of our lives, and to give a flat denial, by our votes, to our own past career, is going much too far. Under the existing prosperity of the industrious classes, I, for one, have no intention to attempt to reverse or alter that policy which, after a distinct appeal made to it, the country has now unequivocally confirmed. I will give it a fair trial. My own convictions remain unaltered, and are not by force and violence to be eradicated; but the battle has been fought in the country, and I acknowledge my party to be beaten. I utterly deny, however, that it is to that policy of free trade that the improved condition of the country is to be ascribed. I wish to be accurately informed of the extent to which that metallic wealth which Providence has disclosed to us, has flowed, and is continuing to flow, into this country. I believe it to be to an extent perfectly astonishing. The discovery of these gold regions, too, has had a double effect on the condition of the country. It has opened avenues and outlets for the out-pouring of a redundant population; and it is my opinion that it is to this in-pouring of metallic wealth, coupled with a vast out-pouring, in a continuous stream, of masses of our people, that the prosperous condition of the working and industrious classes, and those who employ them, too, is to be mainly attributed. This conviction, Sir, is so impressed on my mind, that I deeply regret I cannot concur in the Amendment of the noble Lord; still less can I give my assent to the original Resolutions of the hon. and learned Member for Wolverhampton. But, Sir, I feel as little disposed to embarrass the Government, in whose general policy I most fully concur. Although, then, upon the great questions of free trade and protection I lament the policy they have adopted, and the surrender they have made, and I must differ from them, yet upon all the great constitutional questions that must force themselves on the consideration of Parliament—in upholding inviolate the safety, honour, and dignity of the Crown,—in protecting and purifying the Church, in maintaining the Christian character of the Legislature; in defending our Protestant institutions in Church and State, both in this and the sister island, against that monstrous confederacy which, under the guise and watchword of religious equality, has reared its head—on all these questions of public policy they will have my earnest, zealous, and unflinching support. And, Sir, on the question of free trade, or, as it is now to be, free and unrestricted competition, they will not need my support, for if Gentlemen opposite are true to their ancient professions, of regarding measures and not men, they must command theirs. I rose, Sir, at this stage of the debate, to record my unaltered convictions on the subject of protection to our native interests; to declare my determina-nation to vote against the Resolutions of the hon. and learned Member for Wolverhampton; and at the same time to express my deep regret, on every ground, that I cannot record my vote in favour of the Amendment of the noble Lord the Member for Tiverton.

MR. BERNAL OSBORNE said, he apprehended that the supplemental debate which they had witnessed that evening was about one of the most irregular things that had probably ever been witnessed in that House, and he should hope that the commencement of a new Parliament hon. Members would not make a precedent of a debate in which he did think the distinguished order of Baronets had not cut a very distinguished figure. Now his hon. Friend the Member for the Tower Hamlets (Sir W. Clay) was a very gentlemanly man—he was a man of very fine and sensitive feelings—and the Resolution of his hon. Friend the Member for Wolverhampton (Mr. C. Villiers) had gained upon his susceptibility. His

but he must say, if the hon. Baronet the Member for the Tower Hamlets brought these fine susceptibilities into the House, he would be more qualified to weep over the Sorrows of Werter, than to discuss the principle of Free Trade. He (Mr. B. Osborne) lamented that the hon. Baronet had thought proper to put the question to the hon. Member for Wolverhampton; he lamented that the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Carlisle (Sir J. Graham) should have originated that debate, which he thought Mr. Speaker would be of opinion had been completely out of order. But what was the position they stood in at the present moment? They had no less than four Resolutions before them. No; one had been withdrawn, and there were only three. [An Hon. MEMBER: No! only two.] He believed there was a third; or else, what had become of the Resolution proposed by the right hon. Baronet the Member for Carlisle? [An Hon. MEMBER: No, no! that’s gone too.] What, had hon. Gentlemen opposite swallowed that too? [“ No, no!”] Oh, then, it was not moved, but was intended to be a supplemental Resolution. But, if he understood the confusion of to-night, the noble Lord the Member for Tiverton (Viscount Palmerston) had moved an Amendment to the original Resolution, which had been improved by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Carlisle, and adopted by the right hon. the Chancellor of the Exchequer in the name of the Government. But for himself he had no hesitation on reading the original Resolution, to say that it was the one which the House ought to adopt, nor did he think the country would be under any mistake as to its terms or appearance. This was no question of words: it was not a matter to be left to the etiquette of the Pump-room of Bath, or to a master of the ceremonies. It was the vindication of a policy—a policy which Sir Robert Peel commenced in 1842, and completed in 1846. It might be all very well for some Gentlemen to indulge in nice criticisms, and he must tell the noble Lord the Member for Tiverton that they were there to consider what was just and right: it was a great question of political morality, and not a question of what was agreeable to Gentlemen on the other side of the House. He was therefore very much surprised at the noble Lord's Amendment, but if he was surprised at the Amendment, he was still more surprised at the speech with which it was accompanied. He was aware that some people were of opinion that it was quite natural in the noble Lord—who might be considered as a sort of wet nurse to the present Administration—who attended them in their infancy, and cherished them in their adversities last Session—to step in to relieve the British Protectionist when he was almost choking with their endcavours to swallow a crust of Free Trade bread. Some people thought it was quite natural for the noble Lord, at such a conjunction to pat them on the back, and administer a mixture of his own creation. But if he took exception to the terms of the noble Lord's Amendment, what was he to say to his speech? He had a strong impression that the sympathies of the noble Lord would hereafter be enlisted more by the Tory benches than by his old and tried friends. He entertained a great respect for the noble Lord—he had a great admiration for him; yes, he proved that by his vote when the noble Lord on a memorable occasion was exposed to the danger of a vote of censure which his new friends wished to pass upon him: on that occasion, as an independent Member, he gave the noble Lord his humble support; he approved of the noble Lord's policy on that occasion, and, therefore, he had a just right now to speak his honest convictions as to the course pursued by the noble Lord now. It might be all very well for the noble Lord to say of his new friends and connexions on the other side of the House, that they were pursuing a politic course; but he thought that the noble Lord went rather too far when he said it was a course that was creditable. He might consent to say that it was a politic course; but he must dissent from the noble Lord in toto as to the credit which the noble Lord appeared to attach to that course. And when the noble Lord, forsooth, taunted his hon. Friend the Member for Manchester (Mr. Bright), and told him that he was making a great national interest a party question, he must take leave to ask the noble Lord who it was that had made it a party question for six long years? Who was it indeed? Was it the Free Traders in the House, or out of the House? No, it was the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer and his associates on the other side; and he thought there was little room for any man to talk about the credit of their course. For his part, no honest politician could say that the conduct of the Protectionist party had been a credit to themselves. But the noble Lord had taken his own line; he had chosen to move an Amendment to the original Resolution, thereby endeavouring to break up the united opinion of the liberal side of the House. It was very natural that the movement of the noble Lord should be viewed with suspicion by those who had hitherto been his friends; but if the noble Lord surprised him by his Amendment and his speech, what was his surprise to hear the speech of the Atlas of the Administration and the Proteus of protection, the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer? He thought the House would agree with him in saying, that the fluency of the right hon. Gentleman's dictum was only equalled by the hardness of his assertions. The right hon. Gentleman talked of the audacity of the noble Lord the Member for the City of London (Lord John Russell). Why, the right hon. Gentleman appeared to him to have taken a leaf out of the book of a great French character. [Laughter.] Oh, but he did not allude to M. Thiers. He spoke of the great French character at the time of the French Revolution—Danton, who, when he was asked to give a reason for his success, said, "Audacity, always audacity." Well, now, what was the course pursued by the right hon. Gentleman? The right hon. Gentleman actually had the face to tell the House, the other night, after the course he had pursued for six years, that neither the Earl of Derby nor himself had endeavoured to reverse the system of Free Trade. True, the right hon. Gentleman never had the courage to make a direct or specific attempt to reverse the Free Trade policy, but the House must recollect the course which he allowed his friends and followers to pursue. The right hon. Gentleman the other night favoured the House with his own history of the Protectionist party and their course during the last six years. Then the right hon. Gentleman reminded him somewhat of another history, or rather a romance, namely, Hume's Apology for the Stewarts. But the right hon. Gentleman's history was nothing more nor less than an apology for his party, or rather for himself. But what course did the right hon. Gentleman really pursue? He would have them believe that he had stood by ever since 1846, and never even attempted to refute the doctrines of Free Trade. But was there no external agitation in the country? Was there not a house taken in Bond-street for disseminating tracts and conducting the whole business of the Protectionist movement? Why, if he was not mistaken, the hon. Gentleman who was now Secretary to the Admiralty was Secretary to the Bond-street Association. Well, now, what was the first movement of this gang? If the House would bear with him for a few minutes, he would show them by a few quotations. There had been a good deal of quoting in the course of this debate, but he would promise them that what he read should be new matter. He would not trouble them with the notions of ancient county Members, who were men to be pitied, but he would draw upon the fountain-head of the party. The right hon. Gentleman had told them that neither he nor the Earl of Derby ever was engaged in the Protectionist agitation; but if they were not, some of their principal supporters were, and he would take leave to mention an incident in proof of this, which no doubt the hon. Gentleman the Secretary to the Admiralty would well remember. In the year 1849, on June the 26th, a meeting was held in Drury-lane Theatre, which the party had taken at the time. At this period the Duke of Richmond was in the chair, and very active; indeed, it might almost be said that there were six Richmonds in the field—for his Grace was here, there, and everywhere; now in Sussex, now in Essex, then in London, and in any announcements of Protectionist meetings you were always sure to see Mr. Ellman and the Duke of Richmond in red letters in the Bill. The Duke of Richmond invariably took the lead in opening the ball; for instance, he took the chair on this occasion, and the meeting was held to receive the Report of the Committee of the Central Society. The first Resolution for receiving the Report was moved by a Cabinet Minister. But before mentioning his name, the House should see what he said. These were the men, mark you! who never attempted to reverse the policy of Free Trade. This speaker thought the country was going to be ruined by a free trade in gloves, and then he went on to say—

“ He was not one of those who wished a Minister to be obstinate in details, but he wished him to be obstinate in principle; a man without firmness of principle was dangerous, unfitted for office. Three months before (the repeal of the Corn Laws) Sir Robert Peel spoke strongly in favour of this Bill of three years before. . . . What a blow to the character of our public men, and, through them, to the character of this country in the face of Europe! It was not too late to retrace steps so rashly made. He hoped to God the time would never come when the free-trade theory would be consummated; but, should it please God, in His anger, that it should be effected, then would this great kingdom soon return to her normal and natural state, a weather-beaten island in a northern sea.”

And who did the House think was the speaker of this eloquent and moving address? Who was it that was afraid Free Trade would reduce this country into a weather-beaten island in a northern sea? No other person, indeed, than the noble Lord the present Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs (the Earl of Malmesbury), a colleague of the right hon. Gentleman, who had never done anything to reverse the doctrines of Free Trade. But was the noble Lord of that opinion still? He wished they had him in that House. The Motion for the adoption of the Report was seconded by another Minister, but not a Cabinet Minister. It was seconded by a gentleman not of so many words as the previous speaker; he took a passage from the speech of the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer. Well, the Chancellor of the Exchequer quotes, and why should not other people quote him? The gentleman said, “ the flower of the country were with him, and therefore the cause of protected and regenerated England must triumph.” He went on to observe—and the British lion was never taken such liberties with as in this passage—“ The British lion is a loyal lion; he is a bold one, when you do put him on his legs; he may be easily put up, but he is an awkward animal to put down." A Mr. Bosanquet was the gentleman who said this, but who he was he (Mr. B. Osborne) did not know; but Mr. G. F. Young, whom the Earl of Derby wished to make Vice-President of the Board of Trade, concluded a Motion at the same meeting for passing a vote of thanks to the noble Chairman by counselling the farmers what to do. They were to "agitate, agitate, agitate!" So much, then, for 1849; but let him follow these loyal Protectionists up. That assiduous Gentleman the present Secretary to the Admiralty was at this time Secretary to No. 17, Bond-street, where he was everything. He was everywhere, and did all sorts of things. He took the Crown and Anchor, where he got up a meeting in 1850. Well, the Crown and Anchor was taken, and who was in the chair? He did not know what had become of him, for lately he had not heard of him. The chairman was a noble Duke, and the man who threatened to make and unmake Peel. What had become of the Duke of Richmond? Nothing had been heard of him in the other House lately. Well, the Duke of Richmond was in the chair, and the meeting was attended by a few Ministers—men who now professed that they had never done anything to reverse the doctrines of Free Trade. The Earl of Eglintoun was there, Major Beresford was there, and so was poor Mr. Christopher. The Earl of Malmesbury was there, Mr. Forbes Mackenzie was there, Lord John Manners was there, and so was Sir John Trollope and Mr. Chowler. Now let the House listen to the speech of this last-named individual, and remember that the Duke of Richmond was again in the chair, and opened the proceedings of the day. He said—

"If this country were to continue great and free, moderate import duties must be established; the experiment (of free trade) had been tried and failed; common sense always said it would fail. He recommended the tenant-farmers to persevere; let each, when they returned home, tell their neighbours to persevere, and justice would sooner or later take place."

There were several Resolutions moved, and the first was proposed by the hon. Member for Hereford (Mr. Booker). Unless the House wished it, he would not read the hon. Gentleman's speech, because it was very much like the one he had made that evening. This was, however, the Resolution moved by him:—

"That the difficulty and intolerable distress of agriculture, and other great interests of the country, and the state of deprivation and suffering to which large masses of the industrial population are reduced, are fraught with consequences most disastrous to public welfare, and, if not speedily remedied, must prove fatal to the maintenance of public credit, will endanger the public peace, and may even place in peril the safety of the State."

This Resolution, which was pretty well for Mr. Booker, was carried with great enthusiasm, and it was seconded by that notorious and valiant gentleman Mr. Chowler. He did not know if the House would wish to hear what Mr. Chowler said; it was the famous horse speech, and Mr. Chowler (whom he looked upon as a very ill-used man) spoke to the following effect:—

"Mr. Cobden says, if you attempt to reintroduce protection, what he will do, and what will become of the landlords; but I say, if the landlords will stick to us, we will stick to them." [Here—this was the reporter's description of the scene—the assembly rose, and cheered vociferously. Earl Stanhope struck the speaker on the shoulders in approbation of the sentiment, and all on the platform rose and cheered.] "But we will go further—we have got nine-tenths of the horses of the kingdom, and men to ride them. . . . We will protect Her Majesty, if She will protect us. (Vociferous cheering.)"

The next Resolution was moved by a Mr. E. Ball. He hoped it was not the hon. Member of that name. [Mr. BALL here nodded his head acquiescingly.] He was happy to see the hon. Member looking so well after what he had said at the Crown and Anchor. He said, and he spoke out as he did the other night honestly and straightforwardly, for which he respected the hon. Member:—

"It was painful to speak of the landlords in terms of disparagement, but was it not true they (the farmers) had fallen, not by the League, not by the treachery of Sir Robert Peel, but because their landlords, the aristocracy, had swerved from their duty?"

What did the hon. Member say now? Let the House listen to what followed, and then look at the hon. Gentleman:—

"Would they tell him, a brokenhearted man, passing into a state of poverty, that he was to fear the threats of a demagogue?"

Then followed something rather obscure:—

"They, the tenant-farmers, would be prepared to take those terrible steps, which it was most frightful to imagine, but which necessity was driving them to contemplate. [Tremendous cheers, at the close of which a gentleman upon the platform proposed three groans for Sir Robert Peel, the arch enemy of the human species.]"

Yet these were the Gentlemen who had done nothing to reverse Free Trade; and hon. Members were told to be careful not to wound the feelings of Gentlemen who had proposed three groans, as the greatest enemy of the human species, for the greatest Minister who ever lived! The proceedings were concluded by the Earl of Eglintoun, the present Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, proposing a vote of thanks to the noble Duke in the chair, “for his manly and consistent maintenance of the cause of protection on all occasions.” This was seconded by a Cabinet Minister—Lord John Manners. And would the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer tell him that he did not stand by and pat them on the back, or that they would have gone to these meetings if they were not agreeable to the Earl of Derby, or to their present master, Mr. Disraeli? There must be plain speaking to-night; they must not have the politeness of diplomacy introduced for the evasion of a principle. Protection was the only thing upon which the Chancellor of the Exchequer had been consistent. On the 22nd of January, 1846, the right hon. Gentleman said in his speech on the Address—

“To the opinions which I have expressed in this House in favour of Protection I adhere. They sent me to this House, and, if I had relinquished them, I should have relinquished my seat also.” [3 Hansard, lxxxiii. 112.]

Then the right hon. Gentleman introduced his famous parallel of the Turkish Admiral steering his fleet into the enemy’s port; and what did he say of a Ministry, honest and able, which he (Mr. B. Osborne) should be glad to see now in office? He said—

“Who does not remember the ‘sacred cause of protection,’ the cause for which Sovereigns were thwarted—Parliaments dissolved—and a nation taken in? When one looks at the Ministry, seeing of what they are composed, one is hardly certain whether ‘the future’ of which they are thinking is indeed posterity, or only the coming quarter day.” [Ibid. p. 115, 119.]

In his speech on the Corn Laws on May 15, 1846, the right hon. Gentleman spoke of the conversion of the Saxons by Charlemagne in battalions, and their being baptised in platoons. He then said of Sir Robert Peel—

“‘His life has been one great appropriation clause,’ and he concluded, ‘I believe the country will not long endure this huckstering tyranny of the Treasury bench—these political pedlars, that bought their party in the cheapest market and sold us in the dearest.’” [Ibid. lxxxvi. 675-76.]

In 1849, on the 1st of February, the right hon. Gentleman moved an Amendment on the Address, and withdrew it.

He then said—“In my opinion the new commercial system has had a trial, a fair trial, and has failed.” And the right hon. Gentleman looked forward to a time when it might be revised. On the 8th of March, 1849, the right hon. Gentleman moved for a Committee to inquire into the burdens on land. He then said, “I still believe our new commercial system is founded on erroneous principles.” On the 15th of March the right hon. Gentleman made that allusion to “protected and regenerated England.” On the 1st of February, 1850, the right hon. Gentleman voted for the Amendment to the Address moved by the right hon. Member for South Lincolnshire (Sir J. Trollope). He said he never made a direct Motion in that House against free trade, but he took advantage of a Motion in 1850 for a moderate fixed duty to speak and vote for it. On the 14th of May, 1850, the right hon. Gentleman said—

“I ask you to protect the rights and interests of labour generally—in the first place, by allowing no free imports from countries which meet you with countervailing duties; and, in the second place, with respect to agricultural produce, to compensate the soil for the burdens from which other classes are free, by an equivalent duty.” [3 Hansard, cxi. 86.]

And then the right hon. Gentleman came to the House in a November Session in 1852, and, with a face which he never saw equalled in the theatre, he dared to tell the House that he had never attempted to reverse the policy of Free Trade! He said, too, that the Earl of Derby had never done so. Of the two he thought the Chancellor of the Exchequer was a much safer and more discreet man. The Earl of Derby affected to be affronted the other night in the House of Lords about his personal honour. He (Mr. B. Osborne) said this was gross affectation, and he would prove it. In 1846 the noble Lord broke up the Government of Sir Robert Peel.

“‘I had placed before me,’ he told the House of Lords, ‘the choice of separating from my colleagues, or of sacrificing my own individual opinion, and what I conceive to be my own personal consistency and honour. I had to consider the course which, in my opinion, my public duty and my private honour required. I tried to school myself into the belief that, under certain circumstances, the interests of the country might require even the sacrifice of a public and personal character. My Lords,’ he exclaimed, ‘I could not bring myself to so humiliating a conclusion.’”

party would bring a man to. ["Oh, oh!"] Did hon. Gentlemen opposite want any more? Was not every man satisfied that the noble Earl at the head of the Government had done all he could to reverse Free Trade? He knew that what he was saying was disagreeable to hon. Gentlemen opposite. He did not wish to hurt the feelings of hon. Members opposite, but he must tell them that he did not sympathise with the fine sensibilities of the hon. Baronet the Member for the Tower Hamlets (Sir W. Clay). He had farmers for his constituents, and he spoke on their behalf. [Lord BURGHLEY: Bethnal-green.] This noble Lord—a Lord of the Bedchamber—who represented a snug borough, might well be proud of such a large and honest constituency as that of Bethnal-green. He would now refer to the noble Lord's (the Earl of Derby's) famous "Up-guards-and-at'em" speech: he was now gone into the Rifles. When the noble Lord had come into power, several gentlemen waited on the noble Lord to learn what he intended to do. Here was his answer. It was very important:—

"If there be any who are of opinion that I am flinching from, or hesitating in the advocacy of, those principles which I held in conjunction with my late Friend (Lord George Bentinck), I authorise you to assure one and all that those who represent that, in my case will find no hesitation, no flinching, no change of opinion. I only look for the day when it may be possible for me to use the memorable words of the Duke of Wellington, on the field of Waterloo [words, by the way, which he (Mr. B. Osborne) believed the Duke never did use], and say, 'Up, Guards, and at'em!'"

Such were the speeches of the Earl of Derby; and was there any Member so young, any Member so inexperienced in Parliamentary debates, that he would believe the statement of the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer, that neither he nor his colleagues in the other House ever took any steps to reverse Free Trade. He would now refer to a speech made by a right hon. Gentleman of high character—the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster and Member for North Lincolnshire (Mr. Christopher). [Lord BURGHLEY: Hear, hear!] Ah! the noble Lord must listen: it might be disagreeable, but Lords of the Bedchamber must listen. He could well imagine that all this was very disagreeable to hear; but, perhaps, the noble Lord would answer him on his legs after he had done. Now, could anybody imagine that the right hon. Gentleman the Member for North

Lincolnshire would have gone to his constituents with this address if he had not been authorised to do so by the Earl of Derby—the address which he issued when he accepted office. Here was an address sent to him (Mr. B. Osborne) by one of the right hon. Gentleman's constituents in Lincolnshire—a constituent who had hitherto supported the right hon. Gentleman, but was now disgusted with him. The right hon. Gentleman said—

"Her Majesty having been graciously pleased to entrust to my care the Seals of the Duchy of Lancaster, I accept office under the administration of the Earl of Derby, from a conviction of his sincere desire to reverse"—[let the House mark the word 'reverse']—"to reverse that financial and commercial policy which is so injurious to native industry and capital."

Had he (Mr. B. Osborne) made out his case? Was the House of opinion that the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer, and his Colleagues, had from first to last, in season and out of season, been consistent in this one particular, their strenuous exertions and endeavours for six years to reverse the policy of Free Trade? It might be said, "Hon. Gentlemen wanted a cry; Protection was taken up, and therefore it was that all these honest men and deluded farmers were taken in." He did not know what the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer's future course would be; probably next month he would have an invasion, or something of that kind, to talk about; but there could be no doubt that the course which had been pursued on this occasion was not one which would conduce to the advancement of the great cause of public morality. They were told, however, that Protection was one of those things which were exhausted and obsolete. Was the House sure of that? Was it quite sure that the sudden conversion of these Gentlemen was sincere? He feared that it was not. He had there a very extraordinary speech, made within the last fortnight, by a Minister—a penitential Minister—the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster (Mr. Christopher). The right hon. Gentleman went down to his constituents within the last fortnight—and this was very material, because it gave them the inference which was drawn by the supporters of the Government as to the course now taken by the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer. It seemed that there was a dinner given at the Angel Inn, Wainfleet. The right hon. Gentleman was present, and the account of his speech was copied from the Boston Herald. The right hon. Gentleman said—

“At the time when I accepted office there was a great struggle going on in the country for the maintenance of Protestant and Protectionist principles”—

Why the two were put together he (Mr. B. Osborne) could not understand, unless it was because both began with “P.”

—“I trust the present constitution of Parliament is such as to leave no doubt that they will fully uphold our Protestant institutions; and with regard to the other subject—Protection—I have only emphatically to assure you that I entirely adhere to the opinions and principles I have always expressed. I can see nothing in the present aspect of affairs to alter my conviction that that which is called ‘the Protectionist policy’ is a true and wise policy for this nation to adopt. At the general election I stated that if the Government were unable to carry a Protective system, which would not except foreign corn—if the complexion of the new Parliament should be such as to prevent Her Majesty’s Government from carrying out the principles which would raise from the foreign grower a large portion of revenue, and at the same time afford relief to the suffering class—then it would be their duty to establish such an equalisation and readjustment of the burdens of taxation as”—to do what?—“as indirectly to some extent to effect the same object.”

This was on November the 13th. Here was an explanation by a Minister of the Queen’s Speech—“You will have seen by Her Majesty’s Speech that we”—speaking of the Ministry—“we have been compelled to adopt the latter alternative.” Why, could there be a doubt in the mind of any man, after hearing that Speech, that it was a cut-and-shuffle transaction? Could there be any doubt that Her Majesty’s Ministers were about to do indirectly what they had not the courage to do in the face of that House? They had seen, or at least they had got an inkling of the meaning of “unreserved adherence” to the Free-Trade policy; they had seen the right hon. Gentleman the Member for North Lincolnshire confessing what that was. He believed it was an “unreserved adherence” not to Free Trade, but to their seats. But he did take exception, and he believed the House would take exception, as a matter of principle, to men carrying on the Government of this country who were opposed, in their hearts, to the principles of Free Trade. In spite of what had been said by the noble Lord the Member for Tiverton, as to the indifference of the great public out of doors, to the private opinions of Members of Parliament and of Ministers, he did take exception to the committing of any cause to the hands of men who were opposed to it in their hearts. What was the great theory of Parliamentary government by an Opposition, which was so frequently dilated upon, and in fact first denounced, by the right hon. the Chancellor of the Exchequer? What was his complaint—his argument—against Sir Robert Peel? That he had no business to remain in office to advocate principles which were first advocated and maintained by the hon. Member for the West Riding (Mr. Cobden)? What was the basis of his opposition to a Bill, to which, in itself, he said, he had no objection? Why, that it was brought forward by men who, he contended, had no business to bring it forward. He (Mr. B. Osborne) now alluded to the Maynooth Bill of 1845. There was one passage in the right hon. Gentleman’s speech on that occasion which was really so remarkable, that much as he had quoted, he thought it would not be unacceptable to the House. In the year 1845, Sir Robert Peel, as the House well knew, brought in his Motion—a just and wise Motion he (Mr. B. Osborne) thought it—to render the establishment of Maynooth more consonant with the feelings of the Irish people. What was the course taken on that occasion by the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer, who, forsooth, was now carrying out principles to which he was in his heart opposed? The Chancellor of the Exchequer, then simply Member for Buckinghamshire, said—

“I oppose this Bill on account of the manner in which it has been introduced. I oppose it also on account of the men by whom it has been brought forward, &c.; and to be told, because these men have crossed the House, and have abandoned with their former seats their former professions, these men’s measures and actions are to remain unopposed, &c. You have permitted men to gain power and enter place, and then carry measures exactly the reverse of those which they professed when in opposition. I say that the Parliamentary course is for this House to have the advantage of a Government formed on distinct principles, &c., not a Parliamentary middleman, who bamboozles one party and plunders the other. Let us have no party question, but fixity of tenure. Let us dethrone this dynasty of deception by putting an end to the intolerable yoke of official despotism and Parliamentary imposture.”

Now, he (Mr. B. Osborne) maintained that the man who had based his opposition on that ground had no right to hold office for one minute to carry out principles which he had stolen from other people. He must say that, since the lamented demise of that celebrated Oriental juggler, Ramo Samce—a gentleman who was equally known for his dexterity of hand and his great courage—a gentleman who could alike cut for himself a hand of trumps and swallow a broadsword—he had known no individual with so many ingenious devices, and such inordinate capacity of swallow, as the right hon. Gentleman, the creator of his party in that House. But, at the same time, he called upon that House not to be deluded by a great State conjuror—but in giving its vote to do what was right and just. [An Hon. MEMBER: Shame!] Yes: but no one on the other side called out “shame” when the late Sir Robert Peel was abused. They (the supporters of the Government), who acknowledged that night that Sir Robert Peel was a great and good man—a truth which all the country acknowledged out of doors—they who made that acknowledgment now did not call “shame” at the period to which he referred, but they stood by and hounded their man on, and now they cried “shame.” He (Mr. B. Osborne) agreed with the noble Lord the Member for North Leicestershire (the Marquess of Granby) that something was due to the past; and when the new Members of that House were appealed to, and told to recollect their duties, he would ask them not to be behind the working and other classes in this country who had raised monuments to the late Sir Robert Peel, but to pay a tribute to his memory on that occasion, and not to hesitate for one moment in declaring by their vote that the policy of 1846 was wise and just. They need not be alarmed at the threat of resignation. That was an old threat, and sure he was, that if they did resign, the country would bow to their decision. The time had gone by when there need be any difficulty in creating a Ministry, and one use of the present one was to show how a Ministry might be improvised. The House might depend upon it, that so long as the cholera did not carry off the Government clerks, the Government would be carried on. For his own part, he had no confidence in the principles of the right hon. Gentleman or his party. He had alluded to their conduct in 1846, and probably their Protestantism might be on a par with their Protectionist principles, but he called on the House not to give their confidence to a gang of political latitudinarians who had no belief, politically speaking, save on the Treasury bench, no hope but in the perpetuity of place. He could feel no doubt as to how his vote should be given. He could not follow the noble Lord the Member for Tiverton in his Motion, but should give his confidence in all sincerity to the hon. Member for Wolverhampton.

MR. E. BALL said, that he rose under very great disadvantages, for he could not pretend to the possession of that quality of audacity, which the French authority quoted by the hon. Gentleman who had just sat down had declared essential to success—he could not, however, help subscribing to the truth of the sentiment from the example the House had been witnessing. He (Mr. Ball) felt that he had a right to trespass on the attention of the House, having attended many of the meetings to which hon. Gentlemen opposite had referred, and which it seemed to him they ought not to treat with such contumely, inasmuch as they appeared to have furnished the hon. Member, and the hon. Member for Manchester with the subject-matter of their speeches. It struck him that, having derived so much amusement from the proceedings at these meetings, they ought to refer to them in a very different spirit from that in which they did. [Laughter]. Not having anything of the ludicrous in his composition, wherewith to amuse the House, he (Mr. Ball) would proceed to address himself to the real question before them. The hon. and learned Member for Wolverhampton stated the other night when he introduced the Resolution, that “the farmers of England were not quite so quick as other persons, and that it was, therefore, very wrong for the landlords to take advantage of their ignorance.” That statement he repudiated. He asserted that the farmers of England were not deficient of intelligence. Of course, he was not going to measure the intellect of the farmers with that of the legal or professional men, but, compared with their equals in society, they would not be found beneath them. If he took the orators, the historians, and general literati of the country, and compared them with those of the Continent, he had no doubt that their equals, it may be their superiors, would be found; but throughout the world—as far as the science and practice of agriculture went—the farmers of England had no superiors. The great theme of the hon. and learned Member for Wolverhampton was, that they should not have protection because it advanced the prices of all necessary commodities, and because cheapness was a desideratum, and influenced the happiness and prosperity of a country. He (Mr. Ball) disputed the assertion “that cheapness was a desideratum." Cheapness was no proof of national prosperity and welfare; but, on the contrary, in proportion as things were cheap the nation was impoverished. Cheapness, as he understood the term, signified much work and little wages. If he were convinced that it would be for the benefit of the poor and the labouring classes that there should be no protection, he protested most solemnly he would not think of advocating it. But he looked on it as the duty of all Governments, and the first and most paramount duty, to protect the poor. The man who neglected the poor did that which parted society, and which finally recoiled on himself with terrible effect. He had no hesitation in declaring that, in his opinion, the man who defrauded the labourers was a shedder of blood; and consequently, if a duty on corn injured them, he would not be its advocate. The late Sir Robert Peel had been frequently referred to in the present debate; and therefore it could not be out of place to give the House an illustration of that right hon. Baronet at one period of his career, for the purpose of showing that people were not happy in proportion to cheapness. Sir Robert Peel, on one occasion, when referring to the corn laws, said—

"He had looked about over the world, and had endeavoured to ascertain the proportion in which the people of various countries consumed, in order to ascertain whether they get more for their individual consumption of the necessaries of life, where these commodities were cheap, as compared with where they were dear. He found that in Poland and Russia the consumption was about five bushels of grain to each individual per year; Germany, where corn was dearer, six bushels per head; in France, where corn was dearer than in any other country excepting England, seven bushels per head; but in England the average consumption was eight bushels per head, and nearly the whole of that consisted of wheat."

Now he should like hon. Gentlemen, instead of acting for the amusement of the House, to bring forward something that the mind could comprehend and the reason conceive. It had been stated several times in that House, that the entire community—particularly the working classes—were in favour of free trade, and that scarcely twenty persons could be found who entertained a different opinion. That he also denied, and in substantiation of his denial he hoped the House would permit him to read the Resolutions unanimously adopted at a meeting of the metropolitan trades' delegates held in London a few days since. The document and Resolutions were as follow:—

"PROCLAMATION OF THE WORKING CLASSES OF GREAT BRITAIN.

"Free Trade v. Protection.

"Whereas a notice of Motion has been given and a Resolution placed on the journals of the House of Commons by Mr. Villiers, seeking to pledge the Legislature to an unqualified approval and a further extension of the mis-called free-trade policy, otherwise unrestricted competition; and whereas it is desirable that publicity should be given to the real and deliberate sentiments of the working classes in respect to the effects of that policy on their interests: Now, be it known that at a large meeting of the working classes convened to discuss the relative merits of free-trade and protection, the following Resolutions were unanimously adopted, viz.—

"1. Resolved—That the science of political economy as now taught, believed, and practised by those who advocate 'cheapness,' by means of unregulated universal competition, mis-called 'free trade,' has a most pernicious effect on the minds and actions of statesmen, is destructive of honest dealing, subversive of morality, ruinous to the national resources and character, tending to slavery, murderous in its operations of humanity, and therefore ought to be entirely abandoned.

"2. That the principle of protection to humanity, to the products of labour, land, and capital in Great Britain and her colonies, is the true basis of political and social economy, calculated to give employment and fair remuneration for labour, profit on capital, promote the development of the national genius, energies, and resources, and thereby secure the peace, prosperity, independence, and happiness of the whole British empire.

"3. That this meeting sympathises with all who are suffering under the mis-called 'free-trade' policy, and hails with great satisfaction the efforts now making to reverse the present system of universal competition, and the introduction of a sound practical protective policy for native industry and capital, and will cheerfully co-operate with all classes to obtain legislative enactments for its realisation."

"These resolutions being founded upon the following address of the Metropolitan Trades' Delegates:—

"Fellow Countrymen—As it is now admitted by all classes that labour is the source of wealth, it evidently follows that the prosperity and independence of Great Britain and her colonies will be best promoted by employing and protecting the greatest number of a healthy, industrious, intelligent, and moral population, that can be educated and comfortably maintained by their own industry; therefore it should be the first and most important duty of a wise Government to adopt such measures as will best secure employment to the entire population, and for their labour an abundance of the necessaries and comforts of life. We, therefore, fearlessly assert, that the unrestricted foreign cheap labour policy which has been for a series of years encouraged by the Legislature of the kingdom, and greatly extended by the late Parliament, is theoretically wrong, and, under the existing constitution of society, practically injurious to the working classes, by compelling them to enter into stimulated, unregulated, and hopeless competition at home and abroad, which is opposed to independence and happiness, dangerous to the country, and destructive to the general prosperity of the whole British people.

“ ‘ While reiterating the opinion which we formerly expressed against the present unfair system of reckless competition called free trade, from which its advocates promised so much good, especially to the working classes, but which has only proved “a mockery, a delusion, and a snare,” we will not now impute blame on account of the experiment, nor do we desire to awaken in your minds angry feelings or enmity against any class of legislators or politicians ; but we boldly call upon you to demand from any party that may hold the reins of office, a protective policy for native industry against unfair competition, so that you may be enabled to live by your labour, and give a rational, practical, and useful education to your children, without which the security and prosperity of the empire are impossible.’ ”

Now, he believed the great masses of the poorer classes who had been deluded by the question of the “big loaf” readily subscribed to that document. It really appeared to him to be not only an absurd but a cruel thing to represent cheapness as a blessing. [“Oh, oh!”] Let it be remembered that every article they ate, every beverage they drank, and every article, whether of dress or furniture, in daily use, was manufactured by the poor; and then to say that these things should be cheap, was, in his opinion, opposed to common sense. As to the reparation to be made, as well to the character of the late Sir Robert Peel as to the agricultural classes, he should say there was no man in this country who more loved to listen to Sir Robert Peel than he did, or who gave to the statements of that right hon. Baronet a more ready credence. He not alone believed in his statements, but he acted on them; and recollecting the triumphant manner in which the right hon. Baronet had defended the principle of protection in that House, he thought himself entitled to put in a claim for compensation on behalf of the agricultural classes, who had undertaken responsibilities on the faith of the laws under which they came into occupation of their holdings. Sir Robert Peel once said—

“ When you tell me that corn is 60s. a quarter, I ask, Is there not a paramount necessity for maintaining the obligations of public faith? Can I shut out of my consideration altogether the operation of the malt tax, the operation of the poor-law, the operation of the county rate, and of all those burdens which press so heavily upon the landed interest? ”

On another occasion that right hon. Baronet declared that—

“ If these laws were repealed, land would be thrown out of cultivation to such an extent that the question would not alone be one for the landlords, but also for the farmers and even the labourers.”

He (Mr. Ball) could adduce many other passages in which Sir Robert Peel had as strongly and clearly avowed his intention to maintain and uphold a protective policy. On another occasion he said—

“ I do think that 8s. a quarter on corn coming from Poland will afford sufficient protection. Who pays church-rates? Who pays poor-rates? Who pays tithes? I say, not altogether, but chiefly, the landed proprietor; and if there be corn produced by land not pressed by these burdens, it would be clearly unjust to admit it on equal terms.”

That right hon. Gentleman had been his (Mr. Ball's) great preceptor in political science. He had believed him to be one of the most distinguished and upright men that ever lived; but when reparation was now asked for his memory, he (Mr. Ball) would also ask for reparation for the farmers. The very faith which he had reposed in that statesman had taken many thousands of pounds out of his pocket; and when they talked of raising trophies to his name, every child of his (Mr. Ball's) would know that his position in this world had been damaged and diminished by his father's faith in Sir Robert Peel. The hon. Member for Manchester had said that he had always maintained that we should have corn cheaper than it had been before the repeal of the corn laws. Now he (Mr. Ball) denied that assertion. It had been the argument of the hon. Member, which was also sustained by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Carlisle, that by taking away the protective laws of this country corn would not be made cheaper. And not only had that been the opinion of those hon. Members, but when Sir Robert Peel was asked in that House what would be the effect of the repeal of the corn laws, his answer was, “I do not enter into that subject, for I do not anticipate any diminution of price.” And when the hon. Member for the West Riding was traversing the country, he had said on one occasion, “the argument of cheap bread was never mine;” and upon another occasion, “when free trade prevails, bread will be no cheaper than it is now. If the corn laws could be abolished by a secret edict, the farmers would not discover the fact by any injurious effects produced upon their interests.” There was hardly anything which the free-traders had said that had not been falsified by the event; and scarcely a prediction that had turned out as they had anticipated. Mr. Cobden had asserted that if the unnatural corn laws were repealed, no Briton need any longer emigrate, and that emigration was created altogether by landlords and the corn laws. He had even said that those who were driven to emigrate were men condemned to transportation for the benefit of the landowners. Now, what was the result? Poverty had driven our poor by hundreds and thousands from Britain, and hundreds and hundreds of broken-hearted farmers had been condemned to a premature grave. More than that, hundreds and thousands of farmers were so hopelessly damaged and ruined by what had been done, that they could never be reinstated again. He had heard unmeasured abuse cast on the noble Earl at the head of the Government, and he had also heard some compliments passed on the right hon. Gentleman the leader in that House (the Chancellor of the Exchequer), which flattered his talents at the expense of his integrity. He (Mr. Ball) fancied that the right hon. Gentleman could not feel very much flattered by those compliments. Those compliments were not, he was satisfied, paid in sincerity, but because they believed that the best mode of fighting their battle was to create division on his (Mr. Ball's) side of the House. He (Mr. Ball) would now tell the House and his constituents what he intended to do. He never would be a party to approve of any Resolution which went to say that the happiness of the people and the prosperity of the country had been the result of free trade. He did not believe it. But he would say this, that after the country had showed itself determined to have free trade, when he saw what was the result, and what had been the response of the country, he was bound, as one of those who went there to make laws, to maintain and uphold the laws; and there was nothing more necessary for all parties to observe than that when the people of this country spoke through the majority in that House, the minority were bound in duty to submit:—and therefore he was compelled of necessity to say that he must submit. But he would not abandon the field if he were not to take with him the honours of war. He would not go out of the field if he were to be insulted as he was going; and therefore he would never accept the Resolution of the hon. Member for Wolverhampton. If the carrying of that Resolution should be destructive to Her Majesty's Ministry, he believed that that would be one of the most unhappy, one of the most fearful events that could befall us. This very week a gentleman who perhaps employed more hands than any man in London had said to him, "Mr. Ball, it is madness to stand out; you must give up protection principles; but I hope the consequences will not displace the Ministry; for though opposed to you in politics, I must confess that all the citizens, manufacturers, and shopkeepers of London would be distressed beyond measure at such a result, for they are the only body of gentlemen who are looked upon with any confidence." He maintained that that was true; and was he not bound, when about to give a vote which would determine the fate of the Ministry, to ask who should be their successors? Where was he to look for an answer? Was it from the hon. Member for Montrose, who, in a letter he had published, had referred to the jealousies and want of harmony which the Opposition exhibited, and who, if they were successful that night, would to-morrow diverge and separate? Notwithstanding all that had been said and written of Lord Derby, he would put it to the House, if in all classes of society everybody did not speak of that nobleman as of an upright, highminded, and honourable man? Then there was the testimony of Gentlemen opposite themselves as to the necessity of keeping the Chancellor of the Exchequer. Gentlemen opposite told them that he was the light of their party, the centre of their system, and the soul of their body. Well, then, if he were so extraordinarily clever as he was represented, what extraordinary fools they (the Ministerialists) must be to give him up. They said that Lord Derby and his Ministry had reacted the conduct of Sir Robert Peel when he threw over his party. The best proof that this was not so was, that when Sir Robert Peel sat down to ruin thousands who loved, cherished, venerated, and almost politically adored him, there were multitudes of his best friends who were obliged to violate all the kindlier feelings of human nature, and to separate themselves from him. But next look at Lord Derby. Was there one Gentleman amongst them (the Protectionists)—disappointed though they might be—grieved though they might be—lamenting as they did that they must abandon the view which they had so honestly, and as he believed so wisely, entertained—was there, he asked, one Gentleman among them who would cast one word of dishonour or reproach upon Lord Derby because he had been obliged to give up the contest? When the historian recorded the lives of the two men, he would say that the one statesman went down condemned and reprobated by those who had been his nearest and dearest friends; but that the other nobleman, amidst the disasters and trials, amidst the clouds and tempests that overcast his political horizon, had not one friend who abandoned him, and not one who charged him with their misfortune. They (the Protectionists) had been necessitated to surrender the principles which they had advocated—they acknowledged that they had been beaten; but he hoped that their opponents would remember that even the Indian who scalped his fallen foe did not lacerate his dead body, and that they would in their hour of triumph not forget the kindly and generous feelings which so universally distinguished the English character in such circumstances. And he said further, that if their real object was to obtain a settlement of this question, they would evince kindlier feelings and a better grace, and endeavour to win their opponents over by harmony and good fellowship, so as to have a united testimony given to their principles. Then they would better deserve their triumph by the magnanimity of their conduct; whereas, by trampling on those whom they had defeated, and by manifesting such bitterness of feeling, and pouring ridicule on those who had fought them valiantly and foot to foot, and would have beaten them if they had been able, they were only irritating the wound which they ought to seek to heal.

MR. PHILLIMORE said, that he should claim the indulgence of the House whilst in a very few words he stated the reasons why he should give his vote that night most decidedly in favour of the Resolution of the hon. Member for Wolverhampton. He regretted that in the speech which had just been delivered, the hon. Member for Cambridge should have been so hurried away by his feelings as to have spoken with such unnecessary disrespect of an eminent man whose memory was revered by many; and however he might differ from him as to some parts of conduct, it was scarcely generous at this moment to press with great severity on those points which might be open to exception. It might be said of him and his party, Sint inepti, sceleris vero crimine liceat multis aliis liceat Cneio Pompeio mortuo carere. The inconsistency, moreover, of the hon. Member was most extraordinary; for what was there exceptionable in the conduct of Sir Robert Peel which was not far surpassed by that of Lord Derby and the Chancellor of the Exchequer? With regard to the Motion of the noble Lord the Member for Tiverton, every suggestion coming from such an authority in that House, ought to be received with attention; yet he (Mr. Phillimore) could not but feel that his Motion frittered away the most material and important part of the Resolution of the hon. Member for Wolverhampton, and omitted the very expression upon which it was, in his opinion, the especial duty of the House to insist. If the recent commercial legislation had really increased the comforts of the industrious classes, if it had really strengthened their attachment to the Throne and the other institutions of the country, must it not necessarily follow that such a policy was wise and just? How could they grant the premises, and then refuse to admit the conclusion which inevitably followed from them? He could not but observe that throughout the Resolution of the noble Lord the words “free trade” did not occur so much as once; and he must say that he preferred the words “free trade” to those of “unrestricted competition,” on which it was possible that something they did not anticipate might be hereafter founded. It was said that they had nothing to do with the former opinions or conduct of the Government; but it was forgotten that the case of the Government had been rested upon the character of those who now occupied the Treasury benches; and, without entering into any invidious or malignant discussion, he thought it a most constitutional and legitimate course to inquire what had been the principles and professions of the present Government. No principle had been better recognised by the constitution, and it had received the sanction of the highest authorities. Now, it was beyond a doubt that the Members of the present Government had for years past pursued a course of most unremitting and declared hostility to the principles of free trade; and the noble Lord at their head had but very recently asserted that his predilections for the opposite policy were unchanged. Yet they

(the Free-trade Members) were told that they were malignant and offensive, because they hesitated to entrust the guardianship of a policy to those who all along had been its determined and most inveterate enemies. They all recollected the credit acquired by the Judge who discovered the mother of a child; but if the question had been as to its education, and it had been proved that the one claimant had cherished and supported it, while the other had repeatedly endeavoured to stifle it in its infancy, and had predicted that if ever it came to manhood it would be a scourge and pest to society, the wisdom of Solomon would not be requisite for the decision. He would not trespass any longer on the time of the House, but simply state that, as a Free-trade Parliament, he thought they ought to have an Administration irrevocably bound to adhere to and extend that great and important principle.

MR. BENTINCK apologised for rising at a time when the House was probably looking for much more able and eloquent arguments; but said, that having the honour of holding a seat in that House for the first time, and being the representative of one of the most important agricultural districts of England, he hoped that in the peculiar and somewhat anomalous state of public affairs, he should be allowed to make a few remarks. On a former occasion the hon. Member for Middlesex gave most affectionate advice to the Chancellor of the Exchequer, and recommended him, in language the most classical, and in phraseology, the most courteous, "to take his physic like a man." The hon. Gentleman proceeded to animadvert on the position of the Members on that side of the House who had hitherto held Protectionist opinions, and were favourable to the present Government; and the hon. Gentleman said, that either they (on the Ministerial side) must cease to support the Government, or give their support in a shameful silence; but he (Mr. Bentinck) did not believe in the existence of any such difficulty. Credat Judæus non ego. The hon. Member for Manchester had done him the honour of referring to a speech he had delivered on the hustings, at the same time appearing to doubt the accuracy of the report of it from which he quoted. Now, after that lapse of time, he (Mr. Bentinck) was not able to say whether what he was reported to have said was strictly accurate; but he begged to tell the hon. Gentleman that whatever he had spoken on the hustings, be it correctly or incorrectly reported, he was ready to maintain at all times and under all circumstances. With regard to the comparative merits of Free Trade and Protection, the hon. Gentleman who made this Motion (Mr. Villiers) evidently had not derived the information with which he favoured the House from the most reliable sources. The hon. Gentleman, he was sure, was under a great misapprehension as to the present condition of the agricultural interest. He was ready to admit that there might be cases where want of industry or want of capital had formerly prevented the land being properly cultivated, and where free trade had proved a stimulant; but the hon. Member had omitted to state that free trade had pressed hardly upon those farmers who had carried the application of capital, industry, and talent to the farthest possible extent in the cultivation of the soil; and that that class was still suffering from the present financial policy. The very short experience he had had of that House taught him that the most disagreeable thing to hon. Gentlemen opposite was anything that could possibly be construed or misconstrued into ambiguity of expression. Therefore he would endeavour to avoid anything of the kind by stating that he held, as he always had, to the merits of the principles of a protective policy. He would not enter into details with regard to the principle of protection; but this he would say, that he was prepared to rest the defence of that principle and of the views which he now held, not upon any feeble arguments of his own, but upon the arguments and speeches of the late Sir Robert Peel—upon the speeches of the noble Lord the Member for London—he was content to rest their defence upon the glowing and brilliant eloquence of the right hon. Baronet the Member for Carlisle. He remembered the time when these high authorities treated as little better than lunatics the men who could gravely talk of the total repeal of the corn laws. But he should ill discharge his duty to his constituents if he limited his view of the present question to one of mere financial policy—he regarded it in a much broader light. He looked at it in two points of view—first, as to the spirit in which, and the object for which, this Motion was brought forward; and next, as to the probable effect of this Motion on the fate of the Ministry, should it be carried by a majority. In the first place, he did not believe that it was brought forward in a fair and straightforward spirit—the object of it was not to defend a principle, but to upset an Administration. After the gracious Speech from the Throne, and the declaration of the noble Lord at the head of the Government in another place—after the clear and lucid statement made by the Chancellor of the Exchequer, did any man really pretend to say that the principle of free trade was in danger? And if no one would pretend that, what, then, was the object of this Motion? He could not recognise any patriotic motive for its introduction—he saw in it nothing but the eager aspiration of expectant placemen. This, he believed, was the opinion of reflecting men throughout the country. Supposing they were successful in this Motion, and that they displaced the present Ministry, who was there to take their places? His attention was naturally called to that party which formed the late Government; but he confessed that he could not look with confidence to that quarter. After the weakness and internal dissensions which had marked their previous tenure of office, and the amputation of their ablest Member, he saw no hope of the reconstruction of the late Cabinet. Well, he next turned to the party on the other side, at the head of which stood the hon. Members for the West Riding and for Manchester. The country had been told by the hon. Member for the West Riding that he and his friends were ready to sacrifice their own private feelings for the benefit of the public, and to take upon themselves the highest offices of State. He had no doubt that, if the hon. Member for Manchester were once fairly installed in office, he would be well inclined not only to put down the haughty aristocracy, but to put down with them other higher and more revered institutions in Church and State; but he much doubted whether the people of this country were prepared to go hand in hand with the hon. Gentleman in the rapid strides he was prepared to take. He saw before him also a very small but distinguished band of able statesmen and Members who aspired to hold the reins of office; but he could not help thinking that the friends and followers of Sir Robert Peel overrated the estimation in which they were held by the public: they had lost sight of the old and truthful adage, that those who love the sin do not necessarily love the sinner. He much doubted that were those hon. Gentlemen restored to office they would be able to perpetuate throughout the country that spirit of subordination, of obedience to the law, of peace, tranquillity, and order, for which there was so much necessity both in this country and Ireland. So long as he sat in that House he should give his warm support to the present Government, they having accepted office at a time when, if they had declined, the country would have been thrown into the utmost difficulties.

SIR WILLIAM PAGE WOOD said, the hon. Gentleman who had just sat down had stated, and stated most truly, that that which appeared at all times to create the greatest disgust and indignation at that—the Opposition—side of the House, was any ambiguity in the expression of sentiment by hon. Members. It was on account of his own strong disgust at such ambiguity that he felt it impossible to avoid saying a few words—and they should be but few—which should at least indicate that he had not sat there wholly unimpressed with the extraordinary scene which took place the other night when the Chancellor of the Exchequer was delivering his address—a scene that to him was the most surprising, since it exhibited the House sitting to listen, in a state, as it appeared to him, of the deepest humiliation at the gauge which the right hon. Gentleman had taken of their intellect, the appreciation he had made of their moral sentiments, when he could suppose that it would be tolerated in that House, in a society of Gentlemen, as the noble Lord the Member for Tiverton had properly reminded them—that he should venture to state, in the presence of so many who had been witnesses to the whole transactions of the last several years, that the line taken by the Protectionist party was one accepting free trade as an established fact, making no attempt to disturb or reverse that policy, and that that course had been pursued by them up to the time when the noble Earl at the head of Her Majesty's Government was called upon to accept office, in 1851, when, as he expressed it, that noble Earl found himself at the head of a large party who had made up their minds that that policy should not be reversed. He felt great respect for the hon. Member who had last spoken, and so distinctly disclaimed all ambiguity in the expression of his sentiments. Unfortunately he was not able very clearly to collect those sentiments; but he understood the hon. Member to advert, towards the close of his observations, to the state of parties in that House, and to characterise the proposition before them as one intended to produce the calamity of the secession of her Majesty's Ministers from office; and looking round the House to see what assistance could be afforded in that case to a desolate country, he referred to the small but distinguished party of the former supporters of Sir Robert Peel. Had it never occurred to the hon. Gentleman to ask himself the question, why those hon. Members had come to that—the Opposition—side of the House? Had it never occurred to the hon. Gentleman to ask himself the question, what it was that separated those hon. Members from the great party with which they were associated? They were separated from friends and supporters because they adhered to Sir Robert Peel in that policy in which the present leader of the Ministry stated it was now his determination to imitate him. There was another hon. Gentleman, the Member for Cambridgeshire (Mr. E. Ball), who had made a very manly and straightforward speech. It was a great comfort in these days to hear a straightforward speech; at the same time, he must confess he was a little puzzled with some portion of that speech also—for the hon. Gentleman told them of farmers annihilated by hundreds, of peasantry shipped off by cargoes, owing to the dreadful state of destitution in which this country was at present placed; and yet the hon. Gentleman told them, in the conclusion of his speech, that he had come to the resolution of supporting a Government which told them that they meant now to carry out heartily and honestly that very policy which had produced these disastrous results. He would not, at that late hour, enter into any examination of the hon. Gentleman's argument on the subject of protection; but, really, when they were considering how they could best express their almost universal concurrence in the principles of free trade, he thought he might leave the hon. Gentleman's whole argument on the subject of the working man and the destitution of the labourer to be answered in the next speech of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, because that right hon. Gentleman told them, in the Resolution he proposed, that the labourer's condition had been decidedly benefited by that policy. He would leave the right hon. Gentleman, then, to answer the invectives or complaints of his own zealous supporters; but he would observe to the hon. Member, if he did not presume too much in saying so, that he thought the hon. Member had not yet learned the precise line of duty which it would become one entertaining such decided opinions to follow. Surely it had not been by always bowing to majorities that great principles had made their way in this country. He (Sir W. P. Wood) belonged to a family, some members of which sat for twenty-eight years in that House. During most of that time they were in minorities; but they never bowed to a majority, and were at last successful in finding themselves in large majorities in favour of the principles which they had so steadfastly supported. If the hon. Member conceived, as he said, that the policy which his leader was now about to support was fraught with the mischiefs he described; if ruin and boggary had driven thousands of his fellow-subjects from these shores, and sent down others brokenhearted into the grave, it seemed to him that the hon. Member would be better doing his duty, as one of the farmers' friends, if he persevered in the policy he had conscientiously adopted, and were to continue to advocate and support it until he succeeded in its ultimate restoration. But what was the position they were placed in by the question before them? They had a Resolution proposed by the hon. Member for Wolverhampton, met, in the first instance, by an Amendment brought forward by the Chancellor of the Exchequer; and the conversation which took place in the early part of the evening finally eventuated in the right hon. Gentleman accepting the Resolution proposed by the noble Lord the Member for Tiverton. They had heard to-night the history of these Resolutions, and he was not sorry that the discussion of that evening had taken place. They had heard clearly and distinctly that, instead of that factious resolve which the right hon. Gentleman attributed to the supporters of the Resolution to encumber and clog in every possible way the movements of the Government, the greatest pains and caution had been taken to render the Resolution such a one as it would be reasonable and honourable for them to adopt. He could understand the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he told them that to move any Resolution at all indicated a want of confidence in Her Majesty's Government. The right hon. Gentleman certainly said—but in a very faltering and hesitating manner—that after the declaration made by the noble Lord in another place, and that which he had himself made in that House, and after the emphatic language of the Queen's Speech, it was impossible for anybody to mistake the policy of Ministers; but if so, there was no need of any Resolution at all, or, if any were proposed, the right hon. Gentleman should have treated it as one of want of confidence. But that course the right hon. Gentleman did not take; and when once he had adopted his Resolution, that ground was cut from under him, so that he was astonished that the right hon. Gentleman should attempt to treat this movement as a factious one. They had heard to-night that, by some means or other, they did not know exactly how, there was produced before the meeting in Downing-street a Resolution in certain words, and that after a determination being come to on the part of Her Majesty's Government to accept it—[“No, no!”]—the Chancellor of the Exchequer said distinctly, that after that determination had been come to—and he said that he should not mind its being known at Charing-cross—to accept the Resolution, three odious words had been added, pronouncing the free-trade policy of 1846 to have been wise, just, and beneficial. He could fairly understand that there might be an impression on the right hon. Gentleman's mind, if those words were added in consequence of the Government being willing to accede to the first proposition, that this was done with a factious purpose; but they had heard to-night that those words were proposed by the noble Lord the Member for the City of London, long before the Resolution had come to the knowledge of Her Majesty's Government. But the question for them to decide to-night was, would they adopt that Resolution or the Resolution of the noble Lord the Member for Tiverton? If they had no Motion before them but the Resolution moved by the noble Lord the Member for Tiverton, or rather the original Resolution of the right hon. Baronet the Member for Carlisle, with that very essential passage in it respecting free trade being beneficial to every large interest of the community, then they might well have adopted and voted for that Resolution. But the hon. Member for Wolverhampton having first propounded his Resolution, and having thought it better to propose a Resolution in the shape he adopted, and the House being obliged to choose between the two Resolutions before it, the necessary consequence was that every one who rejected the first Resolution must be taken as recording his opinion, that the measure of 1846 had not been wise, just, or beneficial. They had to choose between the two, and if they chose a Resolution omitting those words, he asked if any individual in the country would have the least doubt in his mind that a Parliament assembled now for the purpose of discussing and deciding this very question, had come to a Resolution by a majority, though it might be a small one, that the measure was neither wise, just, nor beneficial? If that were the case, by adopting the Resolution of the Government, and rejecting that moved by the hon. Member for Wolverhampton, they would only be performing a solemn farce. They were called upon to express the feeling which all professed to be unanimous in entertaining, that the free-trade policy of the last few years was sound—so right and proper that it ought to be adhered to—and not merely adhered to, for the Resolution of the noble Lord went a little further than adherence—it went on to extend it, and that was not an unimportant difference. The Chancellor of the Exchequer had now, under pressure, accepted a Resolution—and it was important to remark this point of difference in the new position of the Government—pledging them not only to adhere to that policy, but to extend it; they were called upon, therefore, to declare it proper to adhere to, and even extend, the policy on which was founded that measure which the Ministers refused to admit to have been either wise, just, or beneficial. He could not conceive any course by which the House would more stultify itself than this. The only argument he had heard against the Resolution of the hon. Member for Wolverhampton was, that it would be ungentlemanly to press it on the other side. He was not willing to incur censure for ungentlemanly conduct from any man; and least of all from the noble Lord the Member for Tiverton, whose urbanity and politeness were acknowledged, not only by every one in that House, but in his extensive communications throughout the whole world. He did not wish to have it supposed that he was taking an ungentlemanly course on the present occasion, but they could not stand bandying compliments on a serious discussion like that, when the House was met to consider a great public measure, and in some degree, owing to the line of conduct pursued by Her Majesty's Ministers, the character of public men also. He held it of the deepest importance that the Legislature of the country should maintain its high character, not only for ability, but for integrity, and that men high in office should hold an equally high place in the general estimation of the country. Because, when representative institutions were, as at present, in some peril throughout Europe, if that House failed for one moment to secure the respect of the country at large; if they failed to maintain their representative institutions at an elevated standard; if it was held for one moment that it was matter of indifference to them in what manner public men conducted themselves, great danger must ensue to political liberty. Was it indifferent whether they expressed themselves in clear unambiguous language, or had a policy, not only vacillating, but actually differing according as it was propounded by the different Members of the Government, who, instead of openly and frankly avowing that their convictions had undergone a change, attempted to colour and palliate that change by telling the House that no such thing as a Protectionist party had existed since 1846; that all those magnificent speeches they had heard from the other side of the House upon the subject of protected industry; that all those eulogies in the Morning Herald which saluted the right hon. Gentleman opposite in the morning, and all those paragraphs in the Standard which soothed his slumbers in the evening; that all the meetings at Drury-lane; that all the speeches made by the hon. Member for Cambridgeshire, Mr. Chowler, and others devoted to the cause, were all to go for nothing; and that the House were now to be told, "we have not changed our opinions in the least, we remain where we were, although we are about to pursue a policy opposite to every principle we ever advocated;"—he maintained that in such a state of things there was great danger to the character of public men, and to free institutions. What had, in fact, brought the Resolution before the House? It would not have been brought forward if there had been anything like a frank declaration from Her Majesty's Ministers at however late a period—even in the Speech from the Throne; but instead of that, even the statements in that document were all under the condition of an "if," the only admission being that mentioned by the Chancellor of the Exchequer, who had told the House that Her Majesty had admitted that Parliament, in its wisdom, had sanctioned the free-trade policy. Certainly, the bare admission that an Act of Parliament had been passed did not do much credit to its authors for frankness; but if there had been such a declaration open, manly, and conclusive, instead of the miserable "if" which characterised the Speech, the Motion of his hon. and learned Friend would not have been heard of, because it would have been unnecessary for the public advantage. The Government came into power, not as they had represented it, from the falling away of the previous Ministry, but in consequence of their own act. They had up to that time been a great and united party banded together on the one point of protection; and although they had not brought forward any Motion for the reversal of the free-trade policy, because their leader was too great a master of parliamentary tactics not to know that it would be inexpedient, yet all their energies were devoted with great success to obtain such a majority in the House as would render it difficult, if not impossible, for their opponents to continue any longer to carry on the Government. They had a more dexterous mode of attaining this end than by bringing forward motions for the repeal of the free-trade measures; they endeavoured to render every Member of the Government then in office an object of obloquy and of public censure. And they did this in a peculiar way; for if a Member of the Cabinet was in the House of Lords they attacked him in the House of Commons, and if he was a Member of that House they brought forward their Motions in the other House. Who would forget the attack on the noble Lord the Member for Tiverton, and the good policy by which it was commenced, where he had no opportunity to answer it? Who would forget the attacks on Lord Torrington, the Governor of Ceylon, or that on the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland in the House of Commons; or that, only a few days before they came into office, the party now in power had threatened an attack, in the House of Commons, upon the noble Earl who then presided over the Colonial Office. Those were their weapons, and they were welcome to them; although he (Sir W. P. Wood) would certainly not have liked to have used them. Was it, however, supposed that Earl Grey, the noble Lord the Member for Tiverton, or Lord Torrington, were the real objects of attack? No; the attacks were directed against the then Government: and their object was to force them from their position, and to place their opponents on the Treasury bench, that they might then carry out the promises which they had made to those who had so zealously supported them. But what did they do when they entered office? We had then for the first time in the annals of statesmanship in this country a noble Lord taking high office, who would not tell the country whether he had any principles at all; while the noble Lord the Member for Sussex (the Earl of March) a prominent supporter of theirs in this House, told us that the principles of his followers were confidence in Lord Derby. He (Sir W. P. Wood) had heard of men representing principles—he had heard of Foxites, who represented the great principles of Mr. Fox; of Pittites, who represented the policy of Mr. Pitt; and of Peelites, who supported the policy of Sir Robert Peel; but he never before heard of substituting a man for a principle. A man might be the symbol of a principle, but could not be substituted for it. That, however, was done in this case; for we had no principle, but we had Lord Derby in its stead. We were simply told that the country were to have confidence in Lord Derby, and that his supporters had given him their entire confidence. He (Sir W. P. Wood) did not, however, know what part of the noble Lord's history induced them to give him this entire confidence. Was it because he was in 1832 a member of a reforming Cabinet? He did not think it could be; for he remembered that his right hon. Friend the Member for the county of Oxford (Mr. Henley) had, in a speech delivered not long since, stated that one great object of the policy of the present Government was to resist anything like a creation of new Peers, and the noble Lord was understood to have given his assent to such a measure in 1832. Again, was it the noble Earl's policy, when he entered or when he left the Cabinet of Sir Robert Peel which had gained him the confidence of his supporters? If we were to have a Veiled Prophet, we should at least have some of his oracles; but we had never heard what the noble Earl's principles were. As far as could be gathered from his declarations, they were opposed to free trade. It was only a few weeks before or after he was invited to take office in 1851 that he declared that he had never abandoned the principle of protection—that if such a notion had gone abroad it was erroneous, and that he only waited for the moment to say “Up, Guards, and at them!” Again, when he entered office in 1852, he said that although he was not prepared to carry out his principles to the utmost, he still held them, but that he would appeal to the country and see what it said to them. He did not say that he would reverse the policy of free trade, but that he would wait and learn from the decision of the country what his own policy was to be. He (Sir W. P. Wood) never witnessed conduct more humiliating than this for a man who had undertaken to govern a great country; it amounted to a declaration, “I have no policy of my own—I have no foresight—I do not know what to decide upon; but I am content to take the reins of Government, and to accept a policy from the constituency of England as soon as they will be kind enough to inform me of their wishes.” The noble Earl had been very stout in his speeches against the democratic principle. He did not complain, nor ever should, of the noble Earl's confidence in the sentiments of the country; but he did say that it was the worst of all democratic principles not to make a distinction between the Legislature and the Executive, and not to have an Executive that should have the manliness, courage, foresight, and vigour to devise a line of policy and the determination to carry it out; or that, if the Legislature were against them, would say—not, “I make my bow to the constituency,” but—“I make my bow to office.” He was shocked and ashamed when he heard of these things first. He had hoped, however, that after the time for reflection and thought which the recess had afforded, the noble Earl would have advised Her Majesty to make an explicit statement in Her gracious Speech. We had not, however, had the slightest avowal of any principle, but a continued misleading of the public mind by one Minister saying one thing, and another the reverse. Encouragement was given in all quarters, the result of which must be that all would be equally misled and disappointed when the result came to be known. The noble Earl's declaration about “Up, Guards, and at them!” was made to correct the impression produced by an unfortunate speech at Aylesbury, which had alarmed the protectionists; then we had last Session a statement of the advantages of the free-trade policy from the Chancellor of the Exchequer, which highly delighted every one on the Opposition side of the House, and was thoroughly understood; but then, a few days afterwards, the noble Earl made a speech at the Mansion-house in favour of a policy of compromise. In this way, at the elections, while speeches were made on the one hand about the readiness to bow to the decision of the country, on the other an officer of the Government, when canvassing the county of Suffolk, told the electors that the time was coming for the restoration of protection. The hon. Member for Dorsetshire (Mr. Seymer) told them the other night that there was something peculiar in the atmosphere of the House of Commons, for while there everybody professed to be in doubt, nobody in Dorsetshire had any doubt as to the policy that was to be established; but, on the other hand, they had read a protectionist speech made by the other Member for Dorsetshire (Mr. Bankes), who was connected with the Government, and he would defy any one to say that in his part of the county, at all events, the farmers of Dorsetshire could have been free from doubts. He (Sir W. P. Wood) could assure the House that the farmers of Suffolk, at all events, were not clear upon this subject; they had little doubt that they were to have protection restored, either directly or by what was called compensation. Now, that last word showed the vast importance of carrying the Resolution in the form in which it was proposed. If the House declared that a measure was wise, just, and beneficial, they could resist a claim for compensation for an act which was just and beneficial. Compensation was not, as stated by the noble Lord the Member for Tiverton, a separate question, but was one involved in the very question of free trade, and in the grounds on which alone it had proceeded. If free trade were right, it was because it was founded on just principles. It was essential to the support of free trade that the question of compensation should not be admitted, for free trade had always been advocated on the ground that it would benefit every class of the community; that it would, in fact, even benefit the farmer himself, for by teaching him not to lean on those factitious supports on which he had before depended, but to trust to his own energies, it would make him able to meet any rivals who might endeavour to supplant him. If that was so, was it right or not that this principle should be asserted? The House was compelled to do so after the backwards-and-forwards statements of Her Majesty's Ministers, which rendered it utterly impossible to know what policy they would finally adopt. It was marvellous that when the Chancellor of the Exchequer talked of the "audacity" of the noble Lord the Member for the City of London, in doubting the intentions of Ministers, he did not see that it was impossible to gather from the speeches of the various Members of the Government any precise conclusion as to the view which they took on the question of free trade, and whether they thought the farmers were entitled to compensation. He (Sir W. P. Wood) said, let the House of Commons, at least, speak with a clear and definite voice. It was not becoming in that House now to speak with a faltering voice. They were the representatives of a straightforward truth-loving people. If, therefore, they hesitated to say the measure was "wise and just," and if the Government succeeded in carrying a Resolution which really meant none of those things, they would be again tampering with the people, with whom they had tampered sufficiently long already. Surely, the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the University of Oxford—who seemed inclined to favour the principle of compensation—could not now, if it were only on the ground so feelingly put forward by the noble Lord the Member for North Leicestershire, of paying a just tribute to the memory of the late Sir Robert Peel, hesitate to acknowledge that the measure was "wise, just, and beneficial." If the measure did not deserve that character, then was Sir Robert Peel open to all the odium to which he had been exposed—not, indeed, of being the arch-enemy of the human race, but—for having been the cause of public disaster, by using his great power to carry into effect a measure which was unjust. He would ask whether any man respected Sir Robert Peel the less—if, indeed, he did not respect him the more—for his frank avowal of the change his opinions had undergone on the question of the corn laws? He (Sir W. P. Wood) felt the Government had made a fatal mistake to palliate, and almost deny the change in their principles. But with respect to the House generally, he trusted they would now speak out in a manly honourable, and straightforward manner, as became the representatives of the English people, and so pronounce that to be "wise, just, and beneficial," which was now acknowledged on all hands to deserve all the three appellations.

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON: Sir, if the House will indulge me for but a very few moments, I can assure them that, at this late hour, I will not trespass upon them longer. I should not have asked their indulgence, even for that short space, had it not been for some of the expressions which have fallen from the hon. and learned Gentleman who has just sat down. Indeed I had no desire to address the House at all. I did not feel that I had much to say, and for this very simple reason—that it appears to me there is no question before the House. After what took place in the early part of the evening—after what was submitted by the noble Viscount the Member for Tiverton on Tuesday night—after the manner in which my Friends on this side of the House met that overture—after the explanations given by the noble Lord (Lord John Russell), and the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Carlisle (Sir James Graham), I certainly cannot approach this question, or discuss it, in that language and in that spirit which I should have done had I addressed the House on Tuesday evening, and before those explanations were given, and that understanding was come to. Sir, after that understanding I think this debate ought not to have proceeded. I am sorry, deeply sorry, that the hon. Member for Wolverhampton has felt it his duty to force on this discussion. I am the more sorry for it, because I have felt from the first, and I feel it now as strongly as ever, that this discussion as it stands is not creditable to the House of Commons. Sir, I am sorry that the new Parliament should commence with its first debate being addressed, not to any question of principle—not to any question of politics—not to any great measures submitted to us—these are the subjects to which Parliament generally devotes its attention in great discussions; but in the present instance the question before us concerns Resolutions which have been admitted by almost all the Members who have yet spoken to be in spirit, intention, and object, precisely the same; and I know of no good purpose to be accomplished by your discussing whether you shall on that side of the House cast more or less of vituperation and abuse upon Gentlemen on this side of the House. You profess to desire the settlement of a great principle—a principle interesting, I grant, to every man in this great community, and a principle which, I fully admit, after the circumstances of the late election, ought to be entertained and ought to be decided. But, instead of doing that, you are questioning whether you shall accompany the settlement of that principle by the insertion of words that are painful and unacceptable to this side of the House. Now, I think in the words used to-night by my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer, that, even for the promotion of your own object, you could not have taken a more unwise course. You wanted the settlement of a great question, and we have met you frankly. We have no concealment. [“Hear, hear!”] I am speaking the earnest, the sincere sentiments of my heart. We acknowledge that the verdict of the country is against the principles that we have hitherto supported; and if you wanted nothing but a fair settlement of those principles, you should have taken the line indicated by the noble Lord the Member for Tiverton, and been contented with that assertion of those principles which he proposed. The noble Lord said, and said wisely and with truth, that all the country cares for, and all the country has a right to care for, is what is to be the future commercial policy of the Government, no matter in what hands that Government may be placed. That is, for the moment, a subordinate question; but if you want to raise that question, let me beg of you to do it openly. You do not profess to raise that question now. If you did, we would meet you fairly. But you say your great object is the settlement of the question, upon what principles the future commercial policy of the country is to be carried on, whatever the hands which hold the reins of Government. You ought, therefore, to have been content with the admissions and advances which have been made on this side of the House. What said my right hon. Friend the Member for Oxford University (Mr. Gladstone), on the very night of the Address in reply to the Queen’s Speech? If I remember aright—but I speak entirely from memory—he said, “I do not ask you for your opinions—I do not ask you for an internal conversion. All I ask you for is that which the country has a right to demand—on what policy do you intend to proceed hereafter?” Upon that subject, then, we have fairly met you; and therefore I say there is no question now at issue, unless it be whether you shall be permitted to force upon men on this side of the House, as honourable and as sincere as yourselves, a Resolution humiliating and offensive to them. As far as my own opinion goes, I cannot accept the terms of the hon. and learned Gentleman’s Resolution, which I am sorry to say appear to have been studiously introduced so as to be offensive to us; and let me tell you that, although I am willing to join in the opinion entertained unanimously by my Colleagues in the Government, that we must bow to the decision of the country—and we do so cheerfully—yet I, for one, cannot concur in the words contained in the Resolution of the hon. Member for Wolverhampton, and I cannot admit that the measure of 1846, when it was first passed, was either just or wise. It is very easy to argue from results, and to cast censure and odium upon men who find themselves in the position of being obliged to confess that, in some respects, they have been mistaken; but I think you will admit that, upon these great questions of commercial policy, there is nothing more difficult than to foretell with anything like accuracy what their effects will be. It was remarked to-night with great truth, that there was hardly a single prophecy indulged in on this great subject on either side of the House which has not been found to be mistaken. I remember that we, on this side of the House, prophesied that, if free trade in corn were carried into a law, the importations would have to be paid for in gold, and that the Bank would be drained. But who can deny that since that period there has been more gold in the Bank than was ever known before? I do not shrink from making that avowal. On the other hand, I remember the hon. Member for the West Riding (Mr. Cobden) prophesying what would be the price of corn, and what the effects on price of a repeal of the corn law would be—and has proved to be equally at fault. Another prophecy he indulged in was, “Don’t be afraid of a repeal of the corn laws; the very freightage will act, pro tanto, as a duty on foreign corn.” To what extent these prophecies, too, have been verified, we are all well aware—the ships that have brought corn to this country have gone back in ballast. For myself, I may say that in 1846, and from that period to the present day, I have always been of opinion that it would have been a wise settlement of the question to have adopted a moderate fixed duty for the purpose of revenue as well as protection; and I was one of a very few Members in this House, who, in 1846, wished even then to bring about such an arrangement as that. But it could not be done. When, therefore, you say that the measure of total repeal was a just and wise measure, I beg you to recollect that the noble Lord opposite (Lord John Russell) introduced in the Speech from the Throne several years after that measure passed, an admission of the great distress under which the farmers laboured—at all events, their distress was recognised on the occasion to which I allude. Then, again, with regard to another question of free trade, I mean the sugar duties—into which, however, I cannot enter at this late hour—nobody can dispute the enormous amount of distress that that measure has produced in our Colonies—and surely nobody can deny, with regard to the agricultural interest, that the repeal of the corn laws has been the cause of great distress. Why, within my own limited circle, I myself know of the most painful cases of men who have held up their heads for generations as respectable farmers, and who are now reduced to the position of day labourers. We treated the question, I remember, very much as a labour question; but we also treated it as a question which affected the general interests of agriculture. As a labour question, I have not the slightest hesitation in admitting that we were mistaken. I have no hesitation in admitting that the prices of provisions have fallen in a much greater ratio than wages have fallen; and that although in some agricultural districts the labourers are not so well off as in others, yet, speaking generally, the condition of the labourer is far better than it had been previously to the repeal of the corn laws. That is, undoubtedly, a most important branch of the subject, and one to which Government cannot and ought not to shut its eyes. That, as a Government, we are bound honestly to admit. But upon this very ground I must pause before I also concede that it is “just” to benefit the working classes at the expense of the interests of another class of the community. With these views, then, I think that to compel Gentlemen on this side of the House to adopt expressions at variance with their views, inconsistent with their principles, opposed to their past conduct, and grating to their feelings, is taking an unwise course, and, above all, unwise on the ground that you must recollect that even Gentlemen on the other side of the House do not all stand in the position of the hon. and learned Member for Wolverhampton. That hon. and learned Gentleman has been for years the able and consistent advocate of free trade; but the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the University of Oxford (Mr. Gladstone) said the other night, with great candour, and I honoured him for the expression, that he was in no condition to throw stones at other men for their change of opinion on this question. And what, let me ask, is the position of the right hon. Baronet opposite (Sir James Graham) on this question? And what is the position of the noble Lord the Member for London? I have been long enough in Parliament—and it does not require a man to have been very long there—to remember the day—it was indeed only as it were the other day—that I followed the right hon. Baronet (Sir James Graham), and the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Gladstone), and other statesmen with whom I was then acting, into the lobby time after time in defence of protection. And what is the position of the noble Lord (Lord John Russell)? I am sure that the noble Lord will admit that his conversion is of very recent date. It was only in 1841 when those great struggles were taking place between my late right hon. Friend Sir Robert Peel and the noble Lord, that the noble Lord and the Liberal side of the House were advocating a fixed duty of 8s. Under these circumstances, looking at the position of the whole House and the recent date of the conversions of the most eminent statesmen in it—the recent date even of the conversion of my late right hon. Friend Sir Robert Peel, I think that all men must feel that this is not the moment for one small handful of Gentlemen, whom, however, I respect for their consistency and undoubted sincerity upon this question, to throw odium upon other men, because they have retained their principles for a rather longer period. We shall have occasion before long to discuss other questions connected with the great principles of our commercial policy; and I, for one, will never shrink from avowing—no taunts from the other side of the House will deter me for one day or one hour from confessing, frankly to the House any change which may have taken place in my views. And here, in connexion with the question of change of views—there have been allusions this evening by different Gentlemen, and among others by my noble Friend the Member for North Leicestershire (the Marquess of Granby), to the late Sir Robert Peel. My noble Friend spoke in a frank and an honourable spirit on that subject. The Members of Government have been pointedly alluded to on that subject since; and therefore I cannot and will not shrink from saying that no single word of disrespect to Sir Robert Peel ever has escaped or ever will escape my lips. It was my misfortune in 1846 that I could not concur with Sir Robert Peel; and in opposing him on that occasion I made a great sacrifice of both party feeling and personal feeling. I opposed the right hon. Gentleman then; and, with whatever degree of diffidence I did so, I never shrank from voting against him when my conscience would not allow me to vote with him. But I agree with my noble Friend that a purer patriot never lived. I always received kindness and friendship from that right hon. Gentleman, and I shall always entertain feelings of kindness and friendship for his memory. The hon. and learned Gentleman opposite, the Member for Oxford (Sir W. P. Wood), used one expression to which I must advert. He spoke of the disgust with which he had heard the ambiguous language used on this side of the House, and of the manner in which it had been contended, that from 1846 till now, we had never advocated a return to the principle of protection. What we have said is this: that from that day to this we have never proposed protection to this House in connexion with land. We did not come into office last year on the question of protection. On the contrary, my noble Friend Lord Derby, in 1851, and again in 1852, when he took office, uniformly and consistently declared that the settlement of this great question must be referred to the determination of the people at a general election. There is no man more free than I am with regard to the use of such language as has been imputed to us; for I challenge any hon. Gentleman opposite—let him search Hansard as he pleases—to find that I have ever said anything inconsistent with what I now state. [An Hon. MEMBER on the Opposition side: Sugar.] I know not who it is that interrupts me; but if any hon. Member thinks I have any intention of shrinking from anything I have said, or of prevaricating in regard to any statements I have made on the subject of the sugar duties, he will find, when the proper time comes for the discussion of the question, that he is very much mistaken. I was speaking, however, upon the question of the corn laws, which we are now debating, and I say that from 1846 to the present time the language I have held, both in the country and in this House, has been uniformly the same—that, after such a great change of policy as then took place, it would be absolutely impossible for us to retrace our steps, unless in deference to the general voice of the country. That is the opinion I have always entertained, and which I still entertain. The hon. and learned Gentleman has alluded to my noble Friend Lord Derby in terms which I was very sorry to hear him employ. I think the expression of the hon. and learned Gentleman was, that it had been reserved for my noble Friend now at the head of Her Majesty's Government to be the first Minister who acceded to power in this country, avowing that he did so without principle. I really don't wish to say anything disrespectful of the hon. and learned Gentleman, for whom generally I entertain the utmost respect, but I can only treat such a declaration as an absurdity in itself. I deeply regretted to hear him use such language. I do not believe that any statesman ever more distinctly enunciated principles— [Derisive cheers and laughter from the Opposition, and loud cheers from the Ministerial benches.] I do not think any statesman ever enunciated principles more distinct or better defined, more worthy of his high and noble character, than my noble Friend Lord Derby did when he took the reins of office. The hon. and learned Gentleman has asked a question which I think we might rather have asked him—why has this Resolution been brought forward? I admit that is a matter I cannot understand, except upon the painful principle to which I have before adverted. The noble Member for the City of London has this evening again dwelt upon what he calls the ambiguity of the language in the Queen's Speech. I most distinctly say that I cannot concur in his opinion. I fully admit that this House had a right, after the circumstances of the last election, to know what are the intentions of the Government with regard to the great question of free-trade; and I contend that the announcement of those intentions was conveyed in the Royal Speech with as much distinctness as was consistent with the language which Ministers are in the habit of advising the Sovereign to use. I know not what language you could have more distinct, or what expression could be more intelligible, than the expression of "unrestricted competition," which was the phrase used in the Speech delivered from the Throne. The noble Lord then spoke of the Resolution moved by my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer, as a supplement to the Queen's

Speech. No, Sir, it was no supplement to the Queen's Speech; but it was a step which I think we were bound to take after the language which had been held by hon. Gentlemen opposite with regard to Her Majesty's Speech. They have complained of ambiguity; but, I must say, I am rather disposed to think they have only arrived at a foregone conclusion, and that they wished to consider the language of the Speech ambiguous. As the announcement in the Queen's Speech was not held to be sufficiently distinct, hon. Gentlemen opposite moved a Resolution declaratory of their principles; and we felt it to be our duty to move a Resolution showing that we do not desire to shrink from a plain announcement of our intentions. I must say, however, that I think there is another answer to the question why the Resolution of the hon. and learned Gentleman opposite was proposed. I cannot help thinking that it is very much the same Resolution with which we were threatened in April last. It was not considered politic then to bring that Resolution forward; and I cannot help suspecting that it has been brought forward now in the hope that four distinct parties on the opposite side might be combined in one vote, it being very difficult, perhaps, to find any other subject on which they could be combined. It seems, further, to have been thought desirable to effect this combination before Her Majesty's Government had had the opportunity of bring their measures before Parliament. By the good spirit which has been shown, however, and by the readiness with which hon. Gentlemen opposite have subscribed to the arrangement that has been suggested, whatever schemes might have been entertained have signally failed; and I believe and hope that the country—who look not to these petty personal matters, but to the great and important question of what is to be the future policy of the Government—will have the satisfaction of seeing that future policy affirmed by an overwhelming majority, and by a Resolution free from the objectionable language and the objectionable purposes which, in my judgment, lurk in the Resolution which has been moved by the hon. and learned Member for Wolverhampton. Sincerely apologising to the House for having detained them so long, I will only express my earnest hope that the majority upon this occasion may be an overwhelming one, and that the House will not be disposed to join in a form of vote which, in my mind, is unworthy of those who are parties to it, and derogatory to the character of this House.

Friday, November 26, 1852.

MINUTES.] Took the Oaths.—The Lord Carleton.

THE AMERICAN FISHERIES.

LORD WHARNCLIFFE said, that he rose to put a question to the noble Earl the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs on a matter of great importance to a great number of Her Majesty's subjects in a distant part of Her dominions, and also to the inhabitants of a great State in friendly relations with us. The matter to which he referred was the Fisheries on the coast of our North American colonies. Their Lordships would probably have it in their recollection that in the month of July last intelligence reached this country that the people of the United States, and more especially a certain portion of them in the Eastern States, had been greatly excited by the publication of a letter from Mr. Webster, the then Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs to the American Government, announcing that new instructions had been sent by the British Government to its officers in the Colonies to enforce the regulations of the treaty between the two countries as to the fisheries on the coasts of our North American Colonies, and informing them that this Government intended to put a new construction on that treaty, and warning such of the population of the United States as were interested in those fisheries, to beware of the penalties following on any infraction of the treaty, and promising to take the whole subject into the consideration of the United States Government. In answer to that letter, nothing, that he knew of, had yet appeared giving a satisfactory explanation of the state of the case, or of the motives which had induced the American Secretary of State to write and publish such a letter. There was published in the American papers shortly afterwards a paper purporting to have been received by our Minister at Washington, Mr. Crampton, and stating that there had never been any intention on the part of the British Government to put a new construction on the treaty. That was the only document, he believed, which had appeared since the publication of Mr. Webster's letter at all calculated to throw any light upon the subject. Now he believed that that letter truly represented the real state of the case; and if that were so, it was difficult to comprehend how it happened that the Foreign Secretary of the United States should be so misled as to suppose that such an intention as that which he announced existed on the part of the British Government. He knew but of two suppositions which could by possibility explain the circumstance. The first was, that some communication to the Government of the United States was couched in such terms as conveyed that impression to them; and the other was, that no communication whatever had been made by this Government to that of the United States—no intimation on the subject, such as was required by the ordinary rules of courtesy observed in diplomatic transactions, and that the United States were left to put their own construction on the acts of the British Government. Which of these two suppositions was right he knew not; but it was not unfair to suppose that the noble Earl opposite, the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, would be not only ready, but even anxious, to give an explanation on this subject which would be satisfactory not only to their Lordships and the country, and our Colonies, but also to the American fishermen, who were also deeply interested in the issue of this question. There was another matter connected with this question, which, in his opinion, entitled him to ask it. Rumours were current, and especially in the United States and in the Canadas, that in connexion with this subject of the fisheries, it was proposed to make fresh arrangements, by negotiations now pending, to improve the commercial relations between our North American Colonies and the United States. Having no documents before him, he could only speak of these statements as rumour, but he knew that they formed part of the current opinion on both sides of the Canadian border. That was, in his opinion, an additional reason for asking the noble Earl opposite to communicate to the House and to the country the present condition of these transactions. The question which he now wished to ask was information as to this point—whether the correspondence and negotiations between the two Governments, which had been going on for some time past, on the subject of the fisheries on the coast of our North American Colonies, were now brought to a conclusion; and, if so, whether he would consent to lay the papers connected with them at once on the table; or, if not at present, whether he would have any objection to lay them upon the table upon a Motion made to that effect?

The EARL of MALMESBURY said, that the noble Earl who had just sat down had in no way exaggerated the importance of the question to which he had been referring—a question which during the last five months had occupied the attention of Her Majesty's Government as much as it deserved. The noble Baron had referred to the letter of the late Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs in the United States, Mr. Webster, complaining of the conduct of Her Majesty's Government, when that Government issued orders for the employment of a new description of vessels, and also of a greater number of vessels, in protecting our North American fisheries. The noble Baron had attempted to account for the publication of that letter. He supposed that it might perhaps have been published because the orders of the British Government to its colonial officers were couched in such terms as were not pleasing to the United States, or from another reason—namely, in consequence of Mr. Webster having supposed that Her Majesty's Government intended to put a new construction on the treaty of 1818. Now he said, on behalf of Her Majesty's Government, that it had written to its own officers in Canada and elsewhere, and also to the officers of the United States, and that it had not used any language to any of them which it was not fitting to employ on such occasions. He would add, also, that Her Majesty's Government had placed no new construction on the treaty—that it had asserted no new claim whatever for itself on the American Government—that it had made no addition to the material force already on the station—that it was more a police regulation than anything else. A new and more useful sort of vessel was employed, and in greater numbers than before—the number of cannon was even diminished—and nothing had been done calculated to excite the jealousy of the American Government. He (the Earl of Malmesbury) knew nothing of the source of the discontent prevalent in the United States to which the noble Baron had referred; but the noble Lord who had just sat down, and who had been for some time a resident in the United States, and who knew the influence which periodical events exercised in those localities, might perhaps be able to account for the appearance at that time of a correspondence which at another period might never have seen the light. He asserted that Her Majesty's Government were not to blame for anything which had occurred either on this or on the other side of the Atlantic. With respect to the notice to be given to the Government of the United States, he had only to assure the House that notice was given to it as soon as the change of our naval arrangements was made; not that he believed that it was necessary for us to give any notice at all, save on account of the usual diplomatic courtesy. If any person thought that, on the part of Her Majesty's Government, he should have given that notice earlier, or that our new arrangements should have been postponed until the American Government had had a longer notice of them, that was no compliment to the American Government, as it presupposed that it was privy to the acts of aggression on our shores, which some American subjects had been long in the habit of perpetrating. As to the present state of the negotiations of which these events had been recently the cause between the two countries, he was obliged to tell their Lordships that they were in such a state that he must, though with regret, refuse to lay the papers regarding them on the table. He might even say that the negotiations were only just begun. Before the lamented death of Mr. Webster, he had entertained the proposal of Her Majesty's Government, and had agreed to negotiate on a large and wide basis, including not only all the disputed points regarding the fisheries on the coasts of our North American Colonies, but also the trade between the United States on the one hand, and Canada and our other Colonies on the other. He gladly admitted that from the moment of commencing the negotiations, Mr. Webster had acted in a true principle of conciliation, and that he had expressed to our Minister, Mr. Crampton, that it was his most anxious desire that the trade between the two countries should be carried on upon a greater principle of freedom, and that all possible causes of dispute should be removed between two such great nations. On all accounts Her Majesty's Government regretted the death of that great statesman; but more especially on account of the particular period at which it occurred, for it had interrupted the negotiations which were commenced; and at that moment he had no official information of any successor having been appointed to his (Mr. Webster's) office. He was happy to inform their Lordships that Her Majesty's Government had received the same assurances of goodwill from the President, Mr. Fillmore, and the same expression of his anxious desire that the question should be settled, not on a narrow footing, but on a broad field. They had been met in the same spirit by Commodore Perry, who had been sent by his Government to watch over the property and to promote the interests of the American fishermen, who were exercising their rights, not near our coasts, but around our shores. In fact, from the American Government, with the exception of the first letter, which was written by Mr. Webster in a moment of excitement, when he was suffering from the illness which terminated in his death, they had had nothing but friendly assurances. There had not been a single word said by any official personage in the United States which did not give Her Majesty's Government sanguine hopes that these negotiations would be brought to a satisfactory conclusion, and that every cause of dispute between the two countries would be amicably settled. When that period arrived, it would afford the greatest satisfaction to him to lay on the table of the House the papers which the noble Baron had asked for.

House adjourned to Monday next.

Friday, November 26, 1852.

MINUTES.] NEW WRITS.—For Abingdon, v. Major General James Caulfield, deceased; for Bury St. Edmund's, v. Sir John Stuart, Vice-Chancellor; for Durham City, v. Thomas Colpitts Granger, esq., deceased; for Oldham, v. John Duncuft, esq., deceased; for Peterborough, v. Hon. Richard Watson, deceased.

DUTIES ON HOME-MADE SPIRITS IN BOND.

MR. ROCHE said, he wished to put a question to the right hon. Chancellor of the Exchequer in reference to the remission of duties upon home-made spirits in bond. It would be in the recollection of the House that, in the Session of 1850, the Scotch and Irish Members, with the aid of some English Members, succeeded in carrying a Resolution to the effect that Irish and Scotch distillers were treated unjustly by the existing law with reference to duties upon spirits in bond. The right hon. Chancellor of the Exchequer, the Secretary to the Treasury, the hon. Member for Liverpool (Mr. F. Mackenzie), and the Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, supported that Resolution. Acting upon that Resolution, the Irish and Scotch Members submitted a Bill to the House, on the back of which Bill were the names of Lord Naas and Mr. G. A. Hamilton; but unfortunately the Bill was lost. He should certainly be glad to know whether it was the intention of the Government to afford any relief to those suffering interests for which they had, when in Opposition, so frequently expressed their sympathy.

The CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, he was sure that the House would admit that it was scarcely fair that he should be pressed to make a communication with respect to the remission of duties, or the intentions of the Government in that behalf, on the eve of the financial statement. The hon. Member would soon have an ample opportunity for explaining his own views, and learning those of the Government, on the subject to which he referred.

COMMERCIAL LEGISLATION—FREE TRADE—EXPLANATION.

MR. J. L. RICARDO said, he rose to ask a question of some importance to the House. There was a Resolution, moved by the noble Lord the Member for Tiverton (Viscount Palmerston) as an Amendment to the proposition of the hon. Member for Wolverhampton (Mr. C. Villiers). Now he perceived that that Resolution was differently worded in the Votes issued that morning to what it was on the previous evening. Those very important words which they were told the right hon. Baronet the Member for Carlisle (Sir J. Graham) had inserted, were left out of the Votes of that morning. He wanted to know whether the Resolution as it stood upon the paper, was the Resolution which the Government had adopted in abandoning the Amendment of which they had given notice?

The CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: On the paper which I hold in my hand the words alluded to are not omitted, and that is the Resolution now before the House.

MR. J. L. RICARDO was understood to say that the words he had alluded to were omitted in the Resolution which appeared in the paper that was issued that morning. It seemed, however, that in the paper issued since, the Resolution had been given correctly.

The CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: Well, the Resolution before the House, and which the Government had determined to abide by, was that which had been proposed by the noble Lord the Member for Tiverton.

MR. J. L. RICARDO said, it was important to know whether the Government intended to adopt the Resolution of the noble Lord in lieu of the Amendment which they had themselves proposed.

The CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: I never said that I adopted any Resolution. What I said was, that in deference to the feeling of the House I would withdraw my Amendment on the Motion of the hon. Member for Wolverhampton, and, therefore, the Amendment of the noble Lord the Member for Tiverton was the only Amendment which was lying upon the table of the House.

RELATIONS WITH ROME.

MR. HINDLEY said, he begged to ask the hon. Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, whether the interview which Sir Henry Bulwer, our Envoy at the Court of Tuscany, had with the Pope, some time ago, took place in pursuance of instructions from the Government; and whether there would be any objection to lay any communications which might have passed upon the subject between Sir Henry Bulwer and the Foreign Office upon the table of the House?

LORD STANLEY said, he was perfectly ready to reply to the question of the hon. Gentleman, and he should do so with the most entire unreserve. The hon. Member's question, as he (Lord Stanley) understood its general purport, was, that he wished to know what was the cause of, and what were the circumstances attending, Sir Henry Bulwer's visit to Rome? The cause of Sir Henry Bulwer's visit to Rome was this: At the time when he went there, Edward Murray, a British subject—concerning whom there was another question on the paper—was lying under sentence of death. There was no fault whatever to be found with the manner in which the British Consul at Rome, Mr. Freeborn, had conducted the negotiations respecting Edward Murray, and his consular duties generally; but considering the interest the case had excited, both in England and in Italy, it was thought desirable that there should be present on the spot an official of higher rank than a Consul. That was the object of Sir Henry Bulwer's visit to Rome; and, being in Rome, Sir Henry Bulwer did certainly avail himself of that opportunity to hold several interviews with members of the Papal Government on subjects interesting to both countries; but Sir Henry Bulwer went to Rome charged with no instructions, invested with no powers, and not in any manner accredited to the Papal Government. Whatever interviews might have passed between him and members of the Papal Government were entirely of a private and unofficial character. Under those circumstances, he (Lord Stanley) did not think it would be advisable to lay on the table of the House any communications relative to those interviews. As the subject had been brought under the notice of the House, he might take that opportunity of remarking that certain alleged reports as to the conversations to which he had referred, which had appeared in the columns of the daily press, were totally and absolutely incorrect.

CASE OF EDWARD MURRAY.

LORD DUDLEY STUART said, he would now ask the hon. Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs to state to the House the result of the steps taken by the Government on behalf of Edward Murray, at Rome; and whether the correspondence on the subject was now in such a condition that he could lay it before the House?

LORD STANLEY said, the result of the steps taken by the Government on behalf of Edward Murray was, that his life had been saved—that the capital sentence pronounced against him had been commuted to a sentence of perpetual imprisonment—and he had been removed to a more healthy and convenient place of confinement. Sir Henry Bulwer had been instructed to press for a further mitigation of that commuted sentence. That was the case, and the Government was not without hopes that some mitigation of the sentence might be obtained; but it might be injurious to the prospect of success if the correspondence were at present to be laid before the House.

COMMERCIAL LEGISLATION—FREE TRADE—ADJOURNED DEBATE.

Order read, for resuming adjourned Debate on Amendment proposed to Question [23rd November] "That it is the opinion of this House, that the improved condition of the Country; and particularly of the Industrious Classes, is mainly the result of recent Commercial Legislation, and especially of the Act of 1846, which established the free admission of Foreign Corn; and that that Act was a wise, just, and beneficial measure:"—(Mr. Charles Villiers):—And which Amendment was to leave out from the word "Country," to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "and especially of the Industrious Classes, is mainly the result of recent Legislation, which has established the principle of unrestricted competition, has abolished Taxes imposed for the purposes of Protection, and has thereby diminished the cost and increased the abundance of the principle articles of the Food of the People," (Viscount Palmerston),—instead thereof.

MR. MILNER GIBSON: Sir, I desire very briefly to state to the House some considerations which have occurred to my mind in reference to the Resolution of my hon. Friend the Member for Wolverhampton (Mr. C. Villiers), the Amendment of the noble Lord the Member for Tiverton (Viscount Palmerston), and the conclusions to which I have come with respect to both Motions. I consider it peculiarly unfortunate for us that the discussion of a Resolution intended to be a simple affirmation of a principle of public policy should have been mixed up with party considerations. I, for one, absolve myself of all responsibility, if that result should take place. I think that although it is true, as the right hon. Chancellor of the Exchequer says, that it is a mistake for either an individual or a Government to submit to insult, yet, on the other hand, it is not an uncommon stratagem, not an unusual Ministerial manœuvre, to call Resolutions of this kind votes of want of confidence, in order that thereby a fair expression of the opinion of the House may not be taken; and in order that the Members, who are supporters of Government, may be deterred from expressing their genuine opinions on the question before the House. I am at a loss to understand why it was necessary to say that this Motion of my hon. Friend's was a vote of want of confidence. If ever there was a question on which the House was entitled to be quite unfettered by Governmental considerations it was this, because the Government had told the people in the very commencement that they placed their own opinions on the shelf, and that the country was to pronounce freely without any reference to the private opinions of the Government. If that be so, I ask why we are now to be prevented pronouncing freely our opinion of the policy and justice of our commercial legislation, because the Ministers may chance to put the construction of a vote of want of confidence on our proceedings, in order to influence in their own ranks the gentlemen who go by the name of Conservative Free Traders. I think that we should have had these Conservative Free Traders voting with the hon. Member for Wolverhampton had not the manœuvre been resorted to of turning the Motion into a vote of want of confidence. Government had separated themselves entirely from this question. These opinions were not to inconvenience them in any way, and I think we are not dealt fairly with, when my hon. Friend submits his views in a temperate and proper Resolution, to have this extreme sensitiveness exhibited, and to be told that we are passing a deliberate insult on the Members of the Administration. I should suppose that the meaning of that word "insult" was connected with the intention of the person supposed to inflict it; and I say that if any intention of showing want of confidence be disavowed, any intention of wounding unnecessarily the feelings of hon. Gentlemen opposite, or of insult to the Government be repudiated, such considerations ought no longer to influence the votes of Members of this House. But I consider that my hon. Friend the Member for Wolverhampton would not have covered the whole ground, would not have pronounced fairly for the country, unless he had particularised the Corn Bill of 1846, and declared that measure to be both just and beneficial; and above all, I think he was bound to declare it to be a just measure, because in that term lay the whole question between the two parties. If we are to reason in the Resolutions which have been submitted to the House—and I submit that every one of these Resolutions, that of the right hon. Baronet the Member for Carlisle (Sir J. Graham), and also the Amendment of the noble Lord the Member for Tiverton (Viscount Palmerston) all give reasons why we should support recent commercial policy—if we are to give reasons, let us take care that we give proper reasons, that we may tell the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth, and do not leave support of this policy on a foundation that may slide from under us, or write on sand that verdict which should be graven on the rock. It is not sufficient to tell me that the repeal of the Corn Laws has cheapened provisions. It is not sufficient for me to rest my defence of this policy on the prosperity of the day. I remember well when my hon. Friend the Member for Wolverhampton, in bringing forward his Motion years ago for the total repeal of the Corn Laws, founded that Motion upon the distress occasioned by them, he made but little progress. He was told that the distress might pass away, and that it was difficult to connect cause and effect in such a manner as to show the necessity of the great change he proposed. But when he took higher ground, and advocated the repeal of the Corn Laws on the broad principle of civil right, and justice, and on the ground that a man has a right to freedom of exchange, he then made progress, and got the support of the moral sentiment of the nation, and found that he was in the fair way of carrying his question. If you merely justify a policy on the ground of its cheapening provisions, and the prosperity it produces; and if at the same time you shrink from declaring that it is a just policy, who shall say that if from various causes provisions rise, or manufacturing or commercial distress comes on, we shall not be told that the time has arrived for the reconsideration of a policy which had been built on the cheapness of provisions, and the manufacturing prosperity it produced? Such a mode of dealing with a question would justify confiscation or repudiation. You might say of confiscation that it had benefited the parties in whose favour it had taken place, by their enjoying the property of those persons who had been robbed, or they might say the same of repudiation; and, therefore, I contend most emphatically that if we are afraid to say that this is a just and righteous policy, we had better say nothing at all about it. Now, the noble Lord, the Member for Tiverton tells us, with regard to the Motion of my hon. Friend, "There is not one word in that Resolution to which I, for my own part, should not be ready implicitly to subscribe." And yet the noble Lord, it is said, is going to vote against it. I do not understand whether the noble Lord, after saying he subscribed to it "implicitly," is going to vote against that Motion, or whether he is going to vote against his own Amendment. I think the speech of the noble Lord is fatal to his own Amendment, and I will explain why. The object of the noble Lord, as stated in his speech, is not to force the convictions of hon. Members opposite. His words are—

"We are an assemblage of Gentlemen. We who are Gentlemen on this side ought to remember that we are dealing with Gentlemen on the other, and I, for one, cannot reconcile it to my feelings calling on an assemblage of English Gentlemen needlessly to express an opinion they do not entertain, or to recant opinions which may still be lingering in their minds."

Why, that is an argument against proposing any Resolution, unless you have previously secured unanimity on the subject. But does the Amendment of the noble Lord regard with such extreme delicacy the feelings and convictions of hon. Gentlemen opposite? Nothing of the kind. The noble Lord was about to ask the hon. Member for Cambridgeshire (Mr. E. Ball) and North Warwickshire (Mr. Newdegate), the latter I believe being the Chairman of the Society for the Protection of British Agriculture, to state that the free admission of foreign corn prudently extended will enable the industry of the country—of course including the agricultural industry—better to bear its burthens than if that corn were kept out. The noble Lord considers he is exercising extreme delicacy towards Protectionist Gentlemen when he asks them to make this declaration, merely because he leaves out in his Resolution the words "just and wise;" as if it were no offence to ask these Gentlemen to make what they consider one erroneous statement. The evil commenced when you asked them to accept the other. Now, if I were a Protectionist like the hon. Member for Cambridgeshire or North Warwickshire, I should be more grieved to be obliged to state with such painful accuracy that letting in foreign corn had enabled agriculturists and others better to bear their burthens, than if I had been asked generally to admit that the alteration in the law had been wise, just, and beneficial. So that it appears to me that the noble Lord's Amendment, supported by his explanatory speech, is quite as offensive to Protectionist Gentlemen as the proposal of my hon. Friend the Member for Wolverhampton. But then it is said it is not so offensive to the Members of the Government. Well, if Members of the Government have no respect for their own convictions, I do not see why we should be so extremely delicate towards those Gentlemen. It has been said that we mixed nauseous ingredients with the Resolution, by putting in the words "just and wise;" but, so far as the Government is concerned, we have the consolation of knowing that any bitterness that may be produced on their palates, may, perhaps, be counteracted by the sweets of office. I affirm that the noble Lord the Member for Tiverton is not playing a generous or just part towards my hon. Friend the Member for Wolverhampton in coming here, when he himself agrees in every word of my hon. Friend's Resolution, to take the question out of his hands, and to appropriate to himself the position of arbitrating between different parties in the permanent settlement of this great question. ["Hear, hear!"] I say that my hon. Friend, who has fought this battle manfully and conscientiously, through good and evil report, is entitled to the honour of passing the final Resolution. And let me tell you that none of these Resolutions, with the names of Lord Palmerston and Mr. Disraeli attached, will have the weight with the country or with the world, that one bearing the name of my hon. Friend would have. To use a somewhat familiar illustration the world will say, "No article is genuine unless it has the name of Charles Pelham Villiers attached." That name has been so long connected with the question that the world will believe something short of free-trade has been passed by Parliament if his Motion is thrown over, and the House supports the noble Lord's Amendment. The Resolution of the noble Lord the Member for Tiverton reminds me of one of those mediations that one sometimes hears of in the Foreign Office, intended to settle disputes between belligerent parties, and which have been preceded by secret negotiation. I will take the liberty of quoting a passage from a work of the right hon. the Chancellor of the Exchequer, in which he commented in former times with much severity on the characters of public men. The work I allude to is the Runnymede Letters, in which he showed a far-seeing sagacity in predicting the future career of the noble Lord the Member for Tiverton. He said that justice had never been done to the noble Lord's talent, who had served seven Prime Ministers with equal fidelity. The author goes on addressing the noble Lord in these words—"You owe the Whigs great gratitude, my Lord, and therefore I think you will betray them." Sir, the proceedings of the noble Lord on this subject remind me forcibly of similar proceedings on the Militia question. But I cannot believe that the noble Lord, agreeing as he does with the words of the Resolution, implicitly subscribing to them, was justified, out of mere generosity to the Members of the Government, in doing what in him lay to prevent my hon. Friend having a majority in support of his Motion. But are we to shrink from asserting that the policy of free trade is just? Is no man to be permitted without giving offence to hon. Gentlemen opposite to assert that the repeal of the Corn Laws was founded on the principles of justice and wisdom? Will the supporters of the late Sir Robert Peel find any difficulty in asserting that the policy they themselves supported was founded on justice and wisdom? Do they not remember the last words of that great man when he resigned office in consequence of his commercial policy—"That the abundant food of the working people would be all the sweeter because it was no longer leavened with a sense of injustice?" The omission of the words "wise, just, and beneficial," is significant. If they had never appeared in the Resolution, the case would have stood in a different position. If this declaration were omitted from the Resolution adopted by the House, would not that omission cast a slur, not to be mistaken, on the policy of Sir Robert Peel, and give a sanction to the proceedings of those who caused the removal of Sir Robert Peel from office? Hon. Gentlemen who were formerly connected with that great statesman, and who are now sitting on this side of the House, may have their own views on the subject, but the world will think they have not done their duty to his memory, if through any maudlin sentimentality they refuse to place their votes upon record, that the policy he advocated was not a wrong, not a mischief, but was founded on eternal principles of justice. It is impossible we can regard the feelings of the Government on this occasion without sanctioning their conduct, and our course must be straightforward and business-like. Let those who really think that this policy has been unwise, unjust, and prejudicial, manfully say so; but let them who hold the contrary opinion as manfully declare that conviction, and not stultify themselves in the eyes of the country by listening to the gentlemanly fancies of the noble Member for Tiverton. I say the question of courtesy does not enter into the question at all. I make no complaint of any man who, thinking the policy of 1846 unjust and not founded in wisdom, votes against my hon. Friend's Resolution. But it is absolutely necessary also on other grounds that we should have something said of the justice of this policy; for, after all, is it not the great question between the two parties? Is there not a distinction of principle separating the two parties in this House from each other? and is it wise, by an artificial arrangement of this sort, to pretend to the world that there is an unanimity which really does not exist? They had this distinct declaration of Lord Derby, given just before the general election:—

“He (the Earl of Derby) had by no means said he was prepared to abandon protection altogether, and to seek some other mode of relief. Not only had he not said that, and not only would he not say it, but that was the precise opposite of what he had said and of what he would say. What he said was, that whether opposed in that or in the other House, it was the purpose of the Government to seek to afford a just and equitable relief to those classes who, for the benefit of the community at large, had been the victims of the recent change in our legislation. And he believed that, on the part of the English people there was that sense of justice that they would consent to be deprived of a portion of the advantages they had enjoyed in order to reduce a portion of the burdens of those who were suffering unduly.”

Now, it is precisely by insisting upon the word “justice,” in the Resolution to be adopted by the House, that we shall aim an effective blow at the policy contained in the words I have thus quoted. We contend that by repealing the Corn Laws, we did render to every man that which was his due, and that is the meaning of the word “just,” and that whatever arrangements may hereafter be made as to the public taxes, they must not be undertaken with a foregone conclusion that some great wrong has been inflicted on the landed interest, or that they are entitled to make up for such supposed wrong by pressing on the enjoyments or advantages which other classes of the community have obtained. It is against that principle that we have directed our Resolution, and it is with that view we have inserted the word “just.” We have attacked the principle of monopoly, and in doing so we believe that we have attacked a principle which is in itself sufficiently unjust; and if we shrank from the assertion of this broad ground, it is my opinion we shall not have done our duty. I think, therefore, my hon. Friend has done his duty in submitting his Motion as it is, in all its fulness, and in not shrinking from the responsibility of inserting and insisting upon the words which have been called in question. It should be recollected, too—when we are charged with being actuated by party feeling in this matter—that my hon. Friend (Mr. C. Villiers) was never deterred by party considerations when his own political friends were in office from bringing forward, year after year, Motions embarrassing to the Government, rather than sacrifice a great principle. He is acting in the same way now—and I must say it is unjust to him, when he is pursuing a consistent and straightforward course, to charge him with having embarked in a factious opposition in pressing this Resolution. The argument, that as it is impossible to obtain a large majority for such a Motion, it is unwise to press it, has, it appears to me, very little weight. Do you suppose that the fact of a Government Amendment being moved, containing the adhesion of Ministers to the policy of free trade, with a view to defeat the Resolutions of my hon. Friend, does not indicate to the world that, so far as maintaining intact the past legislation is concerned, there is pretty nearly unanimity in the present House of Commons? No majority or divisions are necessary to show to the world that, at the present time the House of Commons is disposed to adhere to the policy of 1846. But we want to show to the world something more—we want to show that there is a large party in the House of Commons who believe that that policy was not founded on the low consideration of giving benefit to some at the expense of others, but on high principles of civil right, of reason, and of justice. I fear, if we shrink from our duty on this occasion, that the country will say “the House of Commons is somewhat rotten after all on the question of protection to the landed interest.” The House of Commons has long laboured under that suspicion, and I caution hon. Gentlemen, that if an appearance of rottenness be exhibited on this subject in this House, summoned as it has been on free-trade principles, there is nothing that will so strengthen the cry for Parliamentary reform. For believe me, it is because the people think that the policy of free trade was “just and wise,” that they have supported it; and if you now decline to agree to these words in my hon. Friend's Resolution, they will say you have, after all, some covert intention of restoring, at some future time, that injurious system of monopoly under which they so long suffered—and there will be a loud and general expression of opinion in the country, "that our representation as it now exists is not a reflex of the popular view," and we must consequently turn our attention to the attainment of a large and searching measure of Parliamentary reform. As an advocate for such reform, and looking at the question in that light, I might not perhaps individually regret if my hon. Friend was placed in a minority—for I can conceive nothing so calculated to shake the confidence of the people in the present representative system as that this House should, thus quibbling about words, refuse to vote a declaration that a policy which has been attended with such singular advantages to the country is "wise and just." And what a monstrous anomaly is it, that the Government should tell us, "We are going to carry out a given policy which we admit has been attended with such advantages—but if the House should declare that that policy is 'just, wise, and beneficial,' we will resign." If the free admission of foreign corn is just now, it was so a few years ago; and if Ministers are honestly to carry out the policy on which that measure was founded, why are they ashamed of admitting that it was a "just, wise, and beneficial" policy? What do they mean? Do they want to have the opportunity of whispering against and assailing in secret the policy which they profess to be engaged in carrying out? Do they mean to carry it out, and say at the same time that it is "unwise and unjust?" If the Earl of Derby means, as he says he does, to carry out the principle of free trade honestly and fairly—as honestly as if he had been the original author of that policy—I should have thought he would have hailed such a Resolution as my hon. Friend has proposed as one eminently calculated to strengthen his hands, and to arm him with the most powerful argument against his adversaries, and by enabling him to say to them, "I do not act upon my own opinion—see here the House of Commons have resolved that the policy of free trade is 'just, wise, and beneficial;' I can hear of no objection against it, but must carry it out fully and fairly as I am pledged to do." I would call on my hon. Friends around me to stand by their own leader on this question—my hon. Friend the Member for Wolverhampton. The noble Lord the Member for Tiverton, and still less the right hon. the Chancellor of the Exchequer—neither the one nor the other has any right to come here and attempt to take the matter out of his hands. It is for the country and Parliament to pronounce their opinion; let my hon. Friend insist upon his Resolution; and let every honest free-trader vote for him, and I undertake to say their constituents will approve of their conduct.

MR. MILNES GASKELL said, that notwithstanding the taunts in which the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Manchester had indulged, and notwithstanding the threat of Parliamentary reform with which he had just concluded, and which, in his (Mr. Gaskell's) opinion, was a better explanation of this Motion than any which had previously been given, he had yet to learn upon what grounds, so far as the assertion of any public principle was concerned, they were called upon to adopt the terms of the original Resolution in preference to those of the Amendment of the noble Lord (Viscount Palmerston). The real question they had to decide was, not whether unrestricted competition should be the rule of our commercial policy, for upon that point he apprehended that there was little difference of opinion, but whether the declaration of their intentions should be made in such a manner as to reflect upon the former conduct of a large minority in that House. If, indeed, there had been any doubt as to the intentions of the Government upon that subject, he could have understood the course which the hon. and learned Gentleman (Mr. Villiers) was pursuing; but after the distinct assurances which had been given, after the repeated declarations which had been made, both by the noble Earl at the head of the Government, in another place, and by his right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer in that House, he owned it appeared to him that it was neither just nor generous to ask the House of Commons to affirm the Resolution of the hon. and learned Gentleman—a Resolution which only differed from the Amendment of the noble Lord in this: that it sought to affix a stigma on political opponents, and to brand with Parliamentary censure the line of conduct which they had pursued. It was true that the hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for Wolverhampton had disclaimed

all party motives in bringing this question before the House; but the hon. and learned Gentleman and his friends had not thought it inconsistent with that disclaimer to inveigh in unmeasured language against the conduct of Her Majesty's Ministers. The hon. and learned Gentleman told them that the Earl of Derby had been tried by the constituencies of the country, and that he had been found wanting. Another hon. and learned Gentleman, the Member for the city of Oxford (Sir W. P. Wood)—and he (Mr. Gaskell) had been sorry to hear such an expression fall from him—had said that the Earl of Derby had no principles; and the hon. and gallant Member for Middlesex (Mr. B. Osborne) had called the advisers of the Crown a gang of political latitudinarians. Well, for Gentlemen who disclaimed party motives, this was tolerably strong language. But the hon. Member for Manchester (Mr. Bright) had gone still further, for he had charged the Government—and he (Mr. Gaskell) presumed also those independent Members of Parliament who intended to support the Government—with losing character with their friends in the country, and destroying their reputation for political morality. Now, upon that point, he (Mr. Gaskell) wished to make a few observations. His right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer, had truly stated the other night, that the repeal of the corn laws had been mainly opposed upon two grounds: first, from the belief that it would be prejudicial to the interests of labour; and, secondly, upon the ground that it would inflict serious injury upon important classes: but there had also been a third ground on which that repeal had been opposed, and which had not been mentioned in the course of this debate, and speaking only for himself, a humble Member of that House, but one whose political morality could, he thought, hardly be impeached, he might be allowed to say, that it was that third ground on which he had chiefly relied in the opposition which he had felt it to be his painful duty to offer to that measure. He had felt it to be a most painful duty, for it had severed his political connexion with many personal friends for whom he entertained the sincerest respect and regard; and it had compelled him to vote in opposition to a Minister whose patriotism he had never questioned, the purity of whose motives he had never doubted, whose commanding abilities and high character he had always held in admiration, and of whose personal kindness to himself he should ever cherish the remembrance. But the chief ground of his opposition had been this: he had felt that a power which had been conferred by the constituencies of England for one purpose, ought not to have been exercised for another—that a Government which had displaced that of the noble Lord the Member for London for its free-trade budget of 1841, ought not to have been the Government to propose a total repeal of the corn laws; and that a House of Commons which had been elected to uphold the system of protection, ought not to have consented to overturn it. He might have been wrong in his opinion: the measure might have been wise and beneficial; he would express no opinion about that: but he (Mr. Gaskell) must still maintain that it had not been just to the great Conservative party in this country, or to the constituencies of the Empire, to pass it under those circumstances and at that time. It appeared to him, however, that now the case was altogether different; and after the lapse of so many years, when two succeeding Parliaments had sanctioned the policy which had been then adopted, and when some at least of the apprehensions which had been entertained were found not to have been realised by the event, it was too much to say that those who declined to vote for the reimposition of the corn laws were to be held guilty of political immorality. He concurred in the opinion which had been so well expressed by his hon. Friend the Member for the North Riding (Mr. Cayley), and by an hon. Baronet the Member for Hertfordshire (Sir Bulwer Lytton), at whose return to that House after so long an absence they must all rejoice, that as the new commercial system had been deliberately ratified by the people of England at the last general election, it was the duty of the Government and of Parliament to adhere to it. It could not be seriously contended that men were bound at all times and under all circumstances to give effect to the abstract opinions which they entertained. The hon. Gentleman over the way might laugh, but would any man of common sense either maintain such a proposition or act upon it? Had such been the practice of the party opposite? The noble Lord the Member for London had displaced the Government of Sir Robert Peel in 1835, by moving a Resolution which declared that no settlement of the Irish tithe question could be satisfactory which did not appropriate the surplus revenues of the Irish Church to secular purposes. Had the noble Lord acted upon that Resolution after his accession to power? No, he had refrained from doing so, and most wisely, because he knew that public opinion would have been opposed to him in such a course. But the noble Earl at the head of the Government had a better justification for his conduct now, than the noble Lord had had then, inasmuch as he had not acceded to power in consequence of any hostile Resolution which he had moved, but owing to the feuds and differences prevailing in the camp of his opponents. Then, said the hon. Gentleman the Member for Manchester (Mr. Bright) and others, how could they place any confidence in a Government whose supporters had made such extravagant declarations and expressed such conflicting opinions upon the hustings? Well, very possibly some of them might have done so; but was the noble Earl at the head of the Government the only man whose followers had done that? Why, there was hardly a single question, except that of our commercial policy, on which the Gentlemen opposite were agreed; and questions of organic change in the Constitution and of national defence were not so very unimportant, after all. If he (Mr. Gaskell) was wrong in this supposition, and if there was a majority on the benches opposite that was agreed in the maintenance of definite principles, and capable of harmonious action, let them bring the matter fairly to an issue, and move a vote of want of confidence in the Government. It was perfectly true that there were differences of opinion among Gentlemen sitting on that (the Ministerial) side of the House, on the subject of free trade. Some held that the Act of 1846 had been productive of almost unmingled benefit to the country; while others were of opinion that it had inflicted great hardship on a large and important class of the community. But no man was in any doubt as to the intentions of Her Majesty's Ministers on the subject; no man doubted their adherence to the policy to which the terms of their own Amendment pledged them. The real question before the House was between a Government which was prepared to carry out the commercial system which had received the deliberate sanction of Parliament and of the country, and was agreed upon other matters of high national importance; and a Government consisting of Gentlemen who might be agreed upon this question of commercial policy, but amongst whom, upon almost every other subject that could be named, there were irreconcilable, and vital, and endless differences.

MR. SIDNEY HERBERT: Sir, I trust that the House will give me the opportunity of stating the course I intend to take upon this occasion, and of justifying that course by stating the reasons which, under circumstances of some difficulty, have induced me to come to the decision at which I have arrived. Let me first, however, assure the hon. Gentleman who has just sat down, and the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Manchester, who spoke before him, that, in coming to that decision I had elements for forming my opinion totally irrespective of the effect which an adverse vote would have upon the fate of the Government. When threats are held out by a Ministry, that in the event of the carrying of a Motion to which they are opposed, they will vacate their seats, that is a consideration which must weigh strongly with all those Gentlemen who are professed followers of that Government; but with respect to Gentlemen who are independent of them, the duty lies upon them to consider, not whether the Government will go out or stay in, but whether they will be justified in going out or in staying in. Sir, this has been said to be a question of confidence in the Government. If it is I never saw a question so mystified, nor was bungling ever carried to such an extremity of perfection. Did any one ever before see a vote of want of confidence which terminates with an expression that the House is ready and willing to consider any measures which Her Majesty's Government intend to bring forward? Well, but how does the question now stand? It will be necessary for me to explain the view which I have taken, and the reasons which have led me to adopt it, by referring—though perhaps it may not be quite regular to do so—to the Amendment no longer upon the table of the House. The debate commenced by two Motions originally given notice of by the hon. Member for Wolverhampton (Mr. C. Villiers), and the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer. Between those two Motions I could not have one moment's hesitation. I saw, as it had been well said, a Resolution moved by a Gentleman who proposed this question to the House years ago, and who had struggled for it under great difficulties and in small minorities. I knew that he had fought his battle with singular skill and consistency, and not without much labour had brought it to a happy issue. During the whole time that he argued that question—and they were warm times—I do not believe that he left a personal enemy upon either side of the House. Well, in opposition to a Motion made by the hon. and learned Gentleman, there was notice of an Amendment coming from a quarter which, upon this question, I own does not inspire me with confidence. After the speech of the hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for Wolverhampton, the Chancellor of the Exchequer rose, and I confess that his speech, able as it was—impressive in manner—ingenious in argument—left in my mind, as it did in that of my learned Friend the Member for the city of Oxford, who spoke last night, a most painful impression. He set out by stating that he was going to give an account of the course which his party had taken since 1846, which should be studiously accurate and impartial. When I heard those two words I certainly did feel some little alarm at what might be coming; but I was certainly surprised at the singular incorrectness which distinguished that speech. There are many Gentlemen on the opposite side of the House with whom I have long lived in relations not only of private friendship but political co-operation; and although I am no longer by party connected with them, I do not hesitate to say that their political reputation as members of a class which forms the chief element of stability in this country, and whose public virtue entitles them to public respect, is most important. It was not then without pain that I heard a statement made—a course described—which was in my mind an imputation of the deepest dye upon the character of those Gentlemen. We all recollect the period that intervened between 1846 and 1852. Was the country quiet? Was there no agitation upon this question? At market tables—in theatres—at protection societies, one hundred in number, was everything said with a view to secure the stability of the policy of 1846? For my part, I acquit the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer, as far as his own convictions are concerned, of the charge of having ever been a protectionist. I never for one moment thought he believed in the least degree in protection. I do not accuse him of having forgotten what he said or what he believed in those years. I only accuse him of having forgotten now what he then wished it to appear that he believed. I ask, then, hon. Gentlemen opposite, are they willing to thus stigmatise themselves? The noble Marquess opposite, the Member for Leicestershire (the Marquess of Granby)—a man of honour—a man professing opinions which, I think, under present circumstances, are unfortunate—what does he say? Did he not manfully stand up and say, “I repudiate the charge—I was a protectionist—I spoke for protection and I meant protection.” The House might regret the course taken by the noble Marquess, but they could not but admire his consistency and his honour. But how will all this appear to the constituencies of the country? What will they think when they come to learn that a vast number of Gentlemen, holding very strong language upon the subject of protection—delaying the rearrangement of rents, which in some cases has become a necessity to the farmer, upon the plea that the Legislature would revise the system which established free trade—what will be their feelings when they hear that their object in agitating was not the restoration of protection, but to secure the stability of the commercial policy of 1846? Well, the noble Marquess has repudiated this charge; and he, let me remind you, is an authority upon this subject; for there was a time when the leadership of that party was put in commission, and there was a triumvirate established, which consisted of the hon. Member for Stamford (Mr. Herries)—the Nestor of protection—the noble Marquess the Member for Leicestershire; and the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer. The noble Marquess is, therefore, entitled to speak with authority upon this subject. But what were the words used on the formation of that party? Gentlemen have read passages from the speeches of individual speakers; and if I read extracts from speeches made by hon. Gentlemen opposite, I wish to guard myself against the supposition that I am going to taunt them with a change of their opinions. I am the last man who would do so, for I am in no position to speak ill of converts—I had had myself to pass through that ordeal, to break up political friendships, and to sacrifice office—whatever that may have been worth—because my convictions had been entirely altered on this subject, and because I thought it was not for a man of honour, holding opinions differing from those which he held before, to occupy a station of responsibility, and to shrink from attempting to give effect to those opinions upon a question on which immediate action was necessary. I have always felt that the great party opposite must give up the system of protection as merely a bubble, which but required to be full blown to burst. I expected them to give up protection. It is detrimental to the interests of the nation that a great party should be so allied to a principle which put them in a false position with the rest of the community, by advocating a system which gave them interests at variance with the interests of their other fellow-subjects. But when the history of a party comes to be correctly recorded, perhaps the principle upon which it was formed is more conclusive evidence of what were its intentions even than the course it may subsequently adopt, because events arise, men appear, circumstances occur, changes take place which serve to modify the course originally intended to be adhered to. I will therefore refer to the authority of Lord George Bentinck, who made a speech upon the occasion when first the party now sitting opposite were organised as a protectionist party. I find this statement in the speech of the noble Lord, and no man can accuse him either of disingenuousness, or of reserving his sentiments:—

“The great end of that party which owns for its leader Lord Stanley, is first to recover the protection we have lost; but, failing that, to seek compensation in relieving the agricultural interest from the peculiar burdens they bear. . . . The first matter is the recovery of the protection to native industry which we have lost. . . . You, the farmers of England, must do the work. You must not trust to your landlords.”

And if the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer be correct in his history, it was indeed necessary that the farmers should not trust their landlords. Was that opinion, as expressed by Lord George Bentinck, acquiesced in? I find another speaker upon that occasion making use of the following language:—

“But my hon. Friend has told you we are met here to-day not so much to moralise on the past, as to speculate upon the future. To his theme or plan every man of intelligence did respond. I know that what he states here he practises in another place; but I know and I trust that under other circumstances we shall retrace our steps.”

And that was the language of the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer. He added a sentence almost applicable to the present time:—

“Where is the great agricultural interest which is the basis of the polity of England, and has been so for centuries? I cannot believe that this nation—and when I say this nation I mean all classes—with their primary intelligence, will be governed by words—will be degraded to a mere distinction between hocus and pocus.”

But have we any other authorities upon this subject? Have we any other evidence to guide us in determining what was the policy which animated the protectionist party from 1846 down almost to the present time? I find that in 1849 Lord Stanley spoke as follows:—

“I hear it said that free trade has been adopted, and that we must proceed in that course. Vestigia nulla retrorsum. From that doctrine I dissent. I will not consent to take it as a fait accompli that protection to native industry must be abandoned. . . . Every day's experience convinces me that you must retrace the steps you have taken. You must make part of your revenue depend on a moderate import duty—you must return to the principle of protection.”

The same language was held in 1850; and in 1851, when a Government was attempted to be formed, it was always understood that the noble Earl did not succeed because he considered himself bound to re-establish a system of import duties. The noble Lord then said—

“I cannot, as an honest man, abandon the attempt to relieve the existing distress by retracing the false step which has been taken, and to remedy the wrong done by the imposition of a moderate duty upon corn.”—[3 Hansard, cxiv. 1021.]

Now I have not read these extracts to taunt hon. Gentlemen with a change in their opinions. It would not be open for me to do so, for my convictions on the subject of free trade have, like those of other men, undergone an alteration. I thought it was not my duty to hold one set of opinions and to act upon another. But to hold opinions and not attempt to give effect to them when I was in authority, and obliged by the circumstances of the time to legislate, I felt to be inconsistent with my character as a man of honour. Again, in 1849, I find that the hon. Member for Stamford, the President of the India Board (Mr. Herries), made a proposition in a Committee of Ways and Means for a fixed duty on corn, and that the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer supported that Motion; and I may say that the right hon. Gentleman's speech upon that occasion applies with peculiar force to the present discussion. He said that—

“His own opinion was, that the suggestion which had been made that night was a politic suggestion, and would soon be a popular one. Its adoption might be mortifying to the vanity of individuals in that House. It might hurt and offend the self-love even of political parties. He deeply regretted that circumstances should have precipitated such a proposition, but considering that there was not even an imaginary balance in the Exchequer, they (the Protectionist Members) were bound to leave on record—and the best record in the world was a free discussion in that House—their opinions on the present state of the Exchequer, and the best means of replenishing it.”—[3 Hansard, cvii. 776.]

The Motion was brought forward, but the House did not divide upon it. Probably the same course was pursued then as in some other instances. The present Member for Liverpool (Mr. F. Mackenzie) may have reported that their benches were thin, the library full, and the coffee-room empty; and seeing this, the right hon. Gentleman may have suggested that it will be dangerous to risk the stability of the policy of 1846. Mr. O'Connell carried on the agitation for a repeal of the Union for many years after the one Motion for that object which he brought forward in this House had been rejected; but I am sure that he would never have thought of saying that his object was to secure the stability of the Act of 1800. I now come to the question whether a Resolution was necessary under the circumstances of this case. The right hon. Chancellor of the Exchequer says that the whole question was left to the decision of the country, and that the Government had announced their intention of being bound by that decision. Now, with respect to the necessity of a Resolution under such circumstances—the Government has challenged the opinion of the country. That challenge was given in a peculiar form, for which I am in no way responsible. The Government said that the question must go to the constituencies, and according as they decide we will decide. Well, the House met, and in Her Majesty's Speech there is a repetition—not of that challenge, but a singular question is asked, “If you think something which you don't, perhaps in that case you will do something which you won't.” That language was felt by the House to be studiously ambiguous. When you want to avoid a division upon any great question, there are two ways of doing it. The one is to say nothing about it; and the other is, if you do say anything, say it in so ambiguous a manner that each party, reading it their own way, will rest content. That was the course taken by the Government upon the present occasion; and I confess frankly that I was extremely disappointed. I wished exceedingly to leave the matter peaceably at rest. I have no wish to find causes of quarrel with the present Government or any Government—the task of government in this country is quite difficult enough, without independent Members volunteering to throw more impediments in the way—but I did expect that the admission of the policy of 1846 would have been announced in words frank, plain, and intelligible. If there was any technical difficulty in putting words into the mouth of Her Majesty, in commendation or affirmation of any particular policy, where was the difficulty of inserting a plain, simple, and frank admission in the Address in answer? Failing in this admission, what could we do? What means had we of knowing what were the individual opinions of Members of Parliament who have been returned here to settle this question by the country? The right hon. Gentleman the President of the India Board tells us that the Member for Liverpool is a stanch Protectionist. We have as yet no means of knowing; so I take the right hon. Gentleman at his word. In order, however, that the opinions of hon. Gentlemen may be tested, this Resolution has been framed. I confess that this debate has not inspired me with any admiration of abstract resolutions in general, because I am more and more convinced, as the debate has gone on, that if men do not choose to be bound by words, it is impossible to bind them. Here, then, we have the Motion of the hon. and learned Member for Wolverhampton, to which the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer has moved an Amendment. With respect to the latter, I thought that the House ought not to accept it on account of its form and construction. It is not declaratory of the opinion of the House upon the question of free trade. It seemed more like a Resolution to test a divided Cabinet than anything else: with the duty and conscience of the Ministry the House have nothing to do. It is clearly not the duty of the House of Commons to lay down what is to be the business of the Executive. The House may intimate to the Government that such and such are their opinions; and if the Government bring forward measures in accordance with them, so much the better—if not, it is their own affair; but the Amendment of the Chancellor of the Exchequer states that “unrestricted competition” being accepted “after due deliberation” as the principle of our commercial system, the House is of opinion that it is the duty of the Government, and so forth. Now, that is not what we want to know. The House of Commons was dissolved to decide a great question. This Amendment states that there has been due deliberation. I am unaware that any deliberation in this Parliament has taken place upon this question yet. This Resolution ought to have been moved prior to the dissolution if it was proposed at all. But it is not our business to take the responsibility of deciding what measures the Executive should bring forward. If the Government thus delegate the question of what measures they are to bring forward to the constituencies of this country, I fear an inconvenient precedent may be set. I am aware that upon some questions of importance, previous Ministers may have done the same thing, in questions which were to close with the vote then come to; but in cases where constant legislation would be necessary, I do not say the principle of such a course is right, or that it is wrong—but I say that as a rule of action it is new; and although I give no opinion as to the effect it would have upon the reliance, in the opinion of the people, to be placed upon the morality of public men, still I say that I cannot see such a principle laid down without serious alarm. I therefore prefer the Resolution moved by my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Wolverhampton, to that moved by the Chancellor of the Exchequer. I cannot refuse to give my hearty consent to the fact that the measures adopted by this House in 1846 were “wise, just, and beneficial.” I apprehend that the Government, who are about to introduce and carry out measures founded upon those very principles, “firmly maintained, and prudently extended,” must think so too. I doubt whether they can deny that those measures which they are about to carry out, which they are about to develop, are wise, just, and beneficial. I confess, however, that I do think it impolitic to put these words into a Resolution, the object of which is, as I conceive, to pledge the largest number of persons who are willing to adopt the principles of free trade, and so to allay the agitation, and at once put an end to all false hopes upon the subject. The hon. and learned Gentleman has entirely denied any intention of inserting those words in order to wound the feelings of hon. Gentlemen opposite; but as those words, as they stand, bear that appearance, I confess, in my opinion I think they do; and I think in these matters generosity is the best policy—not only the best as matter of policy, but the best as matter of feeling. The more you conduct your discussions on the system of regular warfare, the better it will be for all parties. If you once establish a principle that no quarter is to be given, who, I ask, will ever yield? The whole history of this country is full of instances of party warfare terminating in this way. As the noble Lord the Member for Tiverton (Viscount Palmerston) truly observed, our system is one of political propagandism—we are all anxious to make proselytes—and therefore we ought not to repel a man, or a body of men, when they come over to our side with hard words and terms of humiliation. I must say, for myself, that I should lament to see a system established by which, when a person, or a party, from the lapse of time or the occurrence of fresh circumstances, sees reason to doubt the accuracy of his former opinions, is anxious to retrace his steps, and to adopt sounder views—I should regret the establishment of a system by which such person would be subjected to personal humiliation, before he was accepted as a convert. I recollect an observation made by a witty contemporaneous writer, to the effect that all religious sects in free countries succeeded in making converts except the Jews; and he asked rather quaintly how it could be expected that any man would become a convert to a faith, the profession of which must begin with a surgical operation? And in the same way I must say I feel strongly—being anxious to bring over as many as I possibly can to the standard under which I fight—that I shall not succeed if I tell hon. Gentlemen who differed from me in former times, that their agreement in opinion with me must be commenced by their doing penance—by putting on a white sheet and standing in the pillory for their former misdeeds. In all other respects the Resolution of the hon. Member for Wolverhampton has my hearty concurrence. It is my opinion, indeed, that it is in many respects not so strong as that which has been since moved. The words, as they were originally drawn by my right hon. Friend the Member for Carlisle (Sir James Graham), and moved by the noble Viscount the Member for Tiverton—those words omit everything that can be in any way offensive or distasteful to any hon. Gentleman—that is, provided he be a sincere convert to the principles of free trade—for they state that—"It is the opinion of the House that the improved condition of the country, especially of the industrious classes, is mainly the result of recent legislation, which has established the principle of unrestricted competition, has abolished taxes imposed for the purposes of protection—"

The words here, you see, are not minced—there is no leaving out of any words which are necessary for the strongest assertion of the principle—

"and has thereby diminished the cost and increased the abundance of the principal articles of the food of the people. That it is the opinion of this House that this policy firmly maintained and"— what is still more—

The House will observe that I am reading from the first notice of these Resolutions, and with the words omitted which have since been added, and to which, certainly, I attach very great importance—

"without injury to any important interest." With regard to the repeal of the corn laws, I from the first held that per se to be an act of justice. I know I have been accused of holding too strong language upon that subject in this House; but I must say that the opinion which I held, and which I still retain, is this, that if any class is to receive by any means an addition to their income above the natural price of their commodities, it cannot be given in a way more offensive to the people of this country than by enhancing the price of wheat. I thought, therefore, that the repeal of the corn laws was only a restitution to the people of that which we, the landed interest, had been unjustly enjoying; and when Gentlemen talk of compensation, I say they have no claim for compensation. I do not by that mean to say that they have no claim to relief, if they as a class are more burdened than any other; but what I mean is this: I object to anything which has a tendency to substitute for protection something by which the same object may be attained by indirect means. Whether it be direct protection, or whether it be any enhancement of price by means of import duties, or whether it be fiscal protection in favour of any one class, it is all the same thing—it is inequality—it is favour—and, as such, it is hateful, and justly hateful, to the great mass of the people. Of the two Resolutions, then, I must say, that which has been last moved is in my mind the strongest. The right hon. Baronet the Secretary for the Colonies (Sir John Pakington) last night said that he could not vote for the Resolutions of the hon. Member for Wolverhampton, because, he said, how can I vote that no injustice has been done to the West Indian interest? Now, the words of the hon. and learned Gentleman's Resolution do not apply to sugar—they specify only the Act of 1846, in reference to the repeal of the corn laws.

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON: I beg to say, that I did not argue the question with reference to sugar at all.

MR. SIDNEY HERBERT: I am willing to submit to the correction of my right hon. Friend. I certainly thought he referred to sugar, and I was the more struck with his speech, and with the speeches of hon. Gentlemen opposite last night, because it appeared to me that there was a considerable difference between the speeches of last night and those of Tuesday. On Tuesday night they were all free-traders—not only for the future, but even retrospectively—in fact, they had never been anything else but free-traders. But it appears to me that they are now getting gradually back to their old position; and that as Tuesday night was devoted to satisfying the country, so last night was devoted to the endeavour to reconcile a party. I must say again, therefore, that the Resolution which was last moved is, in my mind, the stronger of the two, because the words embrace everything—there is no distinction made between sugar and anything else—it applies to all the articles which have been cheapened, and in that way it carries the principle of free trade farther than the other, and, therefore, I am better pleased with it. But then my right hon. Friend says some vindication is necessary to the memory of Sir Robert Peel, and he made a pointed appeal to some of us sitting on these benches, who had the good fortune to be his friends. Sir, I think the memory of Sir Robert Peel stands on a pedestal, from which no counter Motion, even if it could be carried in this House, could remove it. I knew Sir Robert Peel during my whole life almost—I admired him as a politician—I followed him as a leader—and I loved the man. He was a man, mind you, susceptible—proud, and justly proud, of the purity of his motives—jealous of his honour. I sat by him night by night on that bench when he was attacked by the foulest language, and accused of the meanest crimes. But Sir Robert Peel was a man of a generous nature—he was one who never rejoiced in the humiliation of an adversary; and he would have recollected this—that the humiliation, if humiliation it were, was an humiliation to be inflicted not only upon those who had assailed him, but also upon Gentlemen for whose character he had the warmest regard. I don't confound hon. Gentlemen opposite with those who calumniated Sir Robert Peel. I recollect even at the moment when party strife was embittered to the uttermost—when men's passions rose high—when great disappointment was felt at the course Sir Robert Peel had taken—even at that moment there were hon. Gentlemen opposite who continued a general support to his Government, and who never, when they opposed this very Bill, either threw a doubt upon his motives or assailed his integrity. I say, then, that the memory of Sir Robert Peel requires no vindication—his memory is embalmed in the grateful recollections of the people of this country; and I say, if ever retribution is wanted—for it is not words that humiliate, but deeds—if a man wants to see humiliation—which, God knows, is always a painful sight—he need but look there [pointing to the Treasury bench]. I give, then, on these grounds, my support to the Amendment of the noble Viscount; and in giving it, let me say that I give it as the last and crowning act of a great controversy. I rejoice with my whole heart—I rejoice that to its wide words—its comprehensive terms—its completeness in every respect, a large majority of this House will give their assent. When we look back for the last few years—I think that, thankful as we are for the blessings we have enjoyed since 1846, we are too apt to forget the many evils which the same legislation has averted. At a time when all Europe was disturbed—when opinions subversive of all society were abroad—the contagion did not spread here. Even in a time of great commercial failures and of great mercantile distress, with a high price of bread to aggravate the sufferings of the people—then we had reason to be thankful—then you (the Government) had, above all, reason to be thankful for the legislation of 1846; for, if these laws had been then in existence, inflicting an injustice of which the people grievously complained—if the people had not been able to say—as, thank God, they could say—that “for the dearth, the gods, and not the patri- cians, made it”—then measures of a similar character would have been passed, but they would not have been passed alone. The country would have raised such a cry for reform, that even you, if you had sat upon those benches, would have been constrained to pass measures little short of universal suffrage. We do not consider enough the political as well as the social sufferings which have been averted by that measure. Sir, we have had a great warning—we have had a great escape. Let us know how to profit by the lesson; and in our future legislation, in which I trust there will be on that subject, at any rate if not more unanimity, still less of strife, let us never forget the danger which arises from attempting, in any shape or for any purpose, to give special favour or special exemption to any class or interest in this country.

MR. DRUMMOND said, it was impossible to rise in that debate, after the eloquent speech of the right hon. Gentleman who had just sat down, without feeling that he was greatly in need of some portion of that which the hon. Gentleman the Member for Middlesex (Mr. Osborne) had called “audacity,” or, to use a milder term, “modest assurance;” for he could not help seeing that on the other (the Opposition) side of the House there was arrayed all the talents of the House, with the exception of the Chancellor of the Exchequer. He recollected a former occasion when the talents of the House were equally collected on one side of it:—but on that occasion they were on the side of the Government, whereas now they were unfortunately arrayed against it. But, notwithstanding the disadvantage of addressing such an assembly in such circumstances, he could not consent to be mystified and dragged through the dirt he did not know whither. He had a duty to perform to the constituents who had sent him to that House; or, rather, he should say, he had a duty to perform to those who had had no hand in sending him to that House—he meant the labourers of the district in which he resided. There was something due also to himself; and he must, for these reasons, endeavour to steer his way through the complicated mazes of the present debate as God should enable him. He was sorry to say that it seemed to him that the present was a mere debate with respect to “the difference between Tweedledum and Tweedledee,” or whether twice three or thrice two made six. Nevertheless, if there was so much importance to be attached to words, it became him and most other Gentlemen to take care, he thought, how they pinned their sleeves to another man's words. He felt no difficulty on the subject himself. More than twenty-five years ago he had publicly advocated free trade in corn, at a time when hon. Gentlemen opposite were advocating a fixed duty, when Gentlemen on the Ministerial side of the House were advocating a sliding scale, and when the head of the Whig party in the House of Lords was declaring that any man who should seriously propose a repeal of the Corn Laws was a madman. Well, hon. Gentlemen opposite had first become mad, then Sir R. Peel and his friends followed, and now they were all pretty mad together. They had at length all arrived at very nearly a common agreement, and they must take care, that having arrived at a fixed conclusion, they did not suffer it to escape out of their hands. He, for one, thought that some such Motion as that which was now before them was absolutely necessary; and he thought that no weaker words than those which the hon. and learned Gentleman had moved were adapted to the occasion. If he had entertained any doubt on the subject before, what had taken place in the course of this debate would have been sufficient to convince him. He had never thought in the last Parliament that there was much wit or wisdom in hon. Members quoting Hansard against the Ministers, and he often wished that Hansard was at the bottom of the sea. He could not see how there should be any difficulty in a Gentleman confessing that he had changed his opinions. He confessed that he was somewhat surprised to find the leaders of parties in that House rashly saying things in opposition which they became sorry for when they entered office. But still he could not see anything humiliating in a man's saying that better information had enabled him to form a better judgment than he had been able to form on inferior information. But when hon. Gentlemen on that (the Ministerial) side of the House talked of changing the policy and reversing the policy of the country, it seemed to him perfectly clear that they neither understood what was the former policy of the country nor what it was now. Some Gentlemen talked of the repeal of the corn laws as if it were the commencement of a policy. It was nothing of the kind. It was the apex of a policy; it was the keystone of an arch that settled a policy which began at the conclusion of the war, and which overset a policy which we had always maintained from the earliest times. He thought that, without being very prolix or pedantic, he could, with the leave of the House, set this matter so clearly before them as to be quite patent even to the bucolic mind of the veriest Bœotian Member of that House. Hon. Members need not be alarmed that he was going into any long historical narration, when he reminded them that, if the truth must be told, the Anglo-Saxon had always been a stupid fellow, and that, when the Normans came to this country, they found nobody in the land capable of mending or making their iron coats and breeches. Accordingly, they brought over foreign artificers with them to assist in these operations. Those artificers the dull Anglo-Saxons called "Smiths," and hence the reason why there are so many gentlemen who rejoiced in that patronymic at the present day. But these artificers would not remain unless they had an assurance that no foreign manufactured armour would be allowed to be brought into this country. The same thing happened with the dresses of the women, and the furniture of their houses. Nothing that the Anglo-Saxons produced was fit for those who had been brought up at the Courts of Toulouse and Castile. The consequence was that Flemish artificers were brought over, whose names also still survive amongst us. These artisans insisted upon and obtained a monopoly; and this was the uninterrupted policy of the country up to the end of the last century—varied occasionally by circumstances, but never on system, or to any great extent. The battle between protection and free-trade was really fought at the end of the war between the Orders in Council and the burning of English goods by Napoleon. Lord Brougham had never received full credit for the part he had taken in that struggle when a Member of the House of Commons. It was said that "Love laughed at locksmiths," and in like manner necessity laughed at custom-house officers, for it so happened, that although we did not grow a blade of flax ourselves, yet the Admiralty was never at any single moment without any quantity the Navy wanted, notwithstanding the decrees against its admission. The fact was, that the system of monopoly was shown to be absurd. It was a mere question of money, and nothing else. That system was at last put an end to. But this country had little credit in putting it down. When Louis XVIII. was restored, Baron Louis, the French Minister of Finance, offered to our Government a complete free trade with France at an ad valorem duty of 10 per cent on every article whatever. Mr. Huskisson alone saw the advantage of it; but not a single Member of the Government took his part. The manufacturers took alarm, and opposed him. Nevertheless, he persevered; and from that moment we had gone on relaxing our prohibitions, one after another, until we had now at last come to the only true, just, wise, and politic course of trade, which left everything to unrestricted competition. He wished to ask, when hon. Gentlemen talked of going back to protection, were they going back to the time of William the Conqueror, or were they not? for he must remind them that it was not the repeal of the corn laws which would reverse their policy. But it was said that the words of the Resolution of the hon. Member for Wolverhampton were offensive. Now, it so happened that that very day he had received a letter, enclosing one of the earliest declarations of the Manchester League; and it was but just to those gentlemen to say, that the identical words which they were now accused of introducing for the purpose of inflicting pain were in that document. The words were, "We, feeling solemnly convinced that a bread tax is unwise, impolitic, and unjust." He (Mr. Drummond) long ago endeavoured to persuade the agriculturists that they must no longer look for monopoly but for compensation—not for compensation in the way the word was used now—but that they must look for it by reductions in the cost of production. For that he had contended frequently in that House, and the right hon. Baronet the Member for Carlisle told the farmers, years ago, that they had a right to insist upon that; and the hon. Member for the West Riding had said the same thing. But he confessed that it was getting more and more impossible to remedy these evils, because in many cases the evils had remedied themselves. Still, he thought it could not be doubted, that in the mode in which the corn laws were repealed, injustice was done to the farmers, who had taken their farms on leases, and he would be sorry, therefore, if the words in question, "just, wise, and beneficial," were insisted on, because they would prevent him, and there were many like him, who would be glad to go the whole length of the proposition otherwise, but who could not agree to a Resolution which was so subject to misrepresentation. An allusion had been made in the course of the debate to the conduct of the late Sir Robert Peel; and unquestionably nothing could be more disgraceful than the language which had been used towards that right hon. Gentleman in that House and out of it; for Sir Robert Peel had been accused of what he (Mr. Drummond) did not remember any other Minister being accused of since the days of Sir Robert Walpole—that he had devised a scheme of policy for the sake of putting money into his own pockets; and when that statement was contradicted and disproved, no apology was made, either in or out of the House. Great provocation had, no doubt, been given—a party had been overthrown—a party had been betrayed; and, in his own opinion, Sir Robert Peel had inflicted an indelible blow on that House, the effects of which they were then feeling. He said it not for the sake of the men now in office, but rather for the sake of those in opposition, that Sir Robert Peel had given a blow to public confidence in public men, which the present generation would never recover. That was the cause why the whole body of able men opposite were unable to unite for any good purpose, and unless they did unite, depend upon it their power would only be used for evil. If he were in a situation where he might give advice without being liable to the charge of officiousness, he would conjure hon. Gentlemen opposite not to be nice in their choice of a leader, but to get a leader somehow, if ever they hoped to be useful to their country or to the Crown.

MR. MUNTZ said, he had been one of the earliest opponents of the Corn Laws, for in 1815 he had worked day after day, in his native town, during a whole fortnight, in obtaining signatures to petitions against the laws which were then enacted, and he had ever since opposed them, because he believed from his heart that the principle of Free Trade was a sound principle. He did not, however, intend to say that the repeal of the Corn Laws was altogether just. He knew that by such repeal injustice might be done to certain parties, but he also knew that while the Corn Laws remained, far greater injustice was done to those who could not remedy the evil, he meant to those who had no power with regard to the making of laws. He felt bound, therefore, to lend his assistance to those who could not help themselves. He had heard some very extraordinary observations made during this debate, which led him to think that hon. Gentlemen on both sides of the House had exceedingly short memories. It appeared to him that hon. Gentlemen forgot that there had ever been any prosperity in this kingdom before the present time. They talked as if the present was the first time the country had ever been in a prosperous state. He was, unfortunately, old enough to remember many instances of prosperity, when this country had, indeed, been far more prosperous than it was now. He was willing to admit that the general state of the working classes was exceedingly satisfactory, and that within the last twelve months some improvement had occurred in the profits of their masters; but the prosperity of the present day bore no comparison with that of 1834, 1835, and 1836. The wages of a large portion of the artisans of this country were at that time 50 per cent higher than they were now. In 1817 and 1818, also, there was greater prosperity than now existed. In 1823, 1824, and 1825, the country was in a still more prosperous state, and it was well known that Mr. Robinson, now Earl of Ripon, the then Chancellor of the Exchequer, was nicknamed "Prosperity Robinson," because he made a speech upon the great prosperity of the country, which fell from under his feet in the course of the very next year. In 1834, 1835, and 1836, also, the great interests of the country were in a most prosperous condition; and 1843, 1844, and 1845 were acknowledged by the then Prime Minister, and by his supporters in that House, as the most prosperous years they had known. It must be remembered, also, that in those cases, prior to the repeal of the Corn Laws, they had not only greater but more continuous prosperity, than they had now. They had then three years, and as yet they had only two. He would ask the House—"Are you sure that the existing prosperity is going to continue?" He was examined in the year 1836 before a Parliamentary Committee, and he stated that within six months of that time there would be a general panic, because the balance of trade would then have turned against this country, and would lead to an export of the precious metals. The panic commenced within a week of the time he had fixed upon. Both the Resolutions before the House alleged that the present prosperous state of the country was mainly attributable to the repeal of the Corn Laws. Now, that was not his opinion. He recollected that in 1846, 1847, and 1848, after the repeal of the Corn Laws, not only was there no prosperity in the country, but a great many of those parties who had most zealously assisted in the repeal of the Corn Laws were so much afraid that he heard numbers of them say so great a mistake was never committed before. No one was more anxious than he was that Free Trade in corn, and, in fact, the principle of Free Trade, should be maintained; but he did not believe the prosperity of the country was mainly attributable to that system. He considered that the repeal of the Corn Laws was a very proper and sound measure, and he had assisted in promoting it, but he believed the great cause of the national prosperity was one far beyond the control of man. He believed the real cause of their prosperity was to be traced to the waggonloads, and he might almost say shiploads, of gold that were now almost daily brought into this country. He had heard an hon. Member on the other side say, "Why, what good does that do to the working classes?" He (Mr. Muntz) believed nothing ever did so much good to the working classes. The rate of discount was $1\frac{1}{2}$ per cent; the Bank had 22,000,000*l.* of gold in its coffers instead of 2,000,000*l.*; the circulation was 23,000,000*l.*, instead of 17,000,000*l.* or 18,000,000*l.*; and this was the more gratifying because it was brought about naturally instead of artificially. Adam Smith stated that the discovery of the precious metals in the fifteenth century raised the price of all articles to four times their original value, and why should it not do the same now? With the exception of the term "mainly attributable," he had no objection to either of the Resolutions; but he thought it impolitic to introduce into such Resolutions words which might render it difficult for some hon. Gentlemen to swallow them. He knew very well that during the last thirteen Sessions of Parliament there had been very few men in that House who could dare to call one another names. Some remarks had been made as to what the people thought about these Resolutions and the conduct of Parliament. He would tell the House what the people thought about their conduct—the people were laughing at them. The people said, and with truth, "We are quite satisfied you can't re-enact the Corn Laws. We are satisfied the whole affair is settled, and we defy you to attempt it." Some people said, "What is to be done about the Government, for the old Tories are like a sucked orange—there is nothing left in them?" For his own part, he did not care who governed the country, so long as they governed well. He could only say that if the Government—he did not care who they might be—proposed good measures, which he believed were for the advantage of the country, they would have his support, and, if they did not, they should have his honest opposition. He would give his vote for the Amendment of the noble Member for Tiverton (Viscount Palmerston).

The MARQUESS of GRANBY: Sir, although I ventured to trespass on the House the other evening on the discussion which then arose, I hope I may be permitted to do so now for a short time in comment upon these Resolutions. I agree with the hon. Member who has just sat down, that it is impossible to approve of either Resolution; but I disagree with him so far, that I am unable to vote for either. My reasons are threefold. First, I cannot agree with the hon. Gentleman opposite that the prosperity of the country is as great now as it has been under a different, and as I think a wiser, commercial system. I admit prosperity exists, but I say it is not so great as it ought to be. In the second place, admitting prosperity, I say it is to be accounted for by other causes than those either of recent legislation or of unlimited competition. My third reason is this—supposing this prosperity to be owing to recent legislation, that this legislation is not stamped with the principle of unlimited competition. For these three reasons I find it impossible to consent to either Resolution. The hon. Member near me (Mr. Drummond) talked in a sneering way of making certain things clear to the "bucolic mind." I should be glad to know if any hon. Gentleman can enlighten the "bucolic mind" on what I am going to read. It is important for the questions which I shall put to be settled one way or other before the controversy comes to a conclusion. The facts which I shall presently refer to ought to be ascertained before we come to a decision. The questions I am going to put are these:—Colonel Torrens, in a recent statement, proved that the increase of population from 1831 to 1841 was 10 per cent, while the increase from 1841 to 1851 was only 1 per cent. Colonel Torrens also proved there was a commensurate extension of the agricultural interests in the previous years, and in the latter years a corresponding decline. Let these questions be settled before the House decides upon the Resolutions before it. Further, these assertions have been made and not contradicted, that there is a decrease in the production of wheat in Ireland and England of not less than 4,700,000 quarters; and I do think we ought to know whether this is the fact or not, and I hope Her Majesty's Government will make some arrangements, so as to be able to ascertain the truth of the assertion one way or other. We have tables for Ireland which we know show a decrease in wheat of 2,000,000 quarters and upwards; and so far as we can get at the English production, we have reason to believe there is also a great decrease; but there are no tables to show it. It is of great importance to have the question fairly settled. I think no man will say there is no danger of war between this country and a foreign Power. I hope sincerely there is no danger of such a kind; but the House has wisely decided that we shall be prepared for such a contingency. We have called out the militia—a measure which the House would never have sanctioned had it thought there was no danger, and that they were not likely to be called upon to defend our shores. The hon. Member for Manchester the other evening alluded to myself as being a subscriber to the translation of a speech by M. Thiers. I was in great hopes the hon. Member was going to make some quotation from that able speech; but not having done so, if he will allow me, I will do so instead. M. Thiers says, speaking of the repeal of the corn laws—

"I do not hesitate, notwithstanding the glorious and just fame of Sir Robert Peel, to say that there was in the measure to which he has attached his name a temerity which, in some respects, must be considered as an imprudence. England at this time is obliged to take from abroad one-third part of her consumption of wheat, namely, 30,000,000 of hectolitres. These supplies being conveyed by vessels of 200 to 300 tons, require from 8,000 to 10,000 vessels. It is true that the same vessels make the voyage several times, which reduce the number to 2,000 to 3,000 vessels plying constantly on the seas. England has said, 'I am mistress of the seas.' It is true, that if we look into the history of the present century, we find that while victory, for a time at least, accompanied us constantly on the Continent; at sea, on the contrary, in spite of the heroism of our men, everything was misfortune. I know that in her last struggle with us England conquered; but it is also known of what formidable navigators Napoleon foresaw the future destiny when abandoning Louisiana to the United States, he said to M. Marbois, 'I may, perhaps, be conquered, but I prepare my revenge.' I know well what will happen; at the present time in England they are turning much land into pasture; they will hasten to grow corn again on this land, but at what price? they provide bread for the English people at present at a very low price ; I do not deny it ; but suppose a war. Although England should remain mistress of the field of battle, the charge for insurance alone will raise the price of bread in time of war, just as it raises the price of sugar. Then that nation will see in a few days bread doubled, and perhaps, trebled, in price ; whatever they may say, this is a future which no prudent nation ought to defy."

Now, this was the opinion of a Frenchman—not of an English landlord who wishes to raise his rent and have a protecting duty on corn for his own immediate purposes—and, therefore, entitled to some weight. We must also remember, that in the great man whose remains we lately conveyed with so much honour to their resting-place, we lost more than an army. I beg the House to consider that it is necessary to have some information as to the assertion of the diminished quantity of wheat, as to price, and as to land going out of cultivation. It appears from Colonel Torrens' abstract that the increase of real property between 1815 and 1843 has been 58 per cent, while from 1843 to 1850 it has only been 10 per cent. That personal property from 1815 to 1843 increased 37 per cent, but actually declined 5 per cent between 1843 and 1850 ; that our exports from 1831 to 1841 had increased 35 per cent ; but from 1841 to 1851 only 23 per cent ; and that our imports of raw materials, and the consumption of wool had not increased nearly so much in the latter period as in the former. I do not ask the House whether, considering all the improvements which have taken place—considering the energy and enterprise which have been elicited—considering the advantages we now have in the inventions of machinery—in the inventions for bringing out the wonderful power of steam by land and by sea—I say, considering all these circumstances, and all the advances of the age in inventions and science, am I not entitled to ask if we are not, in point of fact, in a stationary state, rather than in that state of progress we are entitled to expect ? I will now proceed to my second reason why I cannot support the Resolutions. I admit the prosperity of the working classes ; but I am anxious for truth, and the whole truth, to be shown to the House. I cannot accept the speech of the mover of the Resolution as stating the whole truth. That hon. Gentleman, in his very able speech, argued the question as though the basis of the wages of labour remained the same. He taunted Lord Derby for venturing to say that the wages of labour had declined with the price of food. He went on to tell the House of the advantages the people had derived from the cheapness of food, always supposing wages to be the same. He took the price of corn at 70s. at one time, and at the other time 48s., and argued that the labouring classes had benefited by the difference. I do not think it was quite fair putting the price at 70s., for that is an extraordinary and exceptional price, and not naturally the result of the corn laws. But take the price as the hon. Member stated it, and I will show that the labourers of Cambridgeshire and Leicestershire are not better, nor so well, off by recent legislation as they were before. I think the hon. Member said the result of legislation had been to cheapen the principal articles of consumption to the poor man to the extent of putting into his pocket 2*l.* 10*s.* yearly. The hon. Gentleman enumerated four principal articles which entered mainly into the food of the poor man—such as bread, sugar, coffee, and tea. Now, wages in Cambridgeshire, since free trade, had been reduced from 11*s.* to 9*s.* ; in Leicestershire, from 12*s.* to 10*s.*—that is, a reduction of 2*s.* per week has been made in wages, which amounts to 5*l.* 4*s.* in the year. I do not ask the House, in taking the hon. Member's own calculation of the saving to the labouring man, and my statement of the reduction in wages, to say whether they think that the reduction in other articles has been sufficiently great to make the labouring man better off now than before. In Cambridgeshire they say they are a little better off, but in Leicestershire they are not so well off. This brings me to another point, to which I beg to call the attention of the hon. Member for the West Riding. It is said that, in endeavouring to meet foreign competition, manufacturers have been obliged to produce articles so worthless that they do not last half so long as those formerly produced when they enjoyed protection. If you visit the labourers' cottages the complaint of the wives now is, that cotton gowns were cheaper, but they lasted so short a time that they gained nothing by cheapness. I call the attention of the hon. Member for the West Riding to the fact, in the hope the manufacturers will meet competition by other measures than that of reducing the value and quality of their articles. I admit fully that the labouring classes generally are better off than they were ; but I say they owe that advantage, not mainly to the cheapness of food, but to other circumstances. In all sciences there is nothing so difficult to discover as the true causes of special effects, and in politics especially this is more than commonly the case, because of the party heat and passions of those who discuss these questions. I ask the House to bear with me while I endeavour to discover the source of the prosperity of the working classes. The hon. Member for Birmingham (Mr. Muntz) has spoken of the vast supply of precious metals which has poured into this country. I take that to be one of the causes of prosperity. In five years 85,000,000*l.* has been added to the currency of the world, which was before estimated to amount to about 450,000,000*l.* Thus 21 per cent has been added to the total currency of the world. Adam Smith says that an increase of 20 per cent in any article will reduce its price 50 per cent, and yet the hon. Gentlemen opposite say the late increase of the precious metals has had no effect on the price of money and other articles. Let us consider what was the amount of specie in the Bank of England for the last nine months :—

On January 2nd it was.....	£17,000,000
On March 27th	19,000,000
On June 26th	21,000,000
On September 26th	21,000,000
On November 13th	20,000,000

You will perceive that in September it was 21,000,000*l.*, whereas on November 13th it was 20,000,000*l.* Now, during this period there was imported into this country 4,000,000,000*l.* of gold and silver by the West India steamers, 2,500,000*l.* from America, and 5,000,000*l.* from Australia, making a total, in six months, of no less than 11,000,000*l.* of gold imported into this country; and yet we find there was no material increase of specie in the Bank of England all that time, clearly showing that gold had gone out of the country to pay for articles imported—and showing that if it had not been for the large importation of gold you would have had a return again of the panic and misery of 1847—and this has taken place under the operations of your boasted free-trade measures. I am therefore entitled to say, had it not been for the opportune discovery of gold, your free-trade measures must have proved a decided failure. I come now to the emigration, as the second great cause of prosperity. There have been for five years no less than 312,000 persons who have annually left their homes, left this country, for a country in which their labour is protected. The hon. Member for Manchester denied that fact; but can any one suppose that this large emigration has not benefited the labourer, by rendering the competition for labour less severe, and by making fewer the number of hands wanting labour: and can any one suppose, that if it were not for emigration, that wages would have kept up as they have done? Let the House still further recollect, that in addition to the relief of pressure on the labour market, by the number of persons who have emigrated, each emigrant lays out a considerable sum of money on his outfit. The third-class emigrants' outfit is calculated to be not less than 5*l.* 10*s.* The fact is, the emigrant spends the hard earnings of a life in a single week. Multiply the sum of 5*l.* 10*s.* by the number of emigrants, and you will find that near 2,000,000*l.* sterling has been spent on the outfit of emigrants alone. Then look at the loss this country is sustaining by emigration. We are told, and told truly, that the people emigrating are not of the lower classes; but that many of the wealthier classes are leaving the country. It is no very high estimate to say that each spends 40*l.* out of the country. That would amount to 12,500,000*l.* taken away from the country; which, capitalised, would show a sum of 374,000,000*l.* withdrawn from this country. The prosperity which exists I place to gold and to emigration. I believe these are the main causes of the present prosperity—speaking generally—of the industrious classes. The quotations made by the hon. Member for Manchester, who included one of mine among other hustings speeches which he cited, place me in a very intelligible position, though my language might not have been very Parliamentary: “He would ride the horse Protection so long as he was fit to go out with, but when not fit he would take the beast of burden as far as it would carry him.” I am obliged to the hon. Member for quoting the passage, and shall not disavow it. I have endeavoured to explain the reasons why I cannot vote for either of the Resolutions proposed. I agree with an hon. Gentleman opposite who spoke this evening in thinking that the whole thing is a hocus-pocus. The Resolution is the hocus, and the Amendment the pocus. I have now endeavoured to explain to the House the course I feel it my duty to take on the present occasion. I shall vote against the Resolution of the hon. Member for Wolverhampton, and I shall also vote against the Motion of the noble Lord the Member for Tiverton.

CAPTAIN FITZROY said, he begged the attention of the House while he explained the reasons for the course he felt himself imperatively called upon to pursue on the present occasion. It appeared to him that the course which an independent Member must take on the present occasion was one of very considerable difficulty. It appeared to him extremely difficult to pursue any course in a manner at once satisfactory to his own conscience, satisfactory to the public who were much interested in this question, and satisfactory also to his position in that House, where friendly associations, if not party ties, more or less surrounded every man. With respect to the different propositions now submitted to them, he should be ready, and he should be most anxious, to accept the Amendment moved by the noble Lord the Member for Tiverton (Viscount Palmerston), as affording to the principle they were so anxious to secure all the security that could be given to it by a Resolution of that House. But the case unfortunately was not submitted to the House in a manner that would allow him to express his free opinion with respect to the vote he was about to give on the abstract merits of the question. The Amendment did not present itself to him in the shape of an abstract Motion, to which he could say aye or no; but it was preceded by a Resolution which embarrassed extremely the course he had to pursue. He was anxious that the hon. Gentleman (Mr. C. Villiers) who had brought forward the original Resolution should feel himself justified even now in withdrawing it from the notice of the House. He would earnestly entreat him, in order to secure the unanimity which it was so important for them to arrive at, if it could be consistent with his sense of duty to the public, to withdraw that Resolution, which could only act as a bone of contention between parties who had one common object in view. But he could only ask himself what course he was to pursue, so as to place his own character in a satisfactory light to those who had sent him to that House? The only distinction that existed between the Resolution and the Amendment consisted in the three words which asserted the policy of Sir Robert Peel to have been "just, wise, and beneficial." Before he addressed himself to the reasons that induced him to give his support to that proposition, he would state his reasons for thinking that one or two extraneous matters had been introduced into this discussion which were hardly worthy of the occasion on which they had been brought forward. It had been stated by some hon. Gentlemen opposite that the present vote was one of want of confidence. As far as he was concerned, most unequivocally and most decidedly he entertained no such opinion, and he thought the Ministry arrogated to themselves a position they were not entitled to hold, when they assumed that a Resolution under any circumstances, in the present conjuncture, could be brought in the shape of want of confidence. Votes of want of confidence were directed against Administrations whose policy was well recognised, and whose principles were intelligible. If Parliament disapproved of their policy, after placing them in repeated minorities, it was usual to proceed to record a vote of want of confidence. But when they looked at the manner in which the present Government had arrived at office, and at those admissions which the right hon. Chancellor of the Exchequer had most carefully, studiously, and diligently made, that they held no principles at all, that the Government was formed on no principle, and that it assumed the functions of the Executive to bow to the dictates of the Legislature, then he said this Government was not justified in arrogating such a high position as to talk of votes of want of confidence. When it was inconvenient to discuss abstract propositions, it was convenient to distract attention by such an assertion; but he begged to tell them, and he believed he expressed the feelings of the majority on that side of the House, there was no such feeling in the course he was about to take. It was said that the words to which the Government objected were hurtful to the feelings of hon. and right hon. Gentlemen opposite. He would not wilfully do anything to hurt the feelings of any man in or out of the House; but it appeared to him they should lower the dignity of the cause they were advocating if they were guided by considerations of what feelings they might or might not hurt. He must say it came with an ill grace from hon. and right hon. Gentlemen opposite to be so susceptible of their own feelings, when it was remembered how little the feelings of at least one party in that House had been consulted during the last six years. These were extraneous matters. The question was simply whether they would maintain that the policy of Sir Robert Peel was wise, just, and beneficial. He had only one prominent duty to perform, for which he had been sent to that House, and that was, to endeavour to render that policy as secure and unshakeable as any Resolutions of that House could make it. And although he had listened with great delight to the eloquent appeal of the right hon. Member for South Wiltshire (Mr. S. Herbert), who said that the memory of Sir Robert Peel required no better tribute than the adhesion of a majority to his policy, he (Captain Fitzroy) felt that it was a matter of personal consideration, and, having enjoyed the confidence of that great man, he should be wanting in respect to his memory—if the hon. Member for Wolverhampton should persist in his Resolution—if he (Captain Fitzroy) should shrink from asserting by his vote that his policy was just, wise, and beneficial. The question he had to ask himself was, is this policy just, wise, and beneficial? If it be so, as you—the Government—have decided by the adoption of it, why should he shrink from declaring it to be so? He was induced to vote for the Motion of the hon. Member for Wolverhampton by one other consideration, which he thought ought to have some weight with other hon. Members. The public out of doors could not attempt to follow Members within doors in all those tedious windings, intricate mazes, and subtle distinctions, which were, by some means or other, devised in order to prevent a clear, intelligible Resolution being placed on the books of the House, declaring aye or no in favour of the proposition. The public would look with great doubt, embarrassment, and difficulty on the course of proceeding with reference to the Resolutions. There was first the Motion of the hon. Member for Wolverhampton, which was applicable to the great majority of Free Traders; next, the Amendment proposed by the Government, who, certainly, in their character of Free Traders, could not expect that the public would have much confidence in them; and then that Amendment was withdrawn for the purpose of substituting another, which had been purposely framed by the noble Lord the Member for Tiverton; and at the present moment the result was that the people out of doors were fairly and completely puzzled. Under these circumstances, the most natural course for the public to take, with the view of forming a correct judgment on the merits of the several Resolutions, was to ask who the men were who proposed them. They would say, “Show us the authors of the Resolutions, and we will tell you as to the sincerity of their intentions.” He could not forget the last few words of Sir Robert Peel, when he made his last appearance on the benches opposite—those memorable words, which had been or were to be inscribed on the pedestal that was erected to his memory by the grateful working classes of Britain—he could not forget that memorable occasion, at once of triumph and disaster, when foreign nations saw the most popular and powerful Minister in England for years hurled from his seat by a combination of the very men who were now pretending to cavil at the combination of different sections on the Opposition side of the House—he could not forget that moment when Sir Robert Peel attributed to the hon. Member for the West Riding (Mr. Cobden) the real authorship and the real conduct of the Free-Trade policy. He stated in unequivocal terms that its success was mainly owing to the “unadorned eloquence” of that hon. Member. [Laughter.] Hon. Gentlemen opposite might disapprove of that observation, but of this he was sure, that they would always support the justice of the sentiment—

He was convinced that no man in the House would rob any one of the political justice which was due to him. Seeing, then, that the right hon. Gentleman, under whose leadership he (Captain Fitzroy) had placed himself up to the last moment of his public life, gave the hon. Member for the West Riding the full credit for having been the successful originator of the policy, he could not but think that the public would view with suspicion the conduct of hon. Members on those (the Opposition) benches, if they refused to support a Resolution which was introduced by those who had been the earliest, and were now the successful advocates of that policy, and gave their votes in favour of an Amendment which, at all events, had been brought forward by far more recent and suspicious converts to Free Trade. It was upon those grounds, and because he felt he owed a debt of gratitude to the distinguished man whose policy he now defended, and in order that his conduct might appear before the public without chance of misconstruction or mistake, that he intended most decidedly to give his vote in favour of the proposition of the hon. Member for Wolverhampton.

MR. KENDALL said, that notwithstanding the sneers that had been cast by hon. Members opposite on protection, he was anxious, indeed the more anxious on that account, as a Protectionist Member, to declare his adhesion to its principles, and to add, that nothing he had heard (and what had one not heard since Parliament had met?) had changed his convictions; and further, that it was his belief that, unless circumstances apart from free trade prevented it, before many years passed the probability was, that the working classes themselves would, in self-defence, demand an import duty on corn, and that there would be a still more clamorous party for the same—he meant hon. Gentlemen opposite, who now represented the manufacturing interest. He rose principally to record that sentiment. He would not, however, for one moment be supposed to have a lurking wish that any import duty upon corn, either directly or indirectly, should be attempted. An appeal had been made to the country, and the verdict had been most decided; and he would simply ask, whether the country Gentlemen could have met their defeat with better feeling? There had been no question raised as to the manner in which that verdict had been obtained; but it might have been. There had been no counter-charge of farmers deluded; but there might have been. There had been a quiet submission to a victory gained. Why, then, insult them by those three words, so properly designated “odious?” for there was, to use the phrasology of hon. Gentlemen opposite, “no more odious dose for an honest country gentleman to swallow than a sentiment not his own.” Hon. Gentlemen opposite forgot, or seemed to forget, the difference between an agreement as to what was the opinion of the country, and in adopting that opinion as one’s own. Though an ultra-Protectionist—one who had sacrificed comfort, and even private friendship, to its principle—he, for one, fully acquiesced in the opinion that the country at large adopted the other principle of free trade, and that it would be madness to oppose it; and that, the question once settled, it was the duty of every man in that House to carry out that principle. Why should more be required? He must, then, decidedly oppose the Resolution of the hon. Member for Wolverhampton. Nor could he have supported the Amendment of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, nor could he its substitute, though he believed, without loss of honour, principle, or even the slightest consistency, he should be able fully to support Her Majesty’s Ministers; but, as his own experience, and that was very considerable, in a densely-populated neighbourhood, told him that the prosperity, which was great, was not mainly attributable to free trade, he could not subscribe to those words. He did not deny that free trade was an adjunct now, but, till other circumstances arose, it was a dead letter. He did not speak of a district, he spoke of a division of a county; and what held good for a part, held good for the whole; so that he was bold to say that one of the counties of England—Cornwall—did not owe its now rampant prosperity mainly to free trade. If he was wrong, let the Members of the Western division on the opposite side set him right. It could not be denied that in 1850 (say this time two years) the Act of 1846 was in full force, and that corn was cheaper than at present. If, then, he stated that about two years since there was want of employment in Cornwall, both as regarded its mines and its agriculture, and if he showed that poverty existed then, and that it continued to exist till circumstances foreign to free trade came into play, he should make out his case—namely, that free trade had not mainly contributed to the great prosperity that existed. Now, what had brought about the change as regarded the agriculturists? A few years since, when there was great distress, emigration commenced, and the accounts had been so favourable that thousands—many of their ablest and steadiest labourers—had quitted our shores, and the consequence had been, that these men, whom the farmers would hardly look at, were now in request, and not only in request, but at advanced wages. Cheap bread was a great adjunct to their comfort, but not the main cause of it. Again, as to the miner. Two years since, many were unemployed, and the wages very low. The price of metal was at 90*l.* per ton; foreign mines were pouring their ores into England, and their metals into our foreign markets—suddenly there was a discovery of gold, and he alluded especially to Australia; the copper mines there were deserted. There was no Australian copper to compete with our copper, but Australian gold to enhance its value. Metal was now 130*l.* per ton; higher by far than for twenty years. Miners were in request; wages were very high. Cheap bread was an adjunct to their comfort, but not the main cause of it. Had he not, then, made out his case? Still free trade, it was acknowledged, must now be the principle; and since hon. Gentlemen opposite had all they wished for, and more than they expected, and since, as he hoped, they would have all the assistance from his side of the House in furthering their views, he trusted they would not only not oppose, but generously and humanely assist in carrying out such measures of the Government as might relieve the agricultural classes, whose patience under their sufferings made them the more worthy of every consideration.

MR. BLACKETT said, he wished as a new Member to state the reasons which induced him to vote for the original Motion of the hon. Gentleman the Member for Wolverhampton (Mr. C. Villiers), rather than for the Amendment of the noble Lord (Viscount Palmerston). The main ground on which that Amendment was recommended to the consideration of the Free Trade party was, that it was highly desirable that any Motion embodying the sanction of the House to the Free Trade principle should not be defeated, or be carried merely by a small majority. With regard to the possibility of a defeat, that did not fill him with any serious apprehensions; on the contrary, he thought that such an event would be attended with one or two very compensating results. It would put the Free Traders completely on the alert, and prevent them from being lulled into a state of false security, and prepare them to meet their opponents at future elections. Supposing the Motion should be carried by a small majority, he certainly should be sorry for it; but there was one thing which he should be still more sorry for, and that was, to see the Motion carried by a sham majority. And this led him to ask what was the true object of the Motion? The right hon. Gentleman the Member for South Wiltshire (Mr. S. Herbert), had laid it down that the object of the Resolution was to obtain as large a majority as possible. With all submission to the right hon. Gentleman, he (Mr. Blackett) was of opinion that the true object of the Resolution was to enable the people of this country to ascertain who were true Free Traders, and who were insincere professors of that policy. He must believe the evidence of his own eyes and ears, and he could not, even by the utmost stretch of courtesy, conceive it possible that men could be equally sincere in the advocacy of two directly opposite propositions. At the election for North Northumberland, to which the right hon. Baronet the Member for Carlisle (Sir J. Graham) had last night referred, the noble Lords who were elected

—though they did not profess themselves willing to restore a duty on corn—yet they succeeded in creating an impression that the establishment of Free Trade in the abstract would be the special object of their hostility. Yet, now they had the right hon. Chancellor of the Exchequer recommending this system to their favourable consideration under the gentle alias of “unrestricted competition.” The noble Lords in question attributed the prosperity of the country to the same causes as those referred to by the noble Lord the Member for North Leicestershire (the Marquess of Granby), and they had certainly created an impression among the farmers that they would, if returned to Parliament, attempt to modify, and, if possible, to cripple that very system of Free Trade which the Amendment now before the House called on the Government to develop to its fullest extent. He believed that the noble Lords he had alluded to were Protectionists at heart, and, therefore, he called upon the Free Traders to look about for some more stringent test than was to be found in so vague a Resolution as that proposed by the noble Lord (Viscount Palmerston). The three odious epithets, as they had been called, were only capable of being accepted by a true Free Trader. It was that circumstance which recommended those three epithets to his mind, and, therefore, he should cordially support the Resolution of the hon. Member for Wolverhampton.

COLONEL SIBTHORP said, he would not detain the House long. He was anxious, however, to express fairly and freely what his opinions were. First of all, he begged to avow that he was still a Protectionist. He was ready to vote for any proposition for the reimposition of a duty on foreign corn, and to put a duty on all foreign articles imported into this country which interfered with the industry of the people. As to the Resolutions just now before them, he could only say he looked with great caution and with great suspicion on everything which emanated from either one side of the House or from the other.

He had found it the best course always to see well and consider before he gave his assent to any proposition, and, above all, to look well to the motives of the man who made it. He never liked to leap in the dark. The position in which the House was placed was like that of certain criminals who were buried at the meeting of three crossroads. He had no wish to be buried in any crossroad, but wanted to take a straightforward, plain, honest course. The hon. Member for Wolverhampton (Mr. C. Villiers) had ever been consistent, and had always pursued an honourable course; but, when he called on him (Col. Sibthorp) to say the measure of 1846 was "wise, just, and beneficial," he must at once tell the hon. Member he did not consider that measure was worthy of his sanction or support. It was painful to wound the feelings of any one, and he could have wished that there had been less allusion made in the course of that debate to a great statesman now no more. He had had the honour of enjoying that statesman's friendship, and, he might say, his hospitality, and at one time he thought Sir Robert Peel was the only man who could really save the country; but the measure of 1846 had completely changed his (Col. Sibthorp's) opinion on that point. He denied the prosperity these measures were said to have produced. Let them go to the farmer, the tradesman, the labourer, and ask each of them what he had been and what he was now, and they would soon find out the truth. Why, half of the farmers were on the parish. And then they talked of emigration as a means of improving the country! Did any one ever hear of improving a country by sending the people out of it? When all classes had been injured by these free-trade measures, as they were called, and when nothing else could be done to ruin them, they had got up the Great Exhibition. Talk about the good effects of that display! He affirmed that one effect of it was that there never was more disease in the metropolis than ever since. The noble Lord's Resolution was a trap to catch the unwary, but he had not been caught in it yet. He believed the day would come when those who advocated the cause of Free Trade would admit with sorrow that they never were more mistaken in their lives. For himself he should walk out of the House, for he would not vote for either of their Resolutions. He would not do anything to place his countrymen in the power of those whom he looked on as plunderers and robbers from the beginning, and who would first rob us of our trade and of our independence, and then rob us of our honour—males and females. In the meantime he would wait patiently, and see what the wonderful promised measures of Her Majesty's Government were; he would look before he leaped.

MR. WARNER said, he had no wish to press himself on the attention and patience of the House after so long a debate, but as the representative of a very large constituency (Norwich), who were deeply interested in the matter in question, he felt that he should not be doing his duty if he did not, though a new Member, give to the House some of those reasons which induced him to support the Resolutions, characterised, as he understood, by the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer as odious, insulting, and factious. If he could for a moment believe that the Resolutions were brought forward in a factious spirit, with any intention of embarrassing a new Government in a new House of Commons, with any intention of depriving Ministers of that full and fair hearing which was the birth-right of Englishmen, he would never give them his support. But it had been satisfactorily shown by those who supported these Resolutions that they were not advocating the cause of a party, but of a policy, not seeking to strike at the stability of a Cabinet, but to consolidate the broad foundation of the commercial prosperity of an empire. He thought it had been triumphantly established by hon. Members on his side of the House, that these Resolutions were, like the policy of 1846 itself, wise, just, and beneficial; and it had been proved with equal success on the other side of the House, that some such Resolutions as these were necessary to the peace of the country, and to the reputation of the House for consistency. He did not consider that this was a question of confidence or no confidence in Ministers, and he regretted that the Chancellor of the Exchequer had thought fit to view it in this light. He believed that the House had a duty to perform, which was paramount to all considerations of party politics, which would cast into the shade of insignificance the destinies of a Ministry, or even, if it must be so, the untimely fate of an embryo policy. It was well known that delusive hopes were cherished by large numbers of the agricultural population of the country—hopes that Parliament was going to do something for them to relieve them from the necessity of depending for success, like the rest of the world, solely on their own energies and their own resources. These delusions were diligently propagated by the hundred Protection societies, whose continued existence and activity were attested by Mr. Paul Fosskett; they were aggravated by the hustings speeches of hon. Gentlemen opposite, by the oracular declarations of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, and by the words which he had put into the Speech from the Throne. It was the duty of this House to dispel these false and fatal delusions, to terminate the war of classes, the antagonism between the commercial and territorial interests of the country, and to affirm the great principle of its future legislation in terms which no farmer should misunderstand, and no farmers' friend should mystify. He did wish that the Resolution could have been so framed as to answer this great end, and yet be pleasing to all sides of the House. But he found from the debate that this was impossible, and therefore, without any factious motive, not wishing to do what might be odious to hon. Gentlemen opposite, and least of all wishing to wound the feelings or insult the consciences of others, he found himself compelled to vote with the hon. and learned Member for Wolverhampton.

SIR JAMES GRAHAM: Sir, I presume that the House, which has now been debating for several nights a question mainly turning on the use of words, must be anxious that the discussion should draw to a close. I am the more ready to promise not to occupy long the attention of the House, because I have already, almost unwarrantably, trespassed on the indulgence of the House—strictly within the rules, still in a manner I should blame, if I had not thought it called for by the peculiar circumstances. The hon. Member for East Cornwall (Mr. Kendall) has made an observation, on which I would wish to say one word. He says nothing is so painful to a man as to have to swallow the opinions of others. But I must also tell him there is something not very agreeable in having your own words, on which a Motion has been founded, suddenly brought up and forced upon you when you least expect it. A great deal has been said in the course of the debate to young Members, and to "old stagers." I am afraid I must class myself in the latter category, and, speaking to those young Members, I must give them one piece of advice, the result of my recent experience. Every one knows there is nothing so foolish as to write a book or a pamphlet, but it is still more foolish to put on paper the words of a Motion for which you are not responsible, and which you do not mean to move yourself. What is still worse, is to try to frame a Motion, which shall please everybody; it generally ends in satisfying no one; and perhaps the predicament in which I stand this evening may be a warning to others for the future. I wish to state to the House that the result of this discussion has been very painful to me. I framed the original Amendment. With parental fondness I regretted the loss of important words, which were left out of it; and many arguments urged in its support have been of the most repulsive character. The right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer, complaining of the epithets in the original Motion, namely, that the repeal of the Corn Law of 1842 was a "wise, just, and beneficial" measure, designated these epithets as odious. Now, if any epithets are to be applied to that measure, in my humble judgment the English language supplies none so apposite as those in the original Motion. But the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary for the Colonies went the length of saying that he demurred to the proposition that the measure was wise, just, or beneficial, when, to my astonishment, I find in the Amendment, to which I am given to understand the Government are parties, and which we are now discussing, the words—

"That the improved condition of the country, and especially of the industrious classes, is mainly the result of recent legislation, which has established the principle of unrestricted competition, has abolished taxes imposed for the purposes of protection, and has thereby diminished the cost and increased the abundance of the principal articles of food of the people."

Am I wrong? Did I not understand the right hon. Gentleman to make some reservation last night with respect to sugar? [Sir JOHN PAKINGTON made an observation which was inaudible in the gallery.] Is not sugar part of the food of the people? Is not the principle of unrestricted competition embodied in the descending scale of duties, in progress of being carried out in the case of foreign and British-grown sugar? I do not wish to refer to speeches made at elections; but the right hon. Baronet did, on the hustings, refer very roughly to what I had said as to Government having risen to power by the ladder of protection, and then having thrown it down, when they had risen to the "giddy height," being content to remain in power by discarding the principle by the aid of which they had obtained it. The right

hon. Baronet then gave that statement an unqualified denial; and he further added, that with respect to the sugar question he retained all the opinions he had ever expressed. He declared that he believed the West India Colonies had been ruined, and had been most unjustly treated by the removal of protective duties, and that he retained that opinion as strongly as ever. The House would remember what took place in June last. The descending scale of duties was about to come into operation on the 1st of July, and the right hon. Baronet stated he had changed no opinions on that subject, and that it was only his inability, arising from his being in a hopeless minority, which restrained him from making the attempt to restore those duties. Now, if he retains his opinion, why does he not avow his intention to adhere to his policy, and to do that which he believes to be just? How can he vote for the Amendment of the noble Lord the Member for Tiverton (Viscount Palmerston) if he sincerely retains his opinions? It has been said by an able writer, in an interesting work, that sugar is a charm to youth, that it soothes old age, but that in political matters it has a dangerous tendency, and is apt to produce disaster. I also remember that in the work from which I am now quoting—a work of political biography, there is a most graphic description of what took place with reference to this very question of the West Indian Colonies. It appears that the West Indian interest did not take a very decided part in resisting in 1846 the repeal of the Corn Laws, and a proposition was made to the late Lord George Bentinck, that in consequence of their having failed to aid the Protectionist Opposition, he should be a party to no longer supporting the protection which the West Indies enjoyed. What said the noble Lord in reply? With a signal shake of the head, with a flash of that beaming eye, and with a curl of that scornful lip, he made these observations: He said, “No! we exist only by our principles; we are not Privy Councillors, but we are honest men; we must stand by our principles, and we must protect the West Indian interest.” Now, Sir, observe, the Gentlemen opposite are Privy Councillors, and they have abandoned the principle of protection. But I do not draw the inference—I should be unjust in the extreme if I did—I am not prepared to say that this change of opinion on the part of right hon. and hon. Gentlemen, those I see on the

Treasury bench, is to be regarded as a dishonest change. I remember the speech of the noble Lord the Member for Tiverton, an admirable speech, on the second reading of the Bill for the repeal of the Corn Laws in 1846, in which, in his own most powerful manner, and with the utmost succinctness and brevity, he stated the whole case, as it appeared to me, in favour of free trade, with extraordinary clearness and great eloquence. I dissented, certainly, from one passage in the noble Lord's speech, in which he advocated a fixed duty on corn; but there was a passage in it which bears on the point to which I was referring, and which I will take the liberty of repeating to the House. I will not answer for the exact words, but this is the substance of his remarks: The noble Lord said (and long experience had made him wise), “if the force of circumstances should ever place those Gentlemen,” including Lord George Bentinck and those who acted most strenuously with him, “on the Treasury bench, I am satisfied that six months will not elapse before their opinions will undergo great change and modification.” Something was said about fever, and the noble Lord added, “There are certain climates which are specifics for certain diseases. Take any Protectionist; let the fever, or the type of it which besets him, be as malignant and inflammatory as you please; place him in Downing-street, and I will undertake to say that there will be a speedy and permanent cure.” [Sec 3 Hansard, lxxxvi. 255.] I remember when the late Mr. Porter, whose loss I most sincerely deplore, was at the Board of Trade, it was always said that his accounts were cooked and prepared. Hon. Gentlemen opposite could hardly believe it possible that our exports had increased to 70,000,000*l.*, our imports to 100,000,000*l.* Sugar has been mentioned, and, with regard to that article, they thought it hardly possible that while the duty was diminished by 100 per cent, the quantity imported should have increased by one-third; that the retail price should have fallen one-half, and that all this time the revenue from sugar should not be decreased, but augmented. All these things then seemed incredible to hon. Gentlemen opposite, but now there is my right hon. Friend the Member for the county of Oxford (Mr. Henley) at the Board of Trade. He is a man whom I know to be very capable of sifting facts and figures, while as President of the Board he is responsible for these documents, and I am certain that he has verified the facts which were before shown by the Returns, and that he believes fully what he authenticates by his signature as to the state of the country, and what is asserted in this Resolution, which affirms broadly and openly the principle of free-trade, as opposed to protection. There is another point upon which I desire to make an observation or two. The right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer commented last night, rather unadvisedly as I thought, upon the use of the word "compensation," imputed to him, and said that he was not aware that anywhere, except at hustings or elections, that word had ever been used by him; that, probably, we might find it by hunting among election speeches, but that in the House no such term could be adduced as having fallen from him. We might look at the right hon. Gentleman's speech at Aylesbury, but, without being disposed to go word-catching at this time of night, and at this period of the debate, I may express my surprise when I heard, in that able speech made last evening by the hon. Member for Middlesex (Mr. B. Osborne), without ranging through the pages of Hansard, this passage, attributed to the right hon. Gentleman, who, as I thought, most unequivocally denied the use of the word "compensation." On the 14th of May, 1850, the right hon. Gentleman, I believe, seconded a Motion made by Mr. Grantley Berkeley for an alteration in the Corn Laws, and said upon that occasion:—

"I ask you to protect the rights and interests of labour generally; in the first place by allowing no free imports from countries which meet you with countervailing duties; and, in the second place, with respect to agricultural produce,"—to do what?—"to compensate the soil for the burdens from which other classes are free, by an equivalent duty." [3 Hansard, cxi. 86.]

Now, Sir, a good deal has been said about bowing to public opinion. I would first of all observe, that I do not think the repeal of the corn laws was carried by "bowing." In the next place, with reference to the use of strong language, those who supported that repeal were not always treated with exemplary courtesy in Parliament, nor were the expressions used with reference to those persons exactly such as we generally use in the society of gentlemen. The hon. Member for the West Riding (Mr. Cobden) on a former occasion has referred to what he called the Christian forbearance of the friends and colleagues of the late Sir Robert Peel, and expressed somewhat his surprise that they had been so moderate in their language, so forbearing in their retaliation. Now, Sir, I said last night, and I said truly, that in framing these Resolutions I had endeavoured to do so in the spirit and in the temper in which I believe my right hon. Friend, had he been now alive, would, under present circumstances, have framed them. And, Sir, the term used by the hon. Member for the West Riding was a happy one. He used the term "Christian forbearance." Now, I knew my right hon. Friend well. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for South Wiltshire (Mr. S. Herbert) has paid to him this evening a well-deserved and eloquent tribute. Amidst all his characteristics, I should say the Christian temper and forgiveness of my right hon. Friend was that which most distinguished him. I say, also, that he always considered what, under circumstances of public emergency, it was politic to do in reference to the good of the country, and the maintenance of the cause, which he espoused. The hon. Member for West Surrey (Mr. Drummond) referred, in the course of this evening, to ancient history, as far back as the Anglo-Saxon period. I do not wish to incur the charge of pedantry by going back to a part of history still more ancient, but there is a passage in Roman history, I believe it is recorded by Livy, and commented on by Machiavelli as a masterpiece of policy, which I think is worth adducing now. I refer to that passage relative to the furcæ caudinæ, where portions of the Roman army suffered great disgrace at the hands of the Samnites, and where the question was, how they were to be treated. The first advice given was that they should be liberated. That was said not to be an expedient course; and then the question was asked, "Shall we take a middle course?" The answer was, "Exterminate them; there is no middle course of safety with reference to those who are Roman citizens." So I say with reference to this question. It is in vain to attempt with prudence in a contest like this to brand your antagonists; if you seek for security to the country, for the blessing of peace, and for the settlement of this question, you must settle it on equal terms. I do not accuse hon. Gentlemen opposite of anything unworthy in the course they now deem it their duty to take. I do not wish to stigmatize them by seeking their consent to that which their honour refuses to accept. I think it is enough to sustain this great cause by the use of words which cover all the principles for which I have contended, and for which I am ready still to contend when the measures of the Government are brought forward. There is no man in any part of the House more ready to reject the doctrine of compensation said to be due to the landed interest, and any measure of that description founded upon that claim will be resisted by me to the utmost of my power; but I have a feeling that to call upon hon. Gentlemen opposite now to declare that the repeal of the corn laws in 1846, which they so strenuously resisted, is in the abstract just, is not exactly the course we ought to take, and I am not surprised, on the whole, that they reject the original Resolution. I, for one, shall not depart from the words which I admit are verbatim et literatim what I myself prepared. It is painful for me to vote against the proposition of the hon. Member for Wolverhampton (Mr. C. Villiers), and those Gentlemen with whom on principle in this matter I entirely agree; but I should think myself unworthy of the confidence of my fellow-countrymen if I hesitated to state that which I really feel, and which I am prepared sincerely to abide by.

MR. PHILLIPS said: I was not going to enter into any discussion about the comparative merits of Protection and Free-trade, for it appeared to me that the only question before the House was, which of two Resolutions we should adopt—that of the hon. Member for Wolverhampton, or that of the noble Lord the Member for Tiverton. That as one of the new Members, or, to use the noble Lord's expression, one of the greenhorns who had lately alighted on the benches of this House, I claimed one privilege—not that of being listened to with indulgence, for that I felt sure would be accorded to me—but that of reading the Resolutions in their plain and natural sense—in the sense in which 999 men in every 1000 out of the House would understand them. If I interpreted the Resolution of the hon. Member for Wolverhampton by the meanings affixed to it by different speakers, the more one listened the less one understood. In one speaker's mouth it assumed the shape of a vote of confidence, or the contrary, in the Government; in another, that of a tribute to the memory of Sir Robert Peel; in another, that of fixing the great seal on the charter of free industry, until at last it appeared to become one vast allegory, according to the definition given of allegory by the late Mr. Thomas Hood, "putting one thing to stand for another that was not it, like a Member of Parliament standing for a county." As I had to select between the two Resolutions, I felt that with regard to one of them, that of the hon. Member for Wolverhampton, it seemed to put Members like myself somewhat in the situation of the character in Sheridan's play of the Rivals, who, when he is saying and doing nothing, is suddenly thus addressed by another gentleman: "With regard to that matter, Captain, I must beg leave to differ in opinion with you." To which the rejoinder is, "Upon my word, then, you must be a subtle disputant, because I happened just then to be expressing no opinion at all." The conversation then proceeds, "That's no reason, for, give me leave to tell you, a man may think an untruth as well as speak one." "Very true, Sir; but if a man never utters his thoughts, I should think they might stand a chance of escaping controversy." My present position may be described in a similar vein of interrogatory and answer. You are going to reimpose a tax on the bread of the people. I answer that I am not going to do any such thing. I say that the Act of 1846 was wise, just, and beneficial. What do you say to that? I reply that I have nothing to say on the subject, for I do not see that my opinion on what is passed can be of particular consequence to any one. Here, then, a contest is forced on me which I cannot decline, and I shall vote for the Resolution of the noble Lord the Member for Tiverton, because it recognises two kinds of protection, neither of which need alarm the sensitive ears of the hon. Members for Manchester and the West Riding—protection of fame that is part from being made the subject of debate, and protection of the private opinions of Members from unauthorised inquisition.

LORD JOHN RUSSELL: Sir, I now entertain the hope, from the appearance of the House, that there exists a strong desire to bring this discussion to a close to-night; and I am sure that the exhausted state of the debate would well justify us in not prolonging it so as to extend it into another week. But, Sir, I have borne too large a part in these discussions, and I have been too frequently referred to in the course of this debate, not to ask the indulgence of the House whilst I make some brief observations on the state of the question now under our consideration. My hon. Friend the Member for Wolverhampton (Mr. C. Villiers), in a speech remarkable for its great ability, but which was necessarily confined very much to the questions on which he had to treat—those questions of economical and commercial policy which have been for so many years under the consideration of Parliament—moved certain Resolutions, the first of which went to affirm the benefits which recent legislation had conferred upon this country, and especially upon the industrious classes; the second, that the extension of Free Trade, as opposed to Protection, would be the best mode of enabling the property and the industry of the country to bear the burdens to which it was exposed; and the third, that the House would be ready to take into their consideration any measures which Her Majesty's Ministers might lay on the table on these subjects. Now, Sir, if there had been anything of a party character in the speech of my hon. Friend, the right hon. Gentleman opposite the Chancellor of the Exchequer might have been justified in saying that the object of my hon. Friend's Motion was to displace the Government, and make the matter entirely a party question. But my hon. Friend gave no opportunity for any remark of that sort. His impartiality was rather the subject of comment. He said that the two Governments, past and present, had such a family likeness to each other, that he did not much care whether the Government of the day was formed from Gentlemen on this side of the House, or from Gentlemen on the other side—certainly no very strong party declaration on the part of a person who has been said to have brought forward his Resolutions solely from party motives, and with a view to the displacing of the Government. However, Sir, the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer chose to consider the question in that light, and instead of making any answer to the statements of my hon. Friend, instead of controverting any of his arguments, he entered into statements as to the conduct of the party of which he has been the leader for the last few years, and declared that it would be dishonourable for them to accept the Resolution of my hon. Friend. Now, Sir, as the right hon. Gentleman has chosen to bring that question before the House—although it was not before the House formally—I shall not refrain from making a few observations on his statements. But I think it is due to the question itself that I should state my view of the Resolutions now under consideration.

Before my hon. Friend had proposed these Resolutions, I understood they had been assented to by most of the hon. Gentlemen who have taken the lead on the great question of Free Trade. I understand, also, that my hon. Friend, acting as I think it was his duty to do, in order to conciliate all parties, had consulted various Members of this House; amongst others, the hon. Member for the West Riding (Mr. Cobden), and the hon. Member for Manchester (Mr. Bright), who had a right to be consulted; also the noble Lord the Member for Tiverton (Viscount Palmerston), the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the University of Oxford (Mr. Gladstone), and the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Carlisle (Sir J. Graham). As I understand, without professing to know their individual sentiments, my hon. Friend had the full concurrence of those hon. Members. However, my right hon. Friend the Member for Carlisle made a statement last night, with respect to another form of Resolution, of which evidently the noble Lord the Member for Tiverton had heard, and of which, "for the sake of greater accuracy," he had obtained a copy. The noble Lord, in the speech which he addressed to the House, regretted that Gentlemen on the other side of the House could not agree to the Resolutions before them, and stated various grounds for changes of opinion, and observed that the House had nothing to do with the private opinions of public men, in which remark I cannot say that I concur with him, and the noble Lord concluded by proposing certain Resolutions which appeared to please hon. Gentlemen opposite, to give them immense relief, and which seemed to be a plaster for their wounded honour. Those Resolutions, whilst relieving the minds of hon. Gentlemen opposite, caused a great division amongst hon. Members on this side of the House, who had before been united. Such being the state of the question, I have to consider what course I ought to pursue; and in the first place I must declare that both sets of Resolutions are exceedingly well framed, that both seem to me to go generally to the same object. Each is divided into three parts. Each affirms in the first place the benefits which our commercial legislation, during the last few years has conferred upon the country and upon the working classes—each affirms that it is

4,000,000*l.* of that relief is given to the landed interest. If you have, as no doubt you have had within the last ten years, 7,000,000*l.* of taxes remitted over the amount imposed, more than 2,000,000*l.* of the taxes so remitted have gone to the landed interest. And that is a remission of taxation of which no man can complain. That is a just and fair advantage, which they, being a part of the property and population of the country, highly deserve. They enjoy, with the rest of the community, that great benefit. The cost of production is rendered less, their whole industry is made more productive, and not a single manufacturer or merchant will say a word against their receiving that benefit. But if you say you will give a special relief to the landed interest, and if you say that that special relief is to be given by the two Houses of Parliament, which consist in a great measure, if not mainly, of persons who are owners of the land, you at once set up the landed interest as an object of suspicion and of envy—you are making the other classes of the country think that you are not acting fairly by the country at large, but that you show a favour and preference to one particular body. From my birth I have been connected with the great agricultural proprietors, and I trust, for the sake of the landed interest, that the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer will not in his approaching statement ask for some special favour for them, whether he calls it compensation or otherwise; but if you can remit taxes—if you can confer a benefit on the people of this country—make it large and general, but do not make it special and particular.

With respect to these conflicting Resolutions, I will take this opportunity of observing that I do not agree in the view which I understand to have been taken by the hon. Member for the West Riding (Mr. Cobden), that the word “just” shuts out all question of compensation to the landed interest for the losses which they may have sustained. I think it would certainly bar any positive claim—it would bar their saying “we are losers of so much, and are entitled to so much.” But it never would prevent a Minister from saying “the landed interest are in a state of difficulty and distress, and I propose to you to give relief to that interest.” Long before the Corn Laws were touched, I remember Chancellors of the Exchequer coming down and proposing considerable relief to the agricultural interest without reference to their having suffered losses in consequence of the Corn Laws. Nothing would be easier than to give that turn to any proposal. Although the insertion of the word “just” may seem to shut out the claim of compensation, I do not see that it effectually does so, and I do not see that there is any difference between the two sets of Resolutions on that special ground. An hon. Gentleman has adverted to the advice which we, as Ministers of the Crown, gave to the Sovereign with respect to the insertion of certain words in the Speech from the Throne last year; and it has always been represented that that Speech described the agriculturists as in a state of distress, and that Her Majesty had called the attention of Parliament to the distresses of the agricultural interest. Now, I must ask the House to listen to the terms of that Speech, and it will then see that the meaning has not been exactly represented, and that omissions have been made of very great importance. The following are the words in the Speech which Her Majesty was pleased to deliver at the opening of the Session of Parliament in 1851:—

“The State of the Commerce and Manufactures of the United Kingdom has been such as to afford general Employment to the Labouring Classes. I have to lament, however, the Difficulties which are still felt by that important Body among My People who are Owners and Occupiers of Land. But it is My confident Hope that the prosperous Condition of other Classes of My Subjects will have a favourable Effect in diminishing those Difficulties, and promoting the Interests of Agriculture.”

Now, Sir, these words were especially meant to show that the Government did not propose any particular relief for agriculture, but that it was the belief of the Government of the day that agriculture would recover from its difficulties, owing to the prosperous state of the commerce and manufactures of England; and I believe that that expectation has been completely fulfilled. My belief is that the increased consumption which has followed from your commercial legislation has been such that, with respect to many articles of farm produce, a very sufficient, not to say a high price is obtained, and, above all, that the value of the article of land has been lately very considerably enhanced, and is now of very great value in the market. A statement was made the other day by the hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General for Ireland, which showed that in Scotland the value of land had greatly improved; and only the other day an estate in Northamptonshire was sold for forty years' purchase. My belief is, that the agricultural interest is not to be taken for a distressed interest; and on that ground I shall object to any special relief on the ground pointed out.

Having stated my views with respect to these Resolutions—having stated the course which I took when I was a Minister of the Crown—I will now refer for a few moments to the speech made by the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer, in answer to the Motion of my hon. Friend (Mr. C. Villiers). The argument of the right hon. Gentleman went to show that he, and the party with whom he acts, had since the year 1846 never attempted the restoration of Protection, but that they had endeavoured to alleviate the burdens, to mitigate the distresses of certain classes whose interests it is alleged have suffered from recent legislation, without disturbing the settlement then come to. Now, Sir, that argument was very ingeniously carried out, and the right hon. Gentleman's quotations were very apposite; but the great defect was that the argument was wanting in truth. By picking out a speech made by one Member, and a statement made by another, by pointing out the conduct which he himself had pursued at various times, he seemed to afford something like a proof that the conduct of his party had been such as he described it to have been. But it is necessary to look to other facts, and some of those facts were stated last night by the hon. Member for Middlesex (Mr. B. Osborne) in a manner not very agreeable, I believe, to hon. Gentlemen opposite. There are abundance of facts all around us. Supposing every volume of Hansard to be burnt, there would remain in our memories sufficient to prove that the Protectionist party have been trying, since 1846, to restore Protection, and destroy the system of commercial policy established by Sir Robert Peel. The Duke of Richmond, a man of the highest integrity, always said, "Turn out the Ministry, get a dissolution of Parliament, and you farmers will have Protection back again." I cannot be so much surprised as my hon. Friend that the noble Duke has not lately appeared in his former prominent position. His position is a very embarrassing one. I have no doubt he made that promise to the farmers in the assurance that the Earl of Derby would fulfil it; and it must be a great mortification to him to find that he has unintentionally been the means of deceiving a great body of his fellow-countrymen. But beyond what passed at these meetings, the Protectionist speeches made during the elections showed that many hon. Gentlemen opposite were fully persuaded that they could restore Protection. What did the hon. Member for Dorsetshire (Mr. K. Seymour) say? He said that the Protectionists were divided into three classes. The first class is composed of those who think that protection can never be restored; the second of those who imagine that it may be restored in time; and the third of those who would re-establish it at once. With respect to the two latter I have nothing to say; but with regard to the first, those namely who think that protection never can be restored, I must say that it was not very candid of them to tell the farmers of this country that if their friends should be placed in power they would at once see high prices restored. Well, but the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer, had made out a technical case for himself, and that case is, I think, not a very pleasant one for the right hon. Gentleman. But granting the case as it has been stated by the right hon. Gentleman—granting that he has a character like that which has been given to a predecessor of his, and one of the ablest and wittiest of his predecessors, Charles Townsend I mean, of whom Mr. Burke said, that he was infinitely above having an opinion—giving the right hon. Gentleman credit for being like his predecessor in that respect, why then you must come to the conclusion that without thinking Protection could be restored, and being rather in favour of Free Trade, he has allowed this great party, the great party of the farmers of the country, to believe that he would restore Protection, when he never believed in or expected anything of the kind. I must say, Sir, I think that some part of the House—those who are called the Members of the Manchester school—may be described as interested parties, in fact they have been called the farmers' enemies, but it appears to me that there are other persons more entitled to that character, and I think the farmers have this owing to them, that they should know the truth, and that they should know the opinion which eminent men in this country equally entertain; and I think that if the right

hon. Gentleman has known all this, that it would be impossible to restore Protection, and that benefits to the land must be sought elsewhere, I think it was due to that body to tell them so, for without doubt the farmers of this country are as respectable and worthy as any body of men in the Kingdom. I do not believe that upon these economical matters they have reasoned the matter to the foundations, though they may have gone through Adam Smith, or some of his disciples; and I think that if the right hon. Gentleman and his friends had placed the case fairly before the farmers, and told them that the question had been settled by the House of Commons, the controversy would have been at an end long ago. I remember, with regard to the Roman Catholic question, when the Duke of Wellington and Sir Robert Peel proposed the settlement of that question—I remember meeting a farmer and asking him his opinion. He said—"My opinion would certainly be against the Roman Catholics, but I see all the great men in Parliament are for them, and therefore I give up my opinion to theirs." Why, upon this question of Protection, I believe that if a fair statement had been made to them—not with the view of exciting discontent at recent legislation—but if the truth had been fairly told them, we need not have waited until to-night for the settlement of this question, but at least four years ago that question would have been finally settled by the general assent and concurrence of the nation.

I must own, Sir, that what I must call double dealing has been carried on up to the results of the recent elections. Now, it has been said that the Earl of Derby has acted very fairly, that he put before the country this question, "Are you for Free Trade or are you for Protection? I shall be ready to bring forward protective measures if the decision of the country is in favour of them; but otherwise I shall assent to the Free Trade policy, which has of late been adopted." Sir, I certainly do not wish to say anything harsh of Lord Derby, for independently of other considerations, in judging of Lord Derby one should look to what his previous conduct had been with respect to office. I cannot but recall to mind, in speaking of the conduct of that noble Lord, that when I was his Colleague in the Administration of Earl Grey, he left that Cabinet because he could not concur in the measures that were then proposed. Again, in 1845, he left the Cabinet of Sir Robert Peel, because he would not give his assent to the repeal of the Corn Laws; and last year, when he wished to propose some duties on corn, and found that he could not make a Ministry upon that principle, he abandoned the attempt, and gave up what must have been the highest object of his ambition. Now, then, I say that with regard to the man, one ought not to judge prematurely or upon partial grounds that he has departed from that character and that honour which becomes a great public man in a high station. But I must say that the theory upon which he seems to have gone was a theory utterly impracticable with the working of the Constitution, and with this Parliament; that if he had been the Sovereign of this country, or if he had been an absolute Sovereign in any country, he might have said, "Let the people decide, and let them tell their Representatives their own views with respect to commercial policy;" but in this country, as the head of a party, it was inevitable that those who were joined with him should take part on one side or the other in the elections, and thus we have had a most extraordinary spectacle, and a most extraordinary result, because we had Gentlemen going into the towns and saying, "We are against any tax on bread; we could not bear a return to the Corn Laws, and we support Lord Derby;" and other Gentlemen going into the counties and saying that the greatest mischief had been done by the repeal of the Corn Laws, and that they were for Protection, and therefore that they supported Lord Derby, the Administration all the while helping both, and taking care to provide them with the best means of securing their election. They said to Mr. A. in the town, "You must take care that you are for a large loaf, and that you will never hear of Protection;" while at the same time they said to Mr. B. in the county, "You are to take Protection for your motto, and you must declare for a restoration of the Corn Laws." I will not detain the House at this time of night, but instances of that conduct have been given over and over again. They were stated by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Edinburgh (Mr. Macaulay), in the speech which he made at Edinburgh, and he goes through the different places and the different professions that were made at them. Why, Sir, I believe, indeed, there was one case of a Gentleman who stood in a county on Protection principles; and failing in that, he stood for a town on Free Trade principles: this gentleman showed a different side of his face to each constituency. Well, but what was the result? Why, the result has been that we have seen it stated by a Gentleman who still remains on the side of Protection, that in many places a Protectionist candidate would have succeeded had it not been that the Government supported the Free Trade candidate. That is the statement made by a Protectionist, not by a Member of the Government, but by one associated with them. And then comes the noble Lord at the head of the Government, and he makes, as I understand him, this statement. I certainly do not wish to misrepresent him, though I think he has often misrepresented me, but I should on that account be only the more anxious not to treat him in the same way. But, as I understand him, he says—"This country has decided in favour of its present commercial policy; that being the case I am ready to adopt it, and to support and carry measures in consonance with the Free Trade policy; but I still believe that there is great danger in that policy, and that—but God grant I may be wrong!—great calamities may ensue from its course." Well, that is a new position for a Minister of this country. When Sir Robert Peel dissolved Parliament in 1834 he announced what his principles were in what was called the Tamworth manifesto. He stated the principles by which he meant to abide. The integrity of the Irish Church was one thing by which he meant to abide. He did abide by it; and when he was defeated in this House, by a Motion made by me, he gave up office. Again, when Lord Melbourne proposed his measures in 1841, he said—"I propose certain duties on corn, sugar, and timber." The result of the elections was unfavourable to him; the House of Commons came to a vote against him, and he at once retired. But you have now a provision for a perpetual Ministry. That has been the case hitherto, according to the constitution of this country. Ministers have had certain opinions, certain views, certain principles; and if they found that they were thwarted in those principles, when they thought that they ought to be carried into effect, they no longer remained in office. But as I understand the statement of the present Prime Minister, the case stands thus:—"If the country approve of Protection, I will carry Protection measures; but if the country approve of Free Trade, then I will bring forward Free Trade measures; but if I am right, and Free Trade produces great calamities, then I turn Protectionist again." And thus the same Minister may be a Protectionist, then a Free-trader, and then again a Protectionist. That would be a new thing in the history of this country; and, giving the noble Lord the utmost credit for thinking that this course is consistent with integrity, and that he can reconcile it to his own sense of duty, I must still say that it is an example full of novelty and danger.

But then the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer has adopted this policy. Now, he has shown to the House that while he was connected with the cause of Protection, he did not faithfully serve the cause of Protection. I say, therefore, now that he has espoused the cause of Free Trade, let us take care that he is not as faithless to the cause of Free Trade as he has been to that of Protection. When we observed—which the most of us have done—that in the course of his speeches, when he sat on this side of the House, he never boldly put forth opinions on that question, as the noble Lord the Member for North Leicestershire (the Marquess of Granby) did—that he never, in fact, fought with any earnestness the cause of Protection, it was very satisfactory to us to find that the cause was not urged with more sincerity and with more zeal. It was an advantage to the cause of Free Trade that it was not so urged; but it will be quite a different thing if the cause of Free Trade is in his hands; and it will be a great loss to the cause which we prize if it is not properly represented by the Government, and if the principle is not fairly carried out—if any measures are proposed consistent with Free Trade, or extending Free Trade, but not prudently extending it—according to one of the Resolutions before the House—by which Free Trade measures might become odious and unpopular. Therefore I think it is our duty to watch the cause, and to take care that in his Free Trade policy the right hon. Gentleman does that which is best for the cause. When Sir Robert Peel came down in 1846, and said, "I have changed my opinions, and I will render that homage to the cause to declare that I will no longer be guided by the professions of 1842," every one on this side of Parliament, whether moderate or extreme, at once gave full credit to his declaration. We believed, and we were justified by the event, that he had embraced completely that system of commercial policy which is now connected for ever with his name, and that we should have his earnest support. The only advice I had to give my friends in the struggle of 1846, and which I gave both to the Members of the House of Commons and of the House of Lords, with whom I was particularly connected, was to give their full support to Sir Robert Peel in that great struggle. I felt quite sure that he would conduct it in the most honest, able, and prudent manner to the end which he had in view. But I have no such confidence in the professions of the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer. I think the comparison made by the hon. Member for Birmingham (Mr. Muntz) was not a very eloquent or refined one, but it may be quite true that there may be great advantage to the country from having new measures from new men. I will be ready to hear those measures proposed which the Government mean to propose, and I should have been sorry if the Motion to-night had interrupted their being brought forward; but I do think we are bound to watch most closely those measures, for the whole course of this debate has shown that there are among us men who are still Protectionists at heart, and who, if there should be any reverse in trade—any evils following over-speculation, or any temporary distress that the state of the currency might produce—would be ready at once to say that all the Free-Trade measures had failed, and begin to agitate again for a return to Protection. We must watch these movements. The battle is not concluded, and it is our duty to take care that this great cause is not injured. I say, therefore, that it is our duty to watch the proceedings of the Government.

MR. WALPOLE: Sir, there are some observations in the speech of the noble Lord who has just sat down which induce me to make a few remarks before this debate is brought to a close. The noble Lord's observations are in many respects similar to the Resolution before the House; for in the first place, they divide themselves into three heads; in the second, they are both of a retrospective and prospective character. The points to which the noble Lord particularly refers are—first, retrospectively the conduct of himself and of his friends, and also of his opponents, on the subject of the corn laws; in the second place, prospectively some meditations of his own as to the Budget which the Chancellor of the Exchequer is likely to propose; in the third place—and it is very much for this reason that I rise to speak—some observations on the conduct of Lord Derby, which, if I understand the noble Lord rightly, he considers to be in some respects unconstitutional. Be it remembered, that the only subject of discussion which at present is really before the House is, whether we shall adopt the Resolutions of the hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for Wolverhampton, or whether we shall accede to the Amendment proposed by the noble Lord the Member for Tiverton; and seeing that there is no point of difference between them except a few epithets, I say that the only question in debate is, whether we are prepared to affirm that the measure of 1846 was, strictly speaking, and in all respects, a wise and just measure. There were two remarks made by the noble Lord which countenance me in the view I take of that question, and which strengthen me in saying, that I, for one, can never acquiesce in the words of the Resolution as applicable to that measure. The noble Lord stated, and stated truly, that the opponents of the repeal of the corn laws took three grounds for their opposition: first, that it was impolitic for a great country like this to depend upon foreign nations for a large supply of food; secondly, that the corn laws, as they stood, were in harmony with the general policy of the country on subjects of trade and finance, which was to protect native industry; and, thirdly, that the change proposed to be made was too sudden and precipitate. Now, I came into this House in the year 1846, just when that question was first introduced. I was one of those who voted against Sir Robert Peel on that question; but I think I may say in passing, that I never uttered a word, and I am sure I never entertained a thought, which was in any degree harsh or unkind either to that right hon. Gentleman or to any of his friends. On the contrary, I deprecated then the destruction of the Conservative party, and from that time to this, I, for one, have wished to see it restored. But with regard to the measure itself, I do think, if we must express our opinions upon it, that the three grounds which the noble Lord has mentioned were grounds which justified me—I did not speak in the debate—in giving a silent vote against its adoption. And the last two grounds especially do entitle me now to say that I cannot subscribe to the description of that measure, as, strictly speaking, just, and wise; for if the corn laws were in accordance with the general policy of this country at the time when they were changed; and if all advantages were taken away from those who had hitherto enjoyed advantages in the shape of protection, without removing any of the restrictions or impediments which existed to the cultivation of the soil—although I am prepared to admit, and do admit most fully, that that measure has proved beneficial to the great majority of the people of this country by increasing their comforts and improving their condition, yet wisdom and justice, in my opinion, can never be predicated of any measure, unless it be equally beneficial to every class of the community. I do not wish to raise a corn-law discussion, but I wish to state the reasons freely why I cannot agree with the hon. and learned Member for Wolverhampton in the exact proposition which he has submitted to the House. I think, strictly speaking, that the measure of 1846 was not just. I think it was too sudden and precipitate, inasmuch as that particular interest which had been protected up to that period had not sufficient time to prepare itself for the altered circumstances in which it was placed. And will the advocates of free trade in this House allow me to tell them that, in taking this line of argument, I am only taking a line of argument which Adam Smith himself laid down in his great book, The Wealth of Nations, saying, if I recollect aright the passage to which I am referring, that where, by high duties, you have protected any particular industry of the country so as to induce the employment of a great number of people or a great amount of capital and labour in that particular branch of industry (I believe those are his words), “humanity suggests that in restoring free trade you ought to do it by slow gradations, and with much reserve and circumspection.” Sir, as I said before I do not wish to raise controversy in this debate; but I wish in giving this vote to guard against its being urged in reproach against me hereafter that I concealed my views on this point. These are the grounds on which I think the measure of 1846 was not strictly just or strictly wise. Now, with reference to the second topic to which the noble Lord has alluded, I cannot forbear to make some remarks. The noble Lord, taking up an expression which fell from the right hon. Baronet the Member for Carlisle (Sir James Graham), has assumed in his speech, that we are going to give, what he calls, as he understands it, compensation to the land; and he has made a very strong and powerful argument against that supposed compensation preparatory to the Budget which he imagines is about to be submitted to the House. Now, the noble Lord cannot fail to remember that if there is any one thing since the commencement of the Session for which he has found fault with Her Majesty's Government more than another, it is for inserting, or recommending to be inserted, in the Royal Speech, a hypothetical paragraph. Well, he will permit me to say that he has made an hypothesis with regard to the forthcoming Budget, which, when he hears that Budget, he will see was perfectly unfounded. He has made for us an hypothetical Budget. I am not, of course, at liberty to enter now into the measures which my right hon. Friend will much better explain at the proper time; but I can assure the noble Lord that they will be strictly based upon the Resolutions which we had intended to propose to the Amendment of the hon. Gentleman the Member for Wolverhampton—namely, that we ought to adhere unreservedly to the policy introduced by the Act of 1846—the policy of free trade, as you call it, and of unrestricted competition as we call it—then I will say, as we more properly call it—that we would adhere to that policy fully and fairly, and that the measures which we mean to introduce shall not interfere or be inconsistent with that policy. Now, the other point to which the noble Lord adverted is the point upon which I own that I feel the strongest. I thank the noble Lord, however, for the fair and honourable manner in which he spoke at the commencement of his observations with reference to the noble Earl at the head of the Government. I have during the last nine months seen much of that noble Earl, and I believe that no Minister ever lived who was actuated by purer or higher motives; and I am sure that he would scorn to act in any other way but that which honesty and the precepts of our constitution prescribe for a constitutional Minister. But the noble Lord opposite seems to imagine that the noble Earl has assumed office, and that we have undertaken the responsibilities of Government, under the pretence that we were a party formed upon one set of principles which we have now renounced, and that, having renounced those principles, we have no longer a right to sit where we are. Sir, allow me to remind the noble Lord that the question of commercial freedom is not the only, or by any means the most important, question which constituted the bond of union between Gentlemen on this side of the House. I must also remind the noble Lord that we did not come into office by any Motion of our own. In vindication of myself I hope I may say a few plain words, if they are only the plain truth. We came into office, first of all, because the noble Lord had not the confidence of his supporters to that extent that he thought he could carry on with credit to himself the Government of the country; secondly, because the noble Lord himself recommended that Lord Derby should be sent for by the Queen; and, thirdly, because Lord Derby and his followers were, I believe, at that time and now, in point of numbers, the only party which was likely to obtain the confidence of Parliament and of the country. ["Hear!"] If that be not so, bring it to the test. We can only sit here according to the doctrines and principles of the constitution. Unless we enjoy the confidence of the country, as represented in this House, we cannot hold our offices a day longer—we do not desire to hold our offices a day longer. And I must say, and I say it with regret, that I wish the criminations and recriminations which I have heard in the course of this debate, as to Gentlemen on this side of the House only seeking and retaining office for the emoluments which belong to it, and as to Gentlemen on the other side of the House only aiming at office from the same motives—I utterly disbelieve that the great majority of public men in this country are guided by any such mean or unworthy motives. Sure I am that I can say for you (the Opposition) on your side, that I will not think that you are actuated by such feelings; and I hope I may claim equal credit for my friends at least, if not for myself, when I say the same thing on their behalf—they seek office for a higher reason. I believe it is an object of noble and honourable ambition to desire to have the power to carry into effect those principles which you yourselves believe to be best for the country; and all I would say of the noble Earl at the head of the Government is, that I am perfectly confident that he would not hold office a single moment longer than he thought he could act consistently with that principle. The noble Lord, who appeared to me to be alluding in his own mind to the circumstances adverted to by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Wiltshire (Mr. Sidney Herbert), argues that no person who holds opinions which he is not prepared to carry into effect, ought to continue in office when he has the opportunity at least to propose the adoption of them. Sir, I take leave to say that neither the abandonment of opinions on conviction, nor the retention of opinions which are no longer practicable to be carried out, are disqualifications for holding office. If it were so, I know no man in this House, and no set of men can I conceive of, who will be able to hold office for any length of time. I do not say it in the way of reproach; but as for the abandonment of opinions with reference to this very question of the corn laws, we know that many Gentlemen opposite have abandoned their own views—we know that the noble Lord himself once told us he was in favour of a fixed duty of 8s. We also know that the right hon. Baronet the Member for Carlisle once said that the corn laws were so important to this country that if they were repealed, he thought this country would be the last country which he should wish to inhabit. [Sir JAMES GRAHAM was understood to dissent.] The right hon. Baronet will forgive me, but I can show him a passage in one of his own speeches, where he says, if the corn laws were repealed, he should concur in thinking with his noble Friend (Lord Ashburton) that this country is the last which he should wish to inhabit. And again, the noble Lord the Member for Tiverton (Viscount Palmerston) declared himself to be in favour of the imposition of a 5s. duty, if practicable; and I, for one, would not object to shelter myself under the shield of that noble Lord, and to say, as far as I understand this question, that I was always sorry that a 5s. duty was not proposed in 1846, just in the same way as we retained an equivalent ad valorem duty on every other article. Then there is my right hon. Friend the Member for the University of Oxford (Mr. Gladstone). He candidly told us on the first night of the Session that when he first entered Parliament the traditions of his party induced him to support the corn laws, and he has candidly admitted that he afterwards became, from sincere conviction, an advocate for their repeal. Therefore, I say that the mere abandonment of opinion on conviction is no disqualification for office. I have no doubt that I shall be expected to say something about changing opinions, and still "retaining" office, though it is not intended to carry those opinions into practical effect. Now, I do not say it sarcastically, but no doubt the noble Lord (Lord John Russell) is now of the same opinion as he was when he proposed the Appropriation Clause; but I should think him very unwise if he attempted to turn us out of office to-morrow, by advocating that abstract proposition. Again, I have no doubt that the right hon. Baronet the Member for Carlisle, and the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the University of Oxford, retain the opinions which they so manfully and so ably advocated in the discussion of the Ecclesiastical Titles Bill; but would they do wisely to attempt to reopen that question in case they should come into power? Sir, I hold that a greater constitutional doctrine ought to be observed with reference to these questions than has yet been stated in this debate, and it is, that constitutional doctrine which makes me say that I would have equally adhered to the repeal of the corn laws, no matter what I might have thought in the year 1846. The doctrine is, that when a question of great importance has been long and anxiously discussed in the country and in Parliament, and has at length been settled after that discussion upon due deliberation, it is the duty of every statesman, of every person who pretends to be a statesman, to adhere to that settlement; since the danger of renewing the agitation of such questions is so great that any advantage you can expect to derive from it, never will compensate for the evils and inconvenience which that agitation, when so renewed, must necessarily bring along with it. Therefore, I say that I am prepared to adhere to the abrogation of the corn laws on the same grounds as the stoutest Protestant would adhere to the Emancipation Act, and on the same grounds as the highest Tory would now adhere to the Reform Bill of 1832. Sir, I have no more to say. I rose principally to vindicate, not as I feel bound, but as I feel pleased to do, the character of my noble Friend at the head of the Government; and I will only add, that it is not merely on principles of Protection by which we were united, but we have, and always have had, a higher policy to carry out, namely, that Conservative policy which has always formed our bond of union; and until this House, until Parliament and the country, refuse us their confidence, so long we shall feel ourselves bound to continue to discharge our duties here as Ministers of the Crown; and in the discharge of these duties we shall endeavour, as I have said, to uphold and maintain those Conservative principles which bind us to each other; for by maintaining them we firmly believe we shall best consult the welfare and happiness of the whole country.

MR. COBDEN: Sir, on this, probably the very last occasion upon which the controversy between Protection and Free Trade may ever be heard in this House, I shall not perhaps be considered presumptuous if I offer a few remarks. The present circumstances of the discussion bring strongly to my memory the last solemn occasion on which this question was treated—I mean during the discussion of the Bill of Sir Robert Peel in 1846—I remember quite well, that the cause of the greatest concern and uneasiness that I then felt, was the course taken by the noble Lord the Member for Tiverton (Viscount Palmerston) upon that occasion. It is no secret that in that Parliament a very large majority of the House of Commons were in their hearts unfavourable to the total repeal of the Corn Laws. Probably it will not be too much to say that two-thirds of that House were by conviction, if not by interest, opposed to that measure; and I might probably say that not twenty Members of the House of Peers were earnestly in favour of the measure which they passed. Now, that which gave me most concern in this House at that time—so deeply interested as I was in the passing of that measure—was the fear lest there should be found a sufficient number of the leading statesmen of that day on either side or both sides of this House, who would be willing to carry on the business of the country, and maintain a fixed duty on corn; for I am sure that it only required such an organisation of official men to defeat, with the support which a majority of the House would have been ready to tender the proposition of Sir Robert Peel, and to have carried a Motion for a fixed duty. Under those circumstances, I confess that when I heard the noble Lord the Member for Tiverton, at the conclusion of an able speech, declare that he was still, even then, in favour of a fixed duty, that declaration gave me—and the feeling is now vividly in my mind—it gave me more

ciples which we have now renounced, and that, having renounced those principles, we have no longer a right to sit where we are. Sir, allow me to remind the noble Lord that the question of commercial freedom is not the only, or by any means the most important, question which constituted the bond of union between Gentlemen on this side of the House. I must also remind the noble Lord that we did not come into office by any Motion of our own. In vindication of myself I hope I may say a few plain words, if they are only the plain truth. It is no secret that in that Parliament a very large majority of the House of Commons were in their hearts unfavourable to the total repeal of the Corn Laws. Probably it will not be too much to say that two-thirds of that House were by conviction, if not by interest, opposed to that measure; and I might probably say that not twenty Members of the House of Peers were earnestly in favour of the measure which they passed. Now, that which gave me most concern in this House at that time—so deeply interested as I was in the passing of that measure—was the fear lest there should be found a sufficient number of the leading statesmen of that day on either side or both sides of this House, who would be willing to carry on the business of the country, and maintain a fixed duty on corn; for I am sure that it only required such an organisation of official men to defeat, with the support which a majority of the House would have been ready to tender the proposition of Sir Robert Peel, and to have carried a Motion for a fixed duty. Under those circumstances, I confess that when I heard the noble Lord the Member for Tiverton, at the conclusion of an able speech, declare that he was still, even then, in favour of a fixed duty, that declaration gave me—and the feeling is now vividly in my mind—it gave me more anxiety than any other incident which had occurred during the discussion. Now, Sir, the noble Lord's political course since that time has been the subject of grave controversy in this House. I was one of six Members on this side of the House who refused to vote for the Motion of the hon. and learned Member for Sheffield (Mr. Roebuck) two years ago, in approbation of the noble Lord's foreign policy; and I confess that my opinion of the noble Lord with relation to his foreign policy was very much founded on his course of conduct at home. I had been accustomed to hear Lord Aberdeen stigmatised as the advocate of despotism abroad, and the noble Lord (Viscount Palmerston) held up as the supporter of freedom; but when I remembered that Lord Aberdeen gave his instant adhesion to the total repeal of the Corn Laws, and only regretted that it was not immediate, I confess that I never for a moment fell into the delusion which so largely prevailed amongst liberal politicians as to the despotic tendency of his foreign policy. I mention this because it should not be supposed by the Members of this House, and particularly by the juveniles, who have so often been appealed to, that they should follow the noble Lord (Viscount Palmerston), as a liberal leader on this occasion, and go into the lobby with him in support of the Amendment that he has moved upon the Motion of my hon. Friend (Mr. C. Villiers). For what has been the course pursued by the noble Lord on this occasion? When he arose, with that blandness which characterises him, to suggest—barely to suggest—the alternative of his Amendment, we were led to suppose that the noble Lord, who still sits on our side of the House, desired to offer his proposition as a friendly suggestion to the supporters of the original Motion, and that he was prepared, unless his friends on our side accepted his mediation, and were anxious for his intervention—everybody, I say, in that case supposed that then the noble Lord would have withdrawn his Amendment. But it appears, that although the noble Lord must be well aware that nine-tenths of those on our side of the House, and all those with whom he has been politically connected, with the most trifling individual exceptions, would vote with my hon. Friend the Member for Wolverhampton, yet the noble Lord has pressed his Amendment into the service of the Protectionist Government; and if this division should result unfavourably to the Free Trade cause, the country will understand that the noble Lord is the author of our disaster. Now, I don't complain of the terms of the noble Lord's Amendments per se, as the noble Lord has now offered them to the House—I don't complain of them so much, because they do not go to the full extent of the avowal of Free Trade principles. What I object to in the noble Lord is, that when Free Trade is perfectly safe—for nobody believes that it can be endangered by any direct reversal—you could as soon pull the stars down from the firmament as put one farthing of duty on a quarter of corn—what I object to, I say, is, that the noble Lord by his Amendment has taken the only course that can leave the door open to an indemnity to the owners of land. ["No, no!"] I say, Yes, yes; because the Resolution, as it was framed by my hon. Friend (Mr. C. Villiers), was specially intended, if adopted by the House, to bar—as far as a vote of this House could bar—any claim to compensation. But by refusing to acknowledge that the principle of Free Trade in 1846 was "wise and just"—by expunging the word "property" in the affirmative contained in my hon. Friend's Resolution, that Free Trade has enabled property the better to bear its burdens—the noble Lord has just opened the door for the question of compensation. Now, I do not deny what has been said on the other side, that it is perfectly competent for any hon. Member who chooses to bring forward a proposition to grant compensation to the landed interest, whatever the decision of the House to-night may be: nay, I go further—I admit that if the majority of this House should decide that there shall be no compensation, still if there be a Member of this House who thinks otherwise, it is his bounden duty to advocate his convictions, and, if necessary, submit them in the shape of a Motion. But what we wanted on this occasion—on the first assembling of the new Parliament for this special purpose—was this, to affirm by a vote of this House that a majority of the House as now constituted were of opinion that the repeal of the Corn Laws was a just measure; and that there exists no right or title to compensation for that measure on the part of the landed interest. Now the noble Lord has prevented us from taking that issue. And on what grounds has this been advocated? The noble Lord has not said a word in opposition to my hon. Friend's Motion. On the contrary, he said that he approved of it, and would vote for it if necessary. He has not entered the lists in opposition to the arguments of the other side to show my hon. Friend that he is wrong, and that we ought not to go into the same lobby with him. That, I think, is the way in which a really earnest advocate of a cause would proceed; and he would not have brought forward a Resolution hostile to the views of his friends merely to accommodate the views of their opponents. He would rather have stated his own opinions and principles; and being such a master of argument, why had he not tried if he could not bring over hon. Gentlemen opposite to his own views? Now, what he would ask was, their objection to the word "just." I heard the noble Lord's reference to Gentlemen on the other side who are not Free Traders at all. ["Hear, hear!"] If I am to judge by the cheers on the other side, there are a great proportion of Gentlemen opposite who still profess themselves Protectionists. I am not, I believe, misrepresenting them. If that be the case, we do not expect them to vote for either of these Resolutions. You will be just as inconsistent, you will just as much betray your principles, if you vote for the noble Lord's Motion, as if you vote for that of my hon. Friend the Member for Wolverhampton. Nay, more; if there be a man who is still convinced that Free Trade is injurious to the country, and that Protection is a sound principle, that man betrays himself, his conscience, and his country if he votes in favour of Free Trade. Well, but the noble Lord's Resolution affirms Free Trade to the full extent of that of my hon. Friend.

And now with regard to the question of the justice of this Resolution. The right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary, who has just sat down, says, he cannot affirm that the measure of 1846 was a just measure, because he is not prepared to say that it was a measure which affected favourably the whole community. But that is not the whole case. The question is, whether the law as it existed was a just law towards the great body of the people, or whether it was a law which, whilst it was intended to serve a small fraction of the community, did not inflict enormous and grievous injury on the great mass of the people. And if we can show that the law operated with great injury to the mass of the people, why we have a right, in their behoof, and in their interest, to the abolition of the law. And we have a right to measure the injury it occasioned by the extent of injury which you tell us you are now suffering by its abolition, because the monopoly is the measure of the injury inflicted on the rest of the community. Then, instead of your coming for compensation, why, we should have the best possible claim for restitution. Hon. Gentlemen who talk of this Corn Law at present forget altogether the history of its origin, and the manner in which it worked during the time of its existence in its greatest severity. That law was an exception to all other laws in its origin in 1815; it was passed in this House, as many hon. Members may recollect, when there was such a vehement spirit of protest against it on the part of the great mass of the people of this country that you had to surround the Houses of Parliament with armed troops. How did that law work? Have you forgotten the years 1817, 1818, and 1819? During those three years the average price of corn was 84s. in this country. I will trouble you with but one quotation, and that a short one, relative to the effect of your legislation at that time; it is from a work that treats of that most neglected part of the history of our country, that of the last half century. Mr. Wilkes, in his Half Century, said—

"In January, 1817, wheat was 52s. a quarter; in May, 76s.; and in the autumn, 103s. Bankruptcies among the tenant-farmers, and disturbances among their labourers, kept pace with this ascent. Incendiary fires nightly blazed; threshing-machines were destroyed; rude demands for a fixed price of bread and meat were more rudely enforced; houses and shops were pillaged; and at length encounters with the military ensued. Thirty-four unhappy men were sentenced to death, which five of them suffered. In September a body of Staffordshire colliers, thrown out of work, set out for London, intending, in their ignorant simplicity, personally to petition the Prince Regent, and present him with a waggon of coals, which they drew along with them. Later in the year the iron-workers of Merthyr assembled, to the number of 10,000 or 12,000, and put out the furnaces that yielded them only partial employment. In the counties of Leicester and Nottingham the Luddite insurrection broke out with greater violence and cunning than before. Not only were factories and houses invaded, but incursions made into adjacent villages by evidently organised parties. As the winter advanced, distress became more general and severe, though large benevolent efforts had been made to arrest its progress."

In those unhappy times political disturbances followed, as they always do, in the train of distress and starvation. The period from 1817 to 1820 marks the most disgraceful era of our legislation; restrictive laws were passed to keep down the people whom your injustice urged to insurrection. During that time there were the Spa Fields riots, the Cato Street conspiracy, the outbreaks of the blanketeers, and in conclusion the Manchester massacre in 1819, which led to a reaction of the public mind that has been going on up to this time. I very much doubt whether the great political changes which have taken place in this country, as well as the suffering and disasters they caused, may not be traced in their first spring to the enactment of the Corn Laws in 1815. Those laws put a prohibitive duty on corn until it reached the price of 80s. in this country. What was the state of the country when I entered this House in 1841? You had whole districts in Lancashire and Yorkshire given over to desolation; in Stockport a large proportion of the houses were empty, the workhouses were filled with paupers, the manufactures of the district reduced to the worst state, until the people, driven by a kind of instinct, abandoned their workshops and mills, and stood with folded arms by the roadside in mute despair. I say that these sufferings and miseries are now, by the light of our present experience, clearly traceable to the operation of the Corn Laws as effect follows cause, because in those times of distress, if you look at the prices of wheat in Prussia, Austria, Germany, and America, and compare them with the prices that existed here, where the price was sustained by artificial means, you will find the disparity caused by a prohibitive duty, and which shows if the barriers had been broken down, and the obnoxious law abolished, you would have had those millions of quarters of wheat flowing in for the benefit of the unhappy population of this country, which now come in with such perfect tranquillity and serenity. The effect of this system upon the public health is shown in the Registrar General's Reports. What was its effect on the criminal statistics? Why, you had in 1836, when wheat was as low as 39s. 5d. a quarter, 20,984 commitments in England and Wales; but in 1842, when the price was 64s., there were 31,309 commitments; and in 1850, when the price had gone back to 40s. 3d., the commitments were 26,813; showing, in the first six years, an increase of 50 per cent in times of high prices of corn, and that when the price again fell, although the population had been increasing from 1842 to 1850, yet the number of commitments had diminished almost by 5,000 in six years. Is not this evidence? Is it not clear as daylight that you have had a system of laws in this country, which has been producing all the calamities that, as Christian men, you are bound to try to avert? Having discovered this, having brought ourselves to the conviction of the injurious tendency of those laws, I say, ought we to mince matters here? Ought we now to be occupied with a midnight discussion whether we shall brand those laws as unjust and unwise?

I have often wondered how little many of us in this House know of what is going on out of doors. Whilst you have been discussing whether this odious epithet of "just" shall be applied to the repeal of the Corn Law, all the communications I am receiving are complaining that we are too quiet, and that we do not assert our principles with sufficient vigour. Now, I think there is some ground for this. I think we have allowed hon. Gentlemen opposite to assume the tone of persons labouring under a grievance—of persons who are trampled upon—and we, the Free Traders, have been accused of striking our opponents when they were down. Now I do not see any symptoms of your being down. I have seen a very good spirit manifested in this House—I have seen a considerable amount of self-possession and confidence—and I have found not a little intolerance towards those who have been Free Traders, and consistent Free Traders. And I must say I saw with feelings very much akin to disgust the way in which a portion of the House on the other side treated the son of the great and illustrious man to whom the country owed the benefit of the repeal of those laws in 1846. I do not see that you are down, or that you are in very great danger of being trampled on. Now, I complain of hon. Gentlemen opposite, not that they have behaved badly to the Free Traders, but that they have behaved badly towards those who have sent them here. You make a complaint against the Free Traders, and you make it a ground of claiming compensation, that injury has been done to the farming interest. Well, now, I complain of the landlords of this country—I complain that you have been the authors of all the mischief to the land that you say has been worked by the repeal of the Corn Laws. For six years you have kept alive this delusion about protection in the agricultural mind throughout the country. Those six years have been a transition state for the farmers, and we Free Traders all admitted that the change from a pernicious and absurd system to one that should be just and beneficial must be attended with a transition state, in which the farmer would probably have to endure a considerable amount of suffering. There must be a transition of suffering—it is the penalty you pay for having done wrong. Still I think that the burden of this transition ought not to be thrown exclusively on the farmers' shoulders. But what has been the effect of the agitation which has been studiously maintained during the past six years? It has been to make the tenantry sufferers to an extent they never calculated upon. I will not say you have done it designedly, but if you had desired to throw the burden exclusively on the tenantry of the country, you could not have taken a more effectual course for this purpose. By sending down agitators, by sending down such men as the hon. Gentleman the Member for North Warwickshire (Mr. Newdegate)—to whom I must say I cannot return the compliment he paid me when he told me that I was a successful demagogue—but by sending down such men to figure on the platforms of county halls at agricultural meetings, you have done your little best to keep alive the delusion in the farmers' minds, and I say you have been the very worst enemies of the farmers. The hon. Member for Cambridgeshire (Mr. E. Ball)—the only tenant-farmer we have amongst us—and I should like to give him a little advice, if he will allow me, for keeping bad company does not improve one's virtue, and this metropolis is a dangerous place, especially for tenant-farmers—the hon. Gentleman tells us that during the last six years he has been nearly ruined, and that that has been the fate of tenant-farmers generally. Well, what have the agents of the landlords been about amongst the tenant-farmers during this time? They tell the farmers, "Do not talk about rents, do not talk about clearing away hedge-rows, or diminishing game; do not talk of improving your covenants, all that is nothing to the matter, you must have back Protection; there are Mr. Newdegate and the Central Society, and a hundred district Protection Societies—only trust to them, and you will get back Protection." ["Oh, oh!"] Those oh's tell me I am hitting hard—that I am near the marrow. There is the hon. and gallant Member for Lincoln (Col. Sibthorp)—[Col.

SIBTHORP: Hear, hear!]
—who, I believe, cheers me, and who, I must say, deserves every tribute for his consistency, although, unfortunately, he has been consistently wrong. I read the hon. and gallant Colonel's address to the electors of Lincoln, and the proceedings at the Lincoln election, and I have remarked his conduct both out of doors and in this House, and I must say he has been a uniformly consistent Protectionist. But I believe that has not been the course of hon. Gentlemen around him. What I complain of is, that if they have principles they do not show themselves worthy to maintain them. They come into this House and say, "We are in favour of Protection as a principle," and they persuade the tenant-farmers that they have confidence in their cause, and that it is the cause of justice. And then how do they act here? They say there is a majority against us, and we will bow to it—we will be Free Traders—we will be Free Traders if we can call in the diplomacy of the noble Lord the Member for Tiverton. ["Oh, oh!"] It is necessary you should hear this—I tell you the farmers will read it, and therefore you need not attempt to interrupt me—even these interruptions will redound to your discredit. You say, we are in a minority, and we will bow to the majority. Now, did the Free Traders act so? When I came into Parliament, in 1841, as Member for Stockport, the first thing I encountered here was my predecessor as Member for the West Riding of Yorkshire (Mr. Stuart Wortley), representing the largest constituency in the Kingdom, appearing to move an Amendment to the Address, declaring a want of confidence in Her Majesty's Ministers for having proposed a modified system of Free Trade. And what did the hon. Gentleman say? He said, "I appear here, bearing no inconsiderable part of the answer to that message which Her Majesty has sent to the country." I was sitting by my hon. Friend the Member for Wolverhampton (Mr. C. Villiers) at the time, and could not help exclaiming, "It is enough to make one's heart sink into one's shoes to hear such things—to find the West Riding of Yorkshire sending up a Member to advocate Protection." But what did we do? Did we bow to the majority of ninety-one which turned out the Government? No; we set to work with redoubled energy, and in a few years, by means of that energy, we gained the support of the West Riding, and made our way to the convictions and hearts of those great statesmen who proposed and carried the repeal of the Corn Laws. I say to hon. Gentlemen opposite, if you believe that your cause is just, then you are bound to pursue it consistently; but if you do not believe in its justice, then cease to hold it out as just to the country. I say you want the confidence and courage of your countrymen if you have a just cause, and refuse to act in your belief of its justice, if you bow to an adverse majority and abandon your principles. If you retain your convictions, you cannot vote for the Motion of my hon. Friend—and you cannot in fairness or decency vote for the Amendment of the noble Lord (Viscount Palmerston). If you retain your convictions, act upon them with boldness, with frankness, and with honesty, and if your cause be just you will regain the ground you have lost, and make your principles triumph.

The right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer has been much, and I think deservedly, censured for the course he has taken upon this question. I think it impossible for any one to speak in language too strong of the insult—I cannot call it by any other word—which has been offered to our reason, our common sense, our moral feeling, by the language held by that right hon. Gentleman within the last forty-eight hours. He has attempted to make it appear that he has not been leading or encouraging a party which has been keeping up this most mischievous delusion out of doors—he has been trying to make us believe that he discouraged rather than encouraged it. Why, I have my pocket full of extracts, not one of which I will read, because to do so would be a great insult to our memory, although they would show what degree of credit is to be attached to the right hon. Gentleman's account of these proceedings. The right hon. Gentleman has told the noble Member for North Leicestershire (the Marquess of Granby) that he has measures of relief to the agricultural interest to propose; and as if to show to what a climax of assertion and counter-assertion we have come, the right hon. Home Secretary has got up and assured the House that we must not expect any such measures. I call on hon. Members to recollect that the question really at issue to-night is the question of compensation. The right hon. Gentleman has told us too clearly his intention of compensating the landlords, to leave any doubt that he really entertains that purpose, and our division to-night will be between those who vote for Free Trade, barring all claim to compensation, and those who vote for Free Trade, leaving compensation an open question. How the friends of the late Sir Robert Peel can go into the lobby with the Protectionist party and vote against the proposition that their own measure of 1846 was a just, and a wise, and a beneficial measure, passes my comprehension. I should have thought that of all things, that which would have been most gratifying to right hon. Gentlemen would have been to see a record on our Votes giving the sanction of this House in these very terms to the great act of legislation to which they were parties. I can only say for myself, that believing that measure was wise and just—believing, from the simple facts that I have given you, that it was a measure really calculated to put an end to sedition, conspiracy, rebellion, and every calamity that can befall a population—I shall vote for the Motion of my hon. Friend (Mr. C. Villiers), and in doing so I beg most emphatically to state that this question is not settled. It cannot be settled until we have the other problem solved—I mean whether those who have been deprived of the right of making free with our bread baskets should afterwards be compensated by being allowed to put their fingers into our pockets.

MR. ISAAC BUTT said, that it was not his intention, at that late hour, long to delay the House from the division for which hon. Members were impatient; but he, for one, felt that the tone and temper of the speech they had just heard, made it impossible to go to a division without at least some attempt at a reply. He did not recognise—humble a Member as he was, and perhaps it was fitting that an humble Member of that House should tell him so—that tone of superiority which the hon. Member for the West Riding of Yorkshire had thought proper to assume. He could not acknowledge anything in the position, in the political conduct, in the station, nor in the intellect—he boldly repeated it, in the intellect of the hon. Member which authorised him to assume that superiority over him. The hon. Member had assumed the tone and manner of a dictator to the House. He (Mr. Butt) did not need the explanation afforded by that tone and manner to understand the real object of the Resolution before the House. It was to affirm free trade that the original words were insisted on—it was not for the purpose of pledging the House to maintain it

—this would be done by the Amendment of the noble Lord the Member for Tiverton—but it was for the purpose of recording a personal triumph of the Member for the West Riding, and humiliating every party and every section in that House at the feet of himself and those associates who called themselves the Manchester School. This, he repeated, was the real object of the original Resolution. It had, indeed, been openly avowed. The intention of moving that Resolution had been first announced to the country at a public dinner at Manchester; and what then was stated as its object? The hon. Member for the West Riding there declared that when Parliament met, they would compel Ministers to recant, and not merely to recant, but to recant with humiliation. “If they continue Ministers,” he said, “they must cease to sneer at the Manchester School—they must sit at the feet of the Manchester School to learn their lesson.” These were the terms proposed—to sit at the feet of the Manchester School. To compel them to do so was the object of the Resolution. The hon. Member had appealed to the friends of Sir Robert Peel. He (Mr. Butt) would venture on a similar appeal. He asked of the House, would they accept this as the condition of British statesmanship? He asked of the associates of Grey—of those who remembered Canning—of those who had sat at the feet of Peel—were these to be the future terms of British statesmanship? For what other purpose were the words that were objected to insisted on? From whom did they come? They had very candidly stated to them the history of the arrangement—he would not say correction—of the Resolution, in the interesting revelation made last night by the right hon. Baronet the Member for Carlisle. The revelation was drawn up by that right hon. Baronet. If there was a man in that House more interested than another in upholding and defending the policy of 1846, that man was the right hon. Baronet the Member for Carlisle. He proposed the Resolution without these words, which now they were told were necessary to vindicate that policy. By him the Resolution was transmitted to the immediate friends of the late Sir Robert Peel. They did not think it necessary to suggest the declaration which now, indeed, they were told was necessary as an act of justice to the memory of that statesman. It was only when the Resolution was under the revision of the hon. Member for the West Riding and his associates—those who had avowed their object in passing it to be the humiliation of Her Majesty’s Ministers—it was then, and then only, that these words were inserted. Was not he (Mr. Butt) justified in saying that this object was not to uphold the policy of free trade—not to do justice to the memory of Sir Robert Peel—but to carry out the proud boast of Manchester, and humiliate all parties at their feet? “But,” said the hon. Member for the West Riding, “these words are necessary to close the question of compensation to the agricultural interest.” No one asked for compensation in the ordinary sense of the word. [“Oh, oh!”] They might quibble about words; but that which they did ask was this: That if it could be shown that agriculture, in consideration of protection, had been made subject to peculiar burdens, that with the ceasing of the protection the peculiar burdens should also cease; and now they were asked to pre-judge this question, to decide it by an abstract Resolution, without knowing what was to be proposed, without hearing the reasons by which it was to be supported, and they were asked to do this upon the very evening on which, if their proceedings had not been thus factiously interrupted, they would be at this very instant considering this question not on any abstract Resolution, but in the form of direct and tangible proposals. He (Mr. Butt) refused to bind himself until he heard the proposals that were to be made; neither could he forget the language that had been held out of doors by those who now asked of Parliament to pledge themselves against considering the claims of the agricultural interest. The hon. Member for the West Riding had warned them that he and his associates had hitherto been moderate in their agitation, but that if any party dared to attempt any new adjustment of the public burdens, their next agitation might be one against the privileges of the aristocracy. He would not be deterred by that threat. Might he be permitted to remind the House that the hon. Member for Manchester had complained that the Chancellor of the Exchequer had described that party as a Jacobin club, and had asked the right hon. Gentleman for a definition of a Jacobin club. He (Mr. Butt) thought he could supply him with one. A Jacobin club was an association that passed their resolutions outside the walls of Parliament, and then attempted to force them on Parliament by an appeal, not to their reason, but to their fears; a Jacobin club was a body of men that presumed to tell the Legislature that unless their dictation was submitted to there should be a war upon the institutions of the State. He would not be deterred by such threats from considering the just claims of any class for relief. He refused to pledge himself by any abstract Resolution against the consideration of such claims. If he did so, he would, in his judgment, betray his duty as an independent Member of that House; he would betray especially his duty to that country with which he was more immediately connected. They had the authority of Sir Robert Peel that Ireland was entitled to some relief for the injury she had suffered from the repeal of the corn laws. He would not by an abstract Resolution forego that claim. He would not fling away the promise of Her Majesty's gracious Speech that a liberal and generous policy should be adopted for Ireland. If he closed the door against the question of compensation, as it was termed, he would do both. He must still trespass for a few minutes on the patience of the House. He, like his noble Friend the Member for Leicestershire, was placed in the difficulty of not being able to support either of the propositions before the House. He could not vote for the Resolution of the noble Lord the Member for Tiverton, because he did not believe in the statements it contained. He would not at this stage of the debate attempt to argue the question; but he could not vote for a Resolution which asserted that the policy of free trade had benefited the country. But while he was prepared to record his vote against the Amendment, he could vote with a clear and safe conscience that the words for which it was substituted should be left out. He believed that these words were intended to humiliate the Ministry—to give a triumph to a particular party; and, furthermore, to close up by an abstract Resolution practical questions, which it was their duty to consider calmly and dispassionately. He must add, that while he retained his opinions upon the great question of protection and free trade as a sincere Protectionist, unshaken in his conviction, he yet could not refuse to give to Her Majesty's Ministers a general although an independent support. That support he was ready cordially and sincerely to accede to them. If he wanted anything to confirm him in such a course, let him say that he could find it in the proceedings of that debate, in the belief that they were the

MR. GLADSTONE; Sir, I had no intention of taking any part in this debate after the admirable speech of my right hon. Friend the Member for South Wiltshire (Mr. S. Herbert); after the observations which I thought were justly made by the noble Lord the Member for the City of London (Lord John Russell) on the speech of the right hon. Chancellor of the Exchequer; and, lastly, let me add with greater satisfaction still, after the soothing effect and the fair and moderate tone of the speech of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Home Department. I am content entirely to pass by that portion of the discussion which has related to the antecedent conduct of the Gentlemen who now hold the reins of power; but I heard from the lips of the hon. Gentleman the Member for the West Riding (Mr. Cobden) an appeal to the Friends of the late Sir Robert Peel, and an expression of astonishment on his part at the course which they intended to pursue, and of his incapacity to understand how it was possible that they could consent, upon a question of Free Trade, to be found voting in the same lobby with the party of Protectionists. That appeal it was quite impossible that I should consent on this occasion to hear in silence. The reasons why upon this occasion the Friends of the late Sir Robert Peel will be found voting in favour of the Amendment of my noble Friend the Member for Tiverton (Viscount Palmerston), which is likewise supported by Her Majesty's Government and their followers, is because they believe that vote to be dictated by a regard to the principles of justice. I am quite certain that the hon. Gentleman the Member for Wolverhampton (Mr. C. Villiers), when he proceeded to frame this Motion, did not intend in any manner to embitter party warfare, or to introduce into the usages of our conflicts what might hereafter be a precedent for greater severity and greater exasperation than those by which they have been commonly attended. It would appear from the explanation we have heard to-night that the object of the words to which objection is, I think not unjustly, taken, is simply to preclude the consideration of the question of what has been called compensation.

Now, I really must deny—I must meet broadly, with the expression of an entirely opposite opinion, the declaration of the hon. Member for the West Riding—that the point on which we are to divide in opposite lobbies to-night is, according as we are convinced, on the one hand, that the subject of compensation for the repeal of the Corn Laws may be admitted, or, on the other hand, are convinced that no such subject should be entertained. I say that, from no rational construction of these words, is it possible to deduce such a conclusion. You rely upon the fact that you find there the statement that the repeal of the Corn Laws was just. Why, surely it is perfectly possible that that or any other great measure might be just, and might be imperatively required by the principles of justice, and yet from its operation there might collaterally arise claims for relief and compensation such as it would be impossible to resist. It may be just to abolish a sinecure, but it may likewise be just to afford compensation to the holder. It was just to emancipate the negro slaves in the West Indies, but Parliament likewise deemed it just to give compensation to those who had been their masters. Do not understand that I am now expressing an opinion that these doctrines are applicable to this case. I am simply arguing that the words on which you rely are totally unequal to bear the sense that the hon. Gentleman the Member for the West Riding has sought to put upon them. I speak with unfeigned deference with regard to any opinion of that hon. Gentleman on the question of Free Trade. I do not forget or undervalue the services which he has rendered to that cause. Agree you may in his general politics, or you may not; complain you may, if you think you have cause, of the mode and the force with which, in the freedom of debate, he commonly states his opinions in this House; but it is impossible for us to deny that those benefits of which we are now acknowledging the existence are in no small part at any rate due to labours in which he has borne so prominent a share.

Therefore, Sir, it is from no wish or idea to depreciate the praise which he has so fairly earned, that I venture most decidedly to differ from the course which he recommended on that occasion. The distinction which may be fairly taken, as it appears to me is this, the right hon. Secretary of State for the Home Department has told us that he does not think it was wise in 1846, or that it was just—taking the words with reference to the then position of public affairs—for the House to sanction the repeal of the Corn Laws; but if I understood the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary for the Home Department aright, he thinks that the repeal, if it be just and wise, should be maintained. Then what is the difference between us? It is this, that we are united—I don't speak of those who, like the hon. and learned Gentleman who last addressed the House, will support by their votes the policy which he has so candidly approved—but that all of us, I say, who are combined in voting for the Resolution of my noble Friend the Member for Tiverton are agreed in the opinion that we must now not submit as a matter of necessity, and as a choice of evils, to support the policy of Free Trade, but that we will adopt that policy as a system—that we are now resolved to adopt it, not from a mere sense of submission to an iron yoke, but because we believe its maintenance to be both “wise, just, and beneficial.” Then, Sir, if this be so, the difference between us is, that those who support the Motion of my hon. Friend the Member for Wolverhampton insist that now, in the end of the year 1852, we shall travel back to 1846, and that we shall revive and renew the circumstances that then existed—that we, who now agree, shall, although we now agree, go back and oppose those with whom we once differed, and this for the purpose of preventing a united and overpowering expression of opinion in defence of the system of Free Trade. Such, Sir, I say is the public policy of the case; and I venture to put it with great confidence to the hon. Gentleman that in his Resolution he has taken steps and adopted a form of language which, so far as my knowledge goes, is entirely without Parliamentary precedent. It is a matter of the highest importance, as it appears to me, that we should not be responsible for giving in our own persons, our own conduct, and our own words, any example that can hereafter be quoted as a precedent and as a warrant for conduct that has usually been observed in political warfare in this country. I don't mean to say that there is no precedent for passing a Resolution similar in spirit to this; but I do intend to put it to this House, that there is no case in which this House has adopted such a Resolution as that of the hon. Member for Wolverhampton. I will advert, if the House will permit me, to an instance in point. It is not one that has been mentioned in the course of this debate, but it bears much more closely on the subject as an example of the view which the House of Commons has taken, of matters of this kind, than some that have been adverted to. It refers to what is popularly known as the Appropriation Clause. I refer to it without the slightest intention or desire to revive one thought of bitterness that may be connected with it. The noble Lord the Member for the City of London, who in the course of his long and distinguished career has often been the champion of causes in their infancy and weakness which he has soon brought to manhood and to victory, can well afford to have an allusion made to one of the rare cases in which his efforts have been baffled, and that by a majority of Members in this House. But he will well remember that after he had ejected Sir Robert Peel from office, in 1835, after he had constructed his Government, mainly with reference to that broad difference of parties which was developed by what is called the Appropriation Clause, he fought the battle manfully for several years, and endeavoured to induce Parliament to adopt the views which he had embodied in an abstract Resolution. In 1838 the noble Lord was obliged to give way. He stated that no Tithe Bill could conduce to the welfare of Ireland in which there was not some provision made for the religious education of the people. My hon. Friend the Member for Devonshire made a Motion in a spirit approximating to this. The hon. Baronet met the noble Lord by proposing that before the House proceeded to contradict by its acts its solemn declaration, it should rescind the Resolution it had passed. But the noble Lord the Member for the City of London said, "You have gained your purpose, the legislation is to be in your sense, but do not ask this House to disturb the Act of 1835." The noble Lord, who was then Secretary for Ireland, than whom a man of purer honour does not exist, rallied his friends round the Government, saying, "You are not content with having reversed our course, but you now ask us to adopt your own words." That appeal was successful, and the Resolution of the hon. Baronet was rejected. But I am not sorry the Government was successful, and that we failed in consequence. I trust now, Sir, notwithstanding an extraordinary prolongation of the contest which we are now closing, that a similar spirit of moderation and forbearance still predominates in this House. And I will take leave to tell the hon. Gentleman the Member for the West Riding that there is no force in his appeal to me, when he quotes the name of Sir Robert Peel, not because that name is not venerated and appreciated in my eyes, but because I am convinced, that in giving the vote we are about to give in favour of the Resolution of my noble Friend the Member for Tiverton, we are taking the course which would have been the course of Sir Robert Peel himself.

Sir, it is our honour and our pride to be his followers; and, I say, if we are his followers, let us imitate him in that magnanimity which was one of the most distinguishing characteristics of the man. When Sir Robert Peel severed a political connexion of thirty-five years' standing, he knew and felt the price he was paying for the performance of his duty. It was no small matter, Sir, in an advanced stage of life like his, to break up, and to break up for ever, too, its habits and its associations. He looked, indeed, for his revenge; but for what revenge did he look? He did not seek for a vindication through the medium of any stinging speeches or Motions made or carried in favour of his policy, if they bore a sense of pain or degradation to the minds of honourable men. His vindication was this: He knew the wisdom of his measures would secure their acceptance; he knew those who opposed them from erroneous opinions would acknowledge them after competent experience; he looked to see them established in the esteem and in the judgment of the country; he looked to see them govern by sure degrees the policy of every nation in the civilised world; he knew he would have his reward, first of all, in the enormous good that he was the instrument, in the hands of Providence, of effecting; and, secondly, in the reputation which he knew would be his own appropriate desert. And as to that aristocracy whose purposes he might feel he was then somewhat violently thwarting, I am convinced that, with a prophetic eye, he anticipated the day when every man who reviled him—if they were men, as he believed them to be, of honest judgment and intention, though perhaps using towards him opprobrious language, never so ill-deserved—that they were men who would in the course of time see that he never rendered them so great and solid a service as when, with the whole power of the Government, he proposed to Parliament the repeal of the Corn Laws. His belief was that their cause was a great and sacred cause; that the aristocracy of England were elements in its political and social system with which the welfare of the country was inseparably bound up; and to him it was a noble object of ambition to redeem such a cause from associations with a policy originally adopted in a state of imperfect knowledge and with erroneous view, but which, when the clear light of the day was poured upon it, should be found, in the daily experience, and in the light and view of the thinking portion of the community, to bear the character of much that was sordid and much that was false. He anticipated, Sir, I am convinced, those bloodless and those painless rewards which it would have been honourable and delightful to him, had it pleased God to spare his own life, which will be delightful and honourable to the hon. Member for Bury (Mr. F. Peel), and all who are entitled to claim kindred with that great man, and which are delightful to us who have had the privilege of combating by his side, and who are now, as fondly as ever attached to his memory. This is the vindication to which he looked, and seeing we are now celebrating the obsequies of this obnoxious policy, and are now seeking to adopt a declaration admitted on all hands to be perfectly clear in its assertion of the principle of Free Trade, if we still cherish the desire to trample on those who have fought manfully, and been defeated fairly, let us endeavour to put it away from ourselves, to rejoice in the great public good that has been achieved, and let us take courage, from the attainment of that good, for the performance of public duty in future.

MR. NEWDEGATE said, he claimed the indulgence of the House for a few moments while he alluded to a matter somewhat personal. He assured the House that he thoroughly reciprocated the spirit of the eloquent speech which had just proceeded from the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the University of Oxford, and that he rose in that spirit to address them. When the hon. Member for the West Riding (Mr. Cobden) said yesterday that if any measures of relief to the agricultural interest were attempted to be introduced into that House, he would excite another agitation out of doors as virulent as the one which he had carried on with respect to the repeal of the Corn Laws, he (Mr. Newdegate) remarked that the hon. Member was a successful demagogue, with a good will to become an autocrat. That expression seemed to have irritated the hon. Member. It was made by himself under feelings of excitement, and he thought that it might be considered scarcely Parliamentary. He begged, therefore, to retract the expression as unparliamentary. But he put it to the House, whether the language of that hon. Member, not only in that House but out of it, with respect to those who were opposed to him in political opinions, but whose convictions were as honest as his own, were not calculated to raise feelings of honest indignation in the breast of every honest man to whom they were applied? The hon. Gentleman had charged those on that side of the House as being guilty of deluding the farmers; but he (Mr. Newdegate) had always honestly striven in the cause which he believed to be the cause of justice, and he would not sit down quietly under the charge of deception, for he could prove by documents, if it were necessary, that no sooner did he think the prospect of reverting to the former system of commercial policy doubtful of attainment, than he warned the protection societies of the fact. One great good which would be obtained by the settlement of this question would be, that it would deprive the hon. Member for the West Riding of a theme which he incessantly used to set class against class. He (Mr. Newdegate) should vote against both Resolutions, because they deliberately reflected upon conduct of which he himself was not ashamed. He had deluded and betrayed no man: he had never betrayed the late Sir Robert Peel; for when that right hon. Baronet signed the requisition to himself as a candidate for the representation of North Warwickshire, in 1843, he told that right hon. Baronet that if he introduced measures to restrict the currency, and to repeal the corn laws, he would place him in opposition to his Government. There was no man in the United Kingdom who had so little reason to be surprised at his conduct, in 1846, as had the late Sir Robert Peel. He must express his thanks to the noble Lord the Member for Tiverton for the course which he had taken; and he assured the noble Lord, that, could he (Mr. Newdegate) have voted for any Free Trade Motion, he would have voted for his. As a Gentleman, the noble Lord had been desirous of conciliating the feelings of Gentlemen; he had acted in that manly, straightforward spirit which had always characterised his conduct in that House. When the Amendment of the noble Lord the Member for Tiverton was put, he (Mr. Newdegate), for the reasons he had already given, should leave the House without voting upon it; but nothing should prevent his voting against the Resolution of the hon. Member for Wolverhampton.

MR. C. VILLIERS said, that in rising to reply, he should detain the House for only a few moments in the exercise of the privilege which attached to him as the mover of the Resolution then before the House; but some remarks had been made in the course of the debate with respect to the Motion he had brought forward, which, for the sake of his own character, required he should say something. He believed and hoped that it was the last time that he should ever have to make a Motion on the same subject—certainly he thought he should not appear again in the same position, which was that of representing different sections in the House who did not exactly agree together. He was indeed afraid he had not been well selected for the purpose. He had been chosen for a reason which had been stated in the course of the debate, and by which he felt himself much flattered. He should never have thought of saying so much for himself, but it had been said that he had been a consistent advocate of the great policy of Free Trade for a long time, and that in advocating that measure his purpose had always been single. It had been said of him, indeed, that he was one among the few whose conduct had not been tainted with any sinister purpose in the matter. Now, if he deserved that character still, he feared that it had rather disqualified him from being the mover upon this occasion, for he had kept the purpose of the Motion simply in view, while it seemed that other objects should have been considered. He could not say that he had come forward against his will; on the contrary, he had done so readily and consistently with the course which he had received the credit of having hitherto pursued on the question; but he had done so at the request of others, whose purpose and feelings he believed were identical with his own, being a majority of that House; and, under these circumstances, he had proposed a Resolution which certainly embodied his own feelings, which he believed embodied the opinions of a majority of that House, and, what was of more importance, of a majority of the people of this country; and though he told the House last night that he had not the credit of being the author of the Resolution, he certainly had a great deal to do with it, and he was prepared to take the whole responsibility of it, for he was not at all ashamed of it. It was not determined upon without a great deal of consideration, and many persons were consulted about it. An hon. Friend of his behind him reminded him of the proverb that "too many cooks spoil the broth." That was sometimes the case, and was, perhaps, so in this instance. But he wished to tell the House the truth upon this subject, though very strong observations had been made upon the terms of this Resolution by some hon. Gentlemen who were more practised as politicians than himself. He had been charged by them with bringing forward a Motion without Parliamentary precedent, which was ungenerous in its character, and which seemed to have the object of wounding the feelings of hon. Gentlemen opposite; charges which, whether owing to his simplicity and folly he knew not, but which he regarded as serious imputations cast upon himself. Now, the Resolution was agreed to before the Amendment was proposed; and if a Resolution was so objectionable in its character and object, it must have been equally so when it was first proposed, and could not be affected by any Amendment subsequently moved; and yet the House must learn that, whether he referred to the noble Lord who moved the Amendment, or to the right hon. Gentleman who represented the University of Oxford, who had so eloquently addressed the House, or to other Gentlemen on this side who had spoken against his Resolution, and were going to vote against it, they had all approved of the terms of the Resolution, and most of them had been consulted before it was proposed, and some of them thought they were quite unexceptionable. [Mr. GLADSTONE expressed dissent.] The right hon. Gentleman expresses his dissent. The right hon. Member did not say that there was no Amendment that he would not have preferred, or that he would not have been satisfied with, instead of the Resolution; but he saw this Resolution, and he saw nothing in it itself that he considered unworthy of his support; and he intended to support it, if the Amendment had not been moved. That was, therefore, quite consistent with the idea that his (Mr. Villiers') Motion was unexceptionable. Well, then, with regard to the noble Member for Tiverton—one of the most experienced

Members of that House—if there had been anything ungentlemanlike or unparliamentary in the Resolution, would surely have taken exception to it; but the ungenteel words were submitted to the noble Lord, who did not object to them. He (Mr. C. Villiers) understood that the terms which were offensive to hon. Gentlemen opposite were the words “wise and just.” Well, the noble Lord, who was kind enough to give him his advice upon the matter, let those words pass—saw no objection to them whatever. The noble Lord, indeed, so far as he (Mr. C. Villiers) remembered, pointed out something else that he considered objectionable in the Resolution as it was originally drawn, and, feeling the weight of the noble Lord’s opinion, from his wisdom and experience—though it was rather troublesome to do so—made the alteration that met the views of the noble Lord. He did not mean to say that the noble Lord’s Amendment might not be more expedient or better worded than his own, though, in fact, he could not distinguish very much the difference between them. It had been said that night, indeed, that the noble Lord’s Resolution was stronger than his own, and other persons who spoke against the words of this Resolution had seen and approved of them before they were proposed; he asked, then, of the House with what justice the charges were brought against him, that he had proposed what was without precedent and full of danger, expressly to insult hon. Gentlemen opposite? He had done nothing, in fact, but in conformity with the request made to him, prepared a Resolution which, as nearly as possible, represented the opinion of the country—an opinion which was admitted to exist even by the Government themselves. “There is an overwhelming majority,” said the First Minister of the Crown in another place, whose statement was re-echoed by his Colleagues in that House, “in favour of Free Trade;” that there was no chance of getting a majority in that House against a Free-Trade policy; and it was admitted by the hon. Member for West Surrey (Mr. Drummond)—and, indeed, on all sides—that there was a necessity for some such Motion as he had proposed, which might reflect the opinion of the country. He (Mr. C. Villiers) had farther only proposed to declare what was admitted in the Queen’s Speech, that the condition of the country, and particularly of the industrious classes, was improved, and that that improvement was the result of recent commercial legislation, and particularly of the Act of 1846, which established the free admission of foreign corn, and which, therefore, as he said, was a wise, just, and beneficial measure. That was all he had proposed, and it was for that these heavy charges had been brought against him. But what was really the distinction between his Resolution and the Amendment before the House? for that was what they were going to vote upon. The Amendment states that it is the opinion of the House that the improved condition of the country, and particularly of the industrious classes —“is mainly the result of recent legislation, which has established the principle of unrestricted competition, has abolished taxes imposed for the purpose of protection, and has thereby diminished the price and increased the abundance of the principal articles of the food of the people.”

Now, the great difference between the two sides of the House, taking, for instance, the opinion of the hon. Member for Cambridgeshire (Mr. E. Ball), was, that Free Trade had produced no such effects. If there were a bonâ fide Amendment to that effect, he should think it perfectly fair, and could understand it. But let the country fully understand what it was that the House was now going to divide upon. It was not a question between Protection and Free Trade; whether the condition of the people had been improved by the recent change in the policy of the country or not; but whether that which was acknowledged by all to have improved the condition of the people was a wise, just, and beneficial measure. That was the point upon which every hon. Member who voted against the Resolution would express his opinion. Every one who would vote in favour of the Resolution would state by his vote that the Act which had improved the condition of the people was a wise, just, and beneficial measure; while all who voted against it would declare that they admitted the fact that the condition of the people had been improved, but that the measure which improved their condition was not a wise, just, and beneficial measure. And that brought one to the consideration of why there was to be this difference between people who agreed upon the essential point in question? Why, it had been pretty well surmised already; but if it was intended to be kept secret, better care should have been taken to have kept down the hon. Member for Youghal, as well as other Members who had informed them what was the inconvenience of calling the Act of 1846 wise? Why did the hon. Gentlemen opposite allow the hon. and learned Member for Youghal (Mr. Butt) and some other Members, to speak, for they had disclosed the secret? they had shown what stood in the way of declaring the Act of 1846 to be just and beneficial. Why, there was something behind the curtain. They had heard something of projects of compensation; but if the Act that set free the trade in food, and enabled the people to be happy and contented, and had been attended with no evil, was a wise and just Act, where was the title in anybody to be compensated for it? The fact was that a substitute for Protection was intended and expected. "Trust us," hon. Gentlemen opposite said to their constituents, "we have done you some good before at the expense of the community, and we will do so again. We can't continue the old story of Protection, but rely upon us; we never deceived you; trust us, and we will find you a substitute for Protection." Hon. Gentlemen opposite had all gone round to their constituents, and had said what they were obliged to say—"We can't restore Protection, but believe us to be your friends, and we will give you something as good;" and the only reason for which it was sought to exclude the words, "just and beneficial" from the Resolution was, because they might preclude some substitute for Protection which would be exclusively for the advantage of the landed interest. The hon. Member for West Surrey, for whom he entertained the sincerest respect, had admitted very candidly that such a Resolution as he (Mr. C. Villiers) had proposed was required, and that the terms employed in the Resolution were precisely those that the occasion required. He had, moreover, generously, in the midst of all this most unworthy imputation of motive, referred to those very terms that were employed this evening, as those which the earnest advocates of free trade contended for as the result of the repeal of the corn laws ten years ago, and when the present adherents of free trade were its most vehement opponents. That hon. Gentleman could not vote for his Resolution, because he had some constituents who had suffered in the cause of what had been for the general good, and they would hardly be reconciled to his voting for that measure as 'just' by which they had lost. If other hon. Gentlemen had spoken as candidly, there might have been some reason for striking out any words in the Resolution that might have been misunderstood. He had used the word 'just' for the simple purpose for which he had stated; and would not that hon. Gentleman admit, that if he might be misunderstood if he voted for the Resolution, that he (Mr. Villiers) might be misrepresented also if he withdrew the word 'just' then, which he had been in the habit for ten years past of applying to the same measure? If he withdrew the words, would not the natural inference be that he agreed in the assertion which had been made by two Ministers of the Crown, that the measure of 1846 was "unjust?" If he consented to withdraw, then, would it not imply that they had committed an error, when one hon. Member after another on the opposite side avowed that they did not consider the measure just, that Protection should be retained, and that it was no advantage to have the repeal of the Corn Laws? The right hon. Baronet the Member for Droitwich (Sir J. Pakington), and the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Midhurst (Mr. Walpole), two Ministers of the Crown, had avowed that they did not think the repeal of the Corn Laws was just in principle, and he could not expect them to assent to his Resolution. He owned when he proposed the Resolution he did not expect that any person on the opposite side would think it was wise or just, because the Government did not come forward as converts—they submitted to a necessity. If any Members of the Government said they were converts, the case would be different, but they said they were not converts; they only bowed and submitted to necessity. There would be a reason for considering the feelings of hon. Gentlemen if they were converts; but as they were not converts, the argument of the noble Lord (Viscount Palmerston), and the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Gladstone), that they should consider their feelings and be tender with them, utterly failed. He had never thought of proposing a Resolution to please those who were opposed to him, and he had never heard that doctrine preached before to-night. He thought if this regard was to be paid to their opponents' feelings, more attention should be given by hon. Gentlemen who gave this advice, as to what they said themselves; and he must say he was astonished to hear the speech of his right

hon. Friend the Member for South Wiltshire; he thought that his right hon. Friend had said much more that was offensive in his speech to Gentlemen opposite, than he had by any terms he had used in his Resolution. He (Mr. C. Villiers) should not like to say so much; he did not think he ever said the things that his right hon. Friend had said. Nor was he very consistent in what he did say; for he first laboured to show how extremely unjust a Corn Law must be—saying that if there was one class who ought to be less favoured than another, it was the landowners, who had so many advantages besides, and that there could be no justice in a law that had so favoured them. He said, if ever there was an act of wisdom of the Legislature, or if ever there was a law that, from its timely enactment, had saved them from great calamity, it was the Act of 1846 that repealed the Corn Law. He regarded it as having saved the country from Revolution in 1848. In short, according to his view, it was the justest measure that ever was passed, and, under the circumstances, the wisest; but, added the right hon. Gentleman, let us remember the rules of regular warfare, let us be kind, let us not call that measure wise and just, which is eminently so, let us forbear to those who would have resisted its enactment, who never showed forbearance, and who are not yet converted; let us pass the Amendment of the noble Lord (Viscount Palmerston), which avoids giving this righteous act its proper designation. He (Mr. C. Villiers) was perfectly willing to listen to any argument that would be advanced to change any course that he had adopted; but he asked anybody to place himself in his position, and, referring to the long experience he had had in connexion with this question, the invariable manner in which he had called for the repeal of the Corn Laws, in the name of justice and wisdom, say whether there was anything in these inconsistent remonstrances of Gentlemen who proposed to abandon him at the last moment—to induce him, by implication, to declare that the repeal of the Corn Law was unwise and unjust? He proposed nothing new, and he was asked to change his Motion, really, not to meet the scruples of honest converts, but to satisfy the convenience of helpless adherents to the old law, who wanted to substitute for protection something equally favourable to their friends. It was now avowedly to these ulterior views that he was now called upon to withdraw his Resolution. He could give no account of such a proceeding to those who had confidence in his integrity in this matter: this Amendment was quite unintelligible to the people—they were straightforward, they were satisfied with Free Trade—they had pronounced the measure to be wise and just. They asked their representatives in the House of Commons to declare their opinion. He could not understand an argument that had been used against the Resolution, that it was interruption to the business of the House, and unfair to the Government. That argument could not have any weight with those who had originated the Amendment, for they had principally recommended that some Resolution should be moved. He asked, then, the real friends of free trade to consider the motives that actuated him (Mr. Villiers) in proposing the Resolution, the reasons he assigned for adhering to it, and to support him. He had the greatest respect for the memory of the late Sir Robert Peel, but must candidly say that it was from no feeling of sentiment that he had proposed those words, “wise and just,” or with any reference to the memory of that most eminent man, but he had introduced them because the wisdom and justice of the measure had been shown by the result. He had no other object but to frame the Resolution in such a way as to establish a comparison between Free Trade and the former policy that prevailed, and he was utterly incapable of explaining why any honest free-trader should differ with him.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON: Sir, I am quite aware that I have no right to present myself to the House again on this question, but as my hon. Friend (Mr. C. Villiers) mentioned a circumstance which occurred between himself and me, perhaps the House will indulge me for a few moments. It is perfectly true, as my hon. Friend stated, that one evening, towards the end of the night, he showed me, at the end of that bench, a draught of the Resolution he was about to propose. I considered that he showed it to me for the purpose of seeing whether it was framed in such a manner as that I could vote for for it. I pointed out a part of it to which I could not agree. I argued with him at some length, and that passage did not appear in the Resolution as proposed. The Resolution was laid on the table. Immediately notice was given of an Amendment on the part of the Government. I then wrote to my hon. Friend. I think I said I presumed the objection of the Government was founded on a particular part of his Resolution. I stated I was sorry to see that the Motion which was intended to lead to a solemn affirmation by Parliament of a great principle of domestic policy was about to degenerate into a mere ordinary party struggle, and I entreated my hon. Friend to endeavour, by communication with the Government, to frame some form of words which might be accepted, if not unanimously, by a large majority of the House. My hon. Friend (and he will excuse me if I am obliged to go into our private conversation afterwards, but it is absolutely necessary) said that he would see me afterwards in the House. I saw him, and we talked over the matter; and, without stating the particular conversation, it is sufficient to say that what he told me left the impression on my mind that my hon. Friend was not the master of his own conduct, and that he was in the hands of other persons. It is, therefore, not fair in my hon. Friend to lead the House to suppose that, by not objecting to that part of his Resolution which led to the Amendment, I made no objection till I moved the Resolution. I wrote that note. He is perfectly at liberty to make what use he pleases of it, to show it to whom he likes, and to read it wherever he pleases.

MR. GLADSTONE: Sir, I am about to request the indulgence of the House for a purpose similar to that of my noble Friend, and I shall have to ask for even more forbearance. If we are to be put into a glass beehive, with reference to the whole proceedings connected with the formation of this Resolution, I can only say that there is not a word I have spoken or written which is not entirely in the hands of the House. I have thought it prudent to carry the correspondence in my pocket since these explanations. All I shall now say is this, that, being aware of the numerous misunderstandings which arise in the course of such communications, I thought it but just to declare that my hon. Friend (Mr. C. Villiers) was actuated by upright and single-hearted motives in the whole of his proceedings. But with respect to the charge which he has thought proper to make against me, I meet it by stating, without going into detail, that I believe the Motion was put on the table of the House at Twelve o'clock on Wednesday, the 17th of November; and on Tuesday, the 16th of November, at Six o'clock, I wrote a note to the hon. Gentleman, and immediately despatched it to the address from which he had written to me, demurring to the terms of this Resolution in the precise part to which I objected to-night, on the ground that they would prevent from voting with him many men who, though originally opponents to corn law repeal, had since honourably and sincerely acquiesced in it.

MR. C. VILLIERS said, that not a single word had fallen from the noble Lord (Viscount Palmerston) which did not completely confirm all that he (Mr. C. Villiers) had himself stated. For what he had said was, that the noble Lord had seen the Resolution containing the terms which had since been considered so objectionable, and that those terms were not at that time objected to by the noble Lord; and what he (Mr. C. Villiers) had now argued was, that if those terms were objectionable at one time they were so at another. With regard to what the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Gladstone) had said, he (Mr. C. Villiers) would merely say, that the right hon. Gentleman stated that he had been informed that the right hon. Chancellor of the Exchequer considered that the exceptionable words had been inserted in the Resolution expressly for the purpose of preventing hon. Gentlemen on the Ministerial benches from concurring in the vote, and his (Mr. C. Villiers') reply to the right hon. Gentleman was, that no such intention had influenced him in inserting those words.

Words added :—Main Question put,

“ That it is the opinion of this House, that the improved condition of the Country, and especially of the Industrious Classes, is mainly the result of recent Legislation, which has established the principle of unrestricted competition, has abolished Taxes imposed for the purposes of Protection, and has thereby diminished the cost and increased the abundance of the principal articles of the Food of the People."

Resolved—

“That it is the opinion of this House, that this Policy, firmly maintained and prudently extended, will, without inflicting injury on any important Interest, best enable the Industry of the Country to bear its burthens, and will thereby most surely promote the welfare and contentment of the People.”

Resolved—

“That this House will be ready to take into consideration any measures, consistent with these principles, which, in pursuance of Her Majesty's gracious Speech and Recommendation, may be laid before it."

MILITARY PENSIONERS.

LORD PANMURE rose to put a question to the noble Earl at the head of the Government, of which he had given him notice. Before, however, putting his question, he hoped he might be permitted to enter into a short preliminary explanation of the subject to which his question related, in order that he might render the question itself more clear and intelligible. His question had reference to a meritorious class of individuals who had rendered considerable public service in various parts of the world—he meant the body of pensioners belonging to the British Army. It would be in the recollection of their Lordships that in 1843 his noble and gallant Friend, now Commander of the Army, but who then held the office which he (Lord Panmure) had afterwards the honour of holding—that of Secretary at War—introduced a measure for enrolling the pensioners who had received pensions for long service into a body fit for service under arms. When he (Lord Panmure) had the honour of succeeding to that office which his noble and gallant Friend had held with so much advantage to the public, he found that those pensioners had been of so much advantage to the public service, that he brought a Bill into the House of Commons, to which that House subsequently assented, to increase their number from 10,000, at which Lord Hardinge had fixed it, to 30,000, the number now enrolled. Those pensioners had been enrolled for nearly ten years, and had served the country with a zeal and fidelity which it was not necessary for him to praise, because all who had had anything to do with them had highly commended them. In 1847, so beneficial were their services esteemed in this country, that Earl Grey, who was then head of the Colonial Office, and himself (Lord Panmure), who was then in the War Office, thought it right to extend their services to the Colonies; and accordingly in 1847 they first sent pensioners out to New Zealand, where they had proved themselves extremely useful in the then disturbed state of that colony. Those men had proved themselves efficient, not only in rendering military service to the Crown, but they were the means of enabling the authorities in this country to withdraw a portion of the Queen's troops from that colony. The pensioners were sent out on certain conditions; they were to have certain accommodation afforded, in the shape of houses, with lands attached to them, which they were to be permitted to cultivate and improve. In New Zealand, Australia, and Van Diemen's Land, to each of which colonies the Government sent bodies of men, these conditions had been faithfully kept; and the result was, that these pensioners were contented and faithful, and the services which they rendered to the Crown were undeniable. From that part of the world the noble Earl, late Colonial Secretary, and himself directed their views to Canada, where they found a considerable number of pensioners located who were not enrolled. It was deemed advisable to send Major Drummond out there in order to ascertain whether these pensioners were capable of service, and if the Government in the Canadian colonies had any control over any portion of the land there which might be granted to those pensioners when they came to settle in the different localities to which they were sent. It was found that there were certain military reserves in Canada which were at the disposal of the Government, and that in the neighbourhood of Montreal and Toronto the Ordnance had entire control over certain military reserves, which, if they were disposed to surrender, would suit admirably for the purpose of locating pensioners upon. In communicating with the Ordnance they found that there was no difficulty on their part in surrendering those lands for the use of the number of pensioners it was then thought requisite or safe to send out at one period. They accordingly sent out a certain detachment to Canada, and the Government were consequently enabled to withdraw many of their troops from that colony also. In one portion of the Canadas, all the conditions which had been made with the pensioners had been faithfully fulfilled, and he believed that there was not a more contented or loyal body to be found than were located in that particular part of Canada. Elsewhere, he understood that the condition held out to the pensioners, though partially had not been entirely fulfilled; for instance, at Toronto. In sending the pensioners to Toronto, the conditions entered into with them were exactly the same as in the other places, namely, that they should receive a certain portion of those lands which they were to cultivate, and to hold upon certain terms. Now he understood that these pensioners had been there for many months—there were 220 of them settled at Toronto—and no steps had been as yet taken to fulfil the conditions upon which they were sent there. He did not wish to throw any blame upon the Government in this matter—all he wished was, to draw their attention to the fact. He was sure that the noble Earl must be aware that no body of men were so jealous of any infringement of any conditions made with them as old soldiers and sailors, who had served their country for many years, and had retired upon pensions. Their Lordships might recollect the unfortunate step taken in 1831, in sending out old soldiers to Canada, and inducing them to commute their pensions to four years' purchase. They might remember the sad fate of many of the men who were led to enter into that melancholy bargain. It happened to him when Secretary at War to have had occasion to call upon the public to reimburse those men for the losses they had sustained, and a more grateful task he had never had to perform. That, however, should be a caution to us as to how we sent pensioners abroad in the present day, upon conditions which were not only written, but which were printed and put into each man's hand on the authority and honour of the Secretary of State and the Secretary at War for the time being. He wished to impress upon the Government that they should lose no time in settling with these old soldiers upon terms that would prove satisfactory to them. They might rely on it, according as they increased that force, that they would have the best system of military colonisation that could be possibly adopted, and they would be increasing in the Colonies the number of loyal subjects, who would be ever loyal to the Queen, and bound by other obligations to the service of this country. Having said so much by way of explanation, he would now ask the noble Earl whether it was true that these conditions had not as yet been fulfilled, so far as regarded the pensioners who were settled at Toronto? Whether it was the intention of the Government to carry out those conditions? or, if the Government found those conditions to be impracticable, or in case some unexpected difficulty had arisen, whether they were prepared to offer any compensation, so as to remunerate those pensioners for the failure of the conditions entered into with the former Government?

The EARL of DERBY said, that though he agreed with the noble Lord in many parts of his speech, there was one part of it in which he entirely and most especially agreed—namely, that a succeeding Government, whatever opinion it might entertain of the policy which dictated them, was bound to carry out fully the engagements into which its predecessors had entered with any class of persons. He further agreed with the noble Lord in his observation that there was no class of men with whom it was more incumbent that good faith should be strictly observed than that class of men to whom he had more particularly referred—namely, the discharged pensioners of the Army and Navy. At the same time, he must remark that he entertained strong doubts whether the system to which the noble Lord had adverted, and which had been in partial operation for the last three or four years, was likely to be productive of so much unmixed benefit as the noble Lord expected; and he could not but fear that some inconvenience would result, as had resulted on a former occasion, from sending out old pensioners to engage in a mode of life for which their previous habits had unfitted them; and, moreover, that you would not gain from them in another country that military protection for which the noble Lord was such an advocate. That had, however, nothing to do with the question of good faith. He doubted the policy of the original scheme; and he doubted it the more, because there was no provision made, as their Lordships were well aware, for the removal of these old soldiers from the little plots on which they were located when they were incapable of military service, or of working on and cultivating their land. Consequently, at no distant period you would have settled on lands near the town a pauperised and discontented population. The facts, as stated by the noble Lord, were, that up to the present moment the conditions held out to the pensioners sent to Toronto had not been fulfilled. That was not the fault of the present Government, but arose out of the course adopted by their predecessors in sending the men out with a promise of locating them immediately on land without having previously ascertained whether there was any such land at the disposal of Government. He held in his hand at that moment the printed conditions on which the pensioners had been sent out. It was there stated that the pensioners were to receive a free passage and rations for themselves and families to such countries as the Government might determine upon for their future habitation and service. There were to be certain advances made to them for the purpose of building houses, and from three to four acres of land were to be allotted to each man in the immediate neighbourhood of towns, upon which these houses, or rather cottages, were to be built. He doubted the policy of that arrangement; for, though it was clear that the pensioners might eke out an existence in this manner while they were capable of military service and of working on the land; yet, when strength failed them for one or both, there was no provision made for the support either of themselves or of their families. There was also another point in the printed conditions which must not be overlooked. "It must be distinctly understood that the grant of land depends on the quantity available by Government, and that the want of it affords no claim for compensation. All that will be insured is a free passage to Upper Canada, where provisions are cheap, and where employment can be easily obtained." Now, in the case of the pensioners at Toronto these were the facts: 220 of them had been sent out. The expectation held out to them was, that from two to three acres of land would be granted to them in the neighbourhood of that town. The whole of the Ordnance reserve in Toronto, if every inch were made available for this purpose, amounted to less than 400 acres; so that it would be insufficient, even at a minimum allowance, for 220 persons. Whether the late Government was aware of the fact or no he could not say: but the fact was that, supposing all the Ordnance reserve had been available, 270 or 280 acres of it were let under a lease to the corporation of Toronto. Therefore, all the disposable land under the control of the Government was only 120 acres, even supposing you wanted none of it for Ordnance purposes. Now, there had been a dispute for some time between the corporation of Toronto and the Government on this point—namely, how far the Government had power to rescind that lease?

Now, that point ought to have been ascertained before the pensioners were sent out. A great portion of time had been consumed in discussion between the corporation of Toronto and the Government upon the powers of this lease; and recently a proposition had been made by the corporation of Toronto, that if the Government would allow them to take 100 acres for the purpose of forming it into a park for the town of Toronto, they would pay 1,000*l.* for the clearing of the wilderness—for such it was—in order that the pensioners might be comfortably and satisfactorily settled in their location, though smaller than at first contemplated. There was also a further deduction to be made from the quantity of land available to the purposes of the Ordnance. By an Act of the Colonial Parliament passed three or four years ago, to which the Ordnance had paid at the time little or no attention, power was given to a certain railway to cut right through the centre of this land. The railway had, therefore, taken nine acres more. Here, then, was another element of uncertainty, which thus rendered it impossible for the Government to settle these pensioners in the immediate neighbourhood of Toronto in the way originally intended. Such was the condition in which they found this affair on their entering upon office; and such he believed it to be at the present moment; so that, unless some progress had recently been made in the negotiation, although the pensioners had been enrolled and called out, and served their twelve days, the conditions held out to them had not been fulfilled. While he said that the conditions had not been fulfilled, he thought it right, also, to add, that it was the duty of Her Majesty's Government, whatever it might think of the policy of the original bargain, to provide either literally for the fulfilment of the original contract, or for the making of such compensation to the pensioners as justice might require and they were willing to accept. There was another point which he must notice before he quitted this subject, and to which the noble Lord had not at all adverted—namely, the wisdom of disposing of lands in this way for Ordnance purposes. If this land near Toronto were to continue available for such purposes, it would be necessary to prohibit the construction of any extensive buildings upon it, and to limit the construction to cottages of a single story; but, if the land were not to be kept entirely clear for Ordnance purposes, in that case, from the circumstance of its close proximity to the city of Toronto, it might become valuable for building purposes; and yet, by the terms of this agreement with the pensioners, it must be let to them on short and terminable leases, thus rendering it less valuable, and, as an arrangement, not the best to be made for the parties themselves. It was clear that, if these parties had a right to claim to be placed on this land, and to have a lease granted to them of the cottage built thereon, and of the two acres to be attached to it, the general value of the land would be sacrificed in a way in which it ought not to be sacrificed. In his opinion it was not advisable to devote, as we were going to do, to permanent garden ground land which might be far more valuable for building purposes. He believed that these questions were under the consideration of Her Majesty's Government. The Colonial Secretary was giving his attention to them, and he hoped that at no very distant period there would be a satisfactory settlement of the whole of this question.

LORD PANMURE would be prepared to discuss the policy of this arrangement with the noble Earl at any future period he liked, but would not enter upon that discussion at present. His object in rising now was merely to deny the noble Earl's observation that the pensioners had been sent out without its having been previously ascertained whether the Government had any land whereon to locate them. The noble Earl laboured upon that point under a grievous mistake. Before the pensioners were sent to Toronto, Her Majesty's Government of that day had ascertained that the Ordnance had both the power and the will to surrender to them the land in question. He could not see any reason why such surrender was not made long ago. The whole question turned upon this:—When we took the land, it was, as the noble Earl truly said, part of the wilderness. The corporation of Toronto had leased a portion of it for the express purpose of making improvements. It failed in its engagement to do so; and he believed that the Ordnance had in consequence declared their lease to be forfeited. As to the objection taken by the noble Earl, that this land was wanted for the military defence of Toronto, he had only to say that he had himself visited Toronto; that it was a perfectly open place; that it had neither fortification nor battery; that the barracks which it contained were rather erected to keep the inhabitants in, than an enemy out; and that, to speak the plain truth, it was no more a fortified place than London was. On the most impoverished land in Canada the pensioners were doing well—no settlers better.

The EARL of DERBY reiterated his former statement, and added, that he had received an account only that morning, stating that the whole of this land ought to be kept clear, to prevent an enemy from approaching in the rear of Toronto, and from taking a position on those points from which the town could be most easily annoyed.

House adjourned till To-morrow.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

MINUTES.] NEW WRIT.—For Lisburne, v. Sir James Emerson Tennant.

PUBLIC BILLS.—2^o Courts of Common Law (Ireland); West India Colonies, &c., Loans Act Amendment.

COMMERCIAL LEGISLATION—THE DIVISION.

MR. NEWDEGATE said, he was about to solicit the indulgence of the House while he alluded, in a few words, to a matter personal to himself. He had had the honour of being for nearly ten years a Member of that House; he now found himself in a situation which he never before had experienced—that of having twice stated that he would not do what he afterwards had done. He had declared on two occasions that he would not vote upon the Amendment of the noble Lord the Member for Tiverton, in the division which had taken place on last Saturday morning; but his name, nevertheless, appeared in the division list as having voted on that occasion. He felt, therefore, that he stood in the position of having broken his word with the House; and, in justice to himself, he was most desirous to assure the House that his having done this was entirely unintentional. He fully intended to have left the House, and not to have voted at all on the Amendment of the noble Lord the Member for Tiverton, and to this intention he should have faithfully adhered were it not that having been unexpectedly looked in, he was obliged to vote. This explanation he felt to be due alike to the House and to himself, for he was jealous of his own honour, and he knew that the House paid a just regard to the character and conduct of its Members. He hoped, therefore, that this House would pardon the liberty he had taken in thus trespassing on their attention.

MR. KEOGH said, he wished to put a question to Mr. Speaker with reference to the order of their proceedings. It would be in the remembrance of the House that, on last Saturday morning, after the Motion of the hon. Gentleman the Member for Wolverhampton (Mr. C. Villiers) had been considered and divided on, another division was taken on the Motion of the noble Lord the Member for Tiverton (Viscount Palmerston). He was informed that, while the division on the latter Motion was being taken, three Members of the House—namely, the hon. and learned Gentleman the Solicitor General (Sir F. Kelly), the noble Lord the Member for West Surrey (the Earl of March), and the hon. Gentleman the Member for Middlesex (Mr. B. Osborne), were concealed in the room at the back of Mr. Speaker's chair. He did not pretend to conjecture for what reason those three Members were so concealed, but he should like to know whether the room in question was a place of legitimate retreat—to which, whenever a Member of the Government might not like to vote with the Government, he was to be at liberty to retire? He should also like to know whether the division of Saturday morning had been properly taken, or whether the three Gentlemen in question might not have been, and ought not to have been, brought to the table, and compelled to say "aye" or "no" to the question?

MR. SPEAKER: Any Member who may be in either of the rooms at the back of the Chair, at the time of a division, is clearly entitled not to vote. Ever since the House has assembled in its present chamber, it has been ruled that the two rooms behind the Chair are out of the House; and this being so, the House has clearly no power to compel Members to vote who may choose to retire to those rooms.

Subject dropped.

BUDDHISM IN CEYLON.

SIR ROBERT H. INGLIS said, he would beg to ask the right hon. Secretary of State for the Colonies, whether the connexion between the Queen's Government in Ceylon, and the idolatry of any part of Her Majesty's subjects therein, be or be not severed; whether the custody of the Buddhist relic be or be not transferred to those who regard it as sacred; whether any act of the Queen's Government be or be not required to entitle the priest of a Buddhist temple to exercise any function in respect to the property of such Buddhist temple; and, lastly, whether it be or be not the intention of Her Majesty's Government to transfer to the Buddhist priests all the concerns of their own religion in Ceylon?

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON said, that, in order to answer the series of questions the hon. Baronet (the Member for the University of Oxford) had addressed to him, he must ask the indulgence of the House for a very few moments, although it was quite impossible in giving such an answer to enter then into all the complicated details with which the subject was necessarily surrounded. His hon. Friend was, of course, aware that the matter to which he had referred, was one which had occupied the attention of successive Administrations in this country, and excited very considerable difficulty and embarrassment in Ceylon. The Christian community of Ceylon, and also many parties in the country, had taken objection to anything like a connexion between the Government of Great Britain, or the Representative of the Queen's Government in the island of Ceylon, and the system of idolatry which existed there, and was known by the name of Buddhism. But it appeared to him that it was forgotten by those who had taken an interest in this matter, that there were certain treaty obligations in existence which could not be lost sight of. The House was no doubt aware that the territory of the ancient kings of Kandy was acquired by this country in the year 1815. At that time a Convention was entered into between the Representative of the Government of this country and the King of Kandy, and one of the articles of that Convention ran in these terms:—"That the religion of Buddha professed by the chiefs and inhabitants of this province is declared inviolable, and its rites, ministers, and places of worship are to be maintained and protected." Subsequently a Proclamation was issued by the British Representative in the island, and under that Proclamation he (Sir J. Pakington) was prepared to contend that the obligations which the Government of this country had entered into on the subject of maintaining the Buddhist religion were not in the least altered. True, there were certain words to some extent qualifying these obligations; but essentially the general obligation to maintain and protect the Buddhists in the exercise of their religion remained untouched. It had been contended, he believed by parties in Ceylon, and he had heard it contended elsewhere, that the Convention alluded to was made with infidels and idolaters, and that, therefore, it was not binding. But he begged to say for himself that he could be no party to any such principle as that. He thought that for this country to acquire territory under a fair treaty, which treaty involved certain obligations, and then to turn round and contend that these obligations were entered into with idolaters, and were, therefore, not binding upon us, would be alike unworthy of a Christian Government and a Christian people. He was happy to say, however, in answer to the first question of the hon. Baronet, namely, whether the connexion between the Queen's Government in Ceylon and the idolatry of any part of Her Majesty's subjects therein be or be not severed?—he believed he was justified in saying that all connexion really with the idolatry of the Buddhists had been long ago discontinued. As he had already observed, by the treaty entered into with the King of Kandy we had incurred certain obligations, and one of these obligations was, that we should take part in the Buddhist ceremonies, assist in the performance of their religious rites; and give them the offerings of the materials which were necessary for the performance of those rites. This practice had been long discontinued. It was finally put an end to, he believed, by Sir Robert Wilmot Horton, then Governor of Ceylon, in 1834. A sum of money—300*l.*—was agreed to be paid to the Buddhists in lieu of the contributions which had been formerly paid for the performance of the Buddhist rites; and from that period, he might say, our connexion with the idolatries practised in the island had ceased to exist. But there remained two other points in which we were connected with the Buddhists: one of these was the appointment of a portion of the priesthood; the other, the custody of the Buddhist relic, known by the name of “Buddha's tooth.” He believed the attention of the noble Lord opposite (Lord John Russell) was directed to this part of the subject in 1840; and subsequently, when his noble Friend the Earl of Derby—then Lord Stanley—was at the Colonial Office, his attention was also called to the subject, and his

noble Friend sent out instructions to the Governor of Ceylon, that this portion of our connexion with the Buddhist religion should be likewise discontinued. The answer to these instructions was not received until Earl Grey came into office; but it appeared that that noble Earl sent out instructions to Lord Torrington that the British Government in Ceylon should have no more connexion with the religion of Buddha, and that the custody of the “tooth” should be made over to the Buddhists themselves. Soon after, however, the rebellion broke out in Ceylon, and in consequence of the pressure of that rebellion the custody of the relic was resumed by the British authorities. Lord Torrington was obliged to revoke the steps he had taken, and Earl Grey sanctioned the continuance of that state of things until some other arrangements should have been made. This excited very great dissatisfaction among the Christian community in the island; and when he (Sir J. Pakington) took office in the spring of the present year, he at once endeavoured to put an end to that state of things. He had now to state generally, in answer to the questions of his hon. Friend, that after gravely considering the matter, he had prepared a despatch, which he should send to Ceylon by the next mail, conveying instructions to the Governor of the determination of Her Majesty's Government upon the subject. He must say, however, that he was astonished to find that there did not exist in the Colonial Office such full information as to the facts of the case as he should have expected to find there, and without which it was exceedingly difficult to issue instructions upon a subject of so complicated a nature with the decision and clearness he should have desired. The instructions which the Government were prepared to send out were these: that with regard to the tooth, its possession was to be transferred at once, and entirely, to the Buddhists themselves, the Governor being instructed to provide a safe place for its custody. The 300*l.* a year, agreed to be paid by Sir Robert Wilmot Horton, in lieu of the other contributions which were previously made, having, in his (Sir J. Pakington's) opinion, been withdrawn with very great injustice to the parties, he proposed to issue instructions that, as a compensation for its loss, the Governor should give the Buddhists an extent of land equivalent in value to 300*l.* a year, so that they should not be worse off in that respect than they were before. With regard to the third point, the instructions he proposed to send out were, that the Governor should request the Buddhists to provide for themselves the means of appointing the priests, who had hitherto been appointed by the Governor of Ceylon. At the present time they appointed a large portion of the priesthood, and he intended to call upon them to take measures for appointing the remainder as well. If difficulty were experienced on their part in so providing the means, he should then instruct the Governor to take into his own hands the provision of the means for making the appointments. Such was the course which the Government was anxious to take, in the hope of being able thereby to put an end to all these difficulties and without any breach of faith; but seeing the number of difficulties by which the question was surrounded, he proposed to leave a considerable discretion in the hands of the Governor.

SIR ROBERT H. INGLIS begged to ask if the right hon. Gentleman was prepared to lay the despatch which embodied his views upon the table of the House?

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON said, he would have no objection to do so when the despatch was quite ready.

THE DERBY ELECTION.

SIR ALEXANDER COCKBURN said, he rose to bring under the notice of the House a petition from the borough of Derby, which he considered deserving the serious attention of the House. The petition set forth—

“That at the last election for the borough of Derby, Michael Thomas Bass, Lawrence Heyworth, and Thomas Berry Horsfall, Esquires, were the candidates; that at the said election an organised system of bribery was resorted to, and successfully carried out, for the purpose of procuring the return of one of the Members, and which did procure, the said return; that the right hon. William Beresford, a Major in the Army, and a Member of the Most Hon. Privy Council, and Secretary at War, and now a Member of that hon. House, was a party to such bribery, and did himself send, or cause to be sent, to the said borough an agent for the purpose of carrying out the said scheme and system of bribery; and the petitioners therefore prayed that the House would institute a full and searching inquiry into the whole of the case; and they prayed this the more earnestly, that the right hon. Gentleman had openly and publicly declared that those who had been instrumental in bringing the bribery to light had been guilty of a foul and scandalous conspiracy, and had resorted, for the purpose of carrying that conspiracy into effect, to falsehood and subornation of perjury. Under these circumstances, the petitioners were most anxious that the inquiry should take place without loss of time, so that the truth might be made to appear manifest, and it might clearly be seen whether, on the one hand, they had been guilty of the foul and nefarious practices which had been ascribed to them, or whether, on the other hand, the right hon. Gentleman had been guilty of an infraction of the law, nearly affecting not only the interests of the borough with which they were connected, but of the people at large.”

He had been requested to bring this petition under the notice of the House, and having consented to do so, he trusted that in discharging the difficult and distressing duty thus cast upon him, he should not give the right hon. Gentleman, whose name was brought in question, reason to complain of any want of candour, fairness, and moderation on his part, or of the absence of what was always due from one Gentleman to another, however they might happen to sit on opposite sides of the House. He would now proceed to state the facts of the case as they had been stated to him. At the last election for the borough of Derby, the Members who had represented the borough in the previous Session of Parliament, Messrs. Bass and Heyworth, were opposed to Mr. Thomas Berry Horsfall. Mr. Horsfall, it was stated, was a merchant and resident of Liverpool, and at that time a political stranger to the borough, but he had married into a family named Cox, several members of which were established and carrying on various occupations in Derby, and were consequently possessed of considerable influence in the borough. One of these gentlemen was a solicitor, and father to a Mr. Cox, in partnership with a Mr. Fountain as wine merchants; another Mr. Cox was at the head of large lead-works, and it might make a matter for future observation, that it was in the house of this Mr. Cox that Mr. Horsfall, during his election, took up his residence. Up to the last election, Derby had been considered quite a stronghold of the Liberal party; but just before that election rumours became rife that a different result was about to be effected by the introduction by the Conservative party of bribery money into the borough. Several of the more ardent and less prudent of the adherents of that party openly declared that money would not be wanting at the election, and this intimation turned out in the sequel not to be without foundation. While this was going on, information was conveyed to Mr. Moss, a solicitor at Derby, and who was acting as chairman of Messrs. Bass and Heyworth's committee, that bribery was in course of perpetration, and details of the bribery accompanying the information, precautions were at once taken to verify the fact. At the same time he was bound to say that the information thus received by Mr. Moss came from a tainted and suspicious source, and was only valuable in so far as it was verified by subsequent discoveries. He had better at once state to the House how this came to pass. There was an attorney of the name of Flewker, residing in Derby, who had been, at many former elections, an active agent on the Conservative side. It appeared that before the last election this Mr. Flewker had become discontented with that party in this way:—Having been at the general election (1847) an agent for the Conservative candidate, who was defeated, he had got up a petition against Messrs. Strutt and Gower, the successful candidates, had carried that petition to trial, had been successful, and had unseated those Members. In effecting this object, however, he did that which was the usual accompaniment of such proceedings—he incurred considerable expenses, and found himself at the close of the affair out of pocket to the extent of 700*l.* or 800*l.* He applied, naturally enough, to his political friends at Derby to reimburse him this amount, but he could get nothing from them but idle excuses, and, accordingly, nothing making men so sore as the being kept out of their money, Flewker, when the last election came, peremptorily refused to act as the agent of the Conservative candidate, or to take any part in the contest. A correspondence ensued between Flewker and Mr. Lewis, the chairman of Mr. Horsfall's committee, which the latter subsequently wished to have printed in the local newspaper, the editor of which, however, refused to insert it, not wishing to publish anything that might lead to discussion among the party. Flewker continued in this state of mind until the eve of the election, when a person of the name of Radford, also an attorney, one of the most thoroughgoing partisans of the Conservative party, made a last effort with Flewker, and calling upon him, communicated to him the important secret that decisive arrangements had been made for securing the election by means of money, and that a stranger had arrived in the town who “was to do the trick.” This stranger, he further stated, was at the County

Sir A. Cockburn

Tavern, and Flewker was requested to go to the County Tavern and see this stranger, and satisfy himself that the arrangements making by the stranger for executing the task he had to perform were such as were calculated to effect their object. Mr. Radford added, that as it would be otherwise difficult to obtain access to the stranger, he would give Flewker a card, which, on being shown to the stranger, would satisfy him that all was right, and at once secure Flewker's admission. On the card was the address—“Mr. T. Morgan, Chester.” Flewker having at last consented to act, proceeded to the County Tavern, showed the card to the servant, and, after some demur, was ultimately admitted to the stranger, to whom also he showed the card. Some allusion was made to the stranger's (Morgan's) coming from Chester, to which he replied, “I don't come from Chester, I come from Shrewsbury; Mr. Frail sent me.” Flewker, who had before had communications with Frail on election matters, asked Morgan if he had any letter from Frail? Morgan replied, “that he had no letter from Frail, but that he had a letter with him which Frail had given him to bring there.” He then took out the letter, and showed it to Flewker, who, intimately acquainted with the handwriting of the Secretary at War, at once exclaimed, “Why, this is Major Beresford's writing, I know the writing perfectly well, and see it is signed W. B.!” Nothing further passed at that time between Messrs. Flewker and Morgan. Flewker went back to Radford, and said, “Why, this man does not come from Chester, he comes from Shrewsbury.” To which Radford replied, “It's all right; and we've told him when the thing's done we'll give him 100*l.*” Morgan, in fact, had himself informed Flewker, at the interview which had just taken place, that this money was promised him. Radford next requested Flewker to take on himself a mission of considerable importance, and that was, to proceed next morning to Nottingham, to see there a man of the name of Hibbert, who had considerable weight in electioneering matters, and who had organised a considerable body of men, who acted under his command at elections, who looked to him for their pay, and would not acknowledge any other leader. There was at Derby an attorney of the name of Huish, who acted at the late election as agent for Mr. Horsfall, under the direction of Mr. Horsfall's confidential solicitor, of whom more would be said by-and-by. Huish and Radford had, a few days before, sent a person of the name of Simpson over to Nottingham, to an attorney of the name of Bowley, to secure the services of Hibbert. When Bowley discovered from Simpson's conversation what was going on, and what was about to be done at Derby, he thought it better not to mix himself up in the matter; and he had advised Huish himself to see Hibbert, and get him to come over to the Derby election. But, inasmuch as no answer had come from Hibbert up to the eve of the nomination day, and as it was remembered that some misunderstanding had taken place on a former occasion between Huish and Hibbert, and that Hibbert declared himself to have no reliance on Huish, Radford asked Flewker to go over to Nottingham, and make arrangements with Hibbert to accompany him back to Derby, and bring over his men. Flewker accordingly went over next morning to Nottingham, and saw Hibbert, who told him that he had received a letter from Huish, but that, had the thing rested with Huish, he should not have attended to his request, seeing that he had no confidence in Huish, but that, as he now had Radford's promise, he would come. He, however, was not able to get over until late in the day. Flewker while at Nottingham got into conversation with a Mr. Cox, to whom he told what was going on at Derby. Now, Cox, who was a great Liberal, hereupon made the best of his way to the town-clerk of Nottingham, from whom he procured an introduction to Mr. Moss, at Derby, the chairman of the Liberal committee, to whom he then proceeded with a statement of the information he had so collected. Flewker, on his return to Derby, went to inform Radford that he had brought Hibbert over with him. He found, on reaching Radford's house, that Radford was not at home, but at Messrs. Cox and Fountain's, the wine merchants. On arriving at Messrs. Cox and Fountain's, Flewker met Radford coming out of the house, in company with a Mr. Lunn, a cattle-dealer; Lunn separated from Radford, and then Flewker told Radford what had taken place. Radford next said there was a house opposite, the County Tavern, much frequented by people on the other side of the question, and which it was expedient to watch. Flewker hereupon proceeded to the County Tavern, and, on his way passed in the street the Mr. Lunn whom he had just before seen in company with Mr. Radford. Soon after he had reached the County Tavern, and was with Morgan in his room, Lunn came in and said he had a few words to say in private to Mr. Morgan. Flewker withdrew, and, upon returning to Morgan's room, was told by that person that Lunn was a friend of Radford's, and "had brought the needful." A conversation then took place as to their security from observation and detection in the room they occupied, and Morgan explained that the room had a double communication—one of which led, by a back staircase, into the stableyard—and, upon showing the double communication to Flewker, the latter person quite concurred that the place was safe. While Flewker was with Morgan there came in a person named Rice, familiarly known in the town as "Spring Rice," who brought a list of persons supposed to be not inaccessible to pecuniary considerations. Mr. Morgan, it appeared, had previously complained that two similar lists with which he had been furnished were not numerous enough—were not "winning lists"—whereupon Rice had said that these lists were not the right lists, and that he would procure a right list. He (Sir A. Cockburn) gave all these names and all these details that the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Beresford) might have the full case before him, so as to enable him to confront Flewker with the other witnesses when the proper time arrived. So terminated the events of the evening of Wednesday, the nomination day. On the morning of Thursday Flewker went again to Morgan at the County Tavern, who asked him to go to Radford and tell him that he had not sent enough horsenails, adding that Radford would know what was meant, and that it was urgent more horsenails should be transmitted forthwith. The door of Morgan's room was guarded by a man, who allowed none to enter the room without giving a sign and password, the same being to place the forefinger of the right hand on the upper lip, and say, "It's all right, Radford sent me." On reaching Radford's house, Flewker was informed by the servant that Radford was not well, and had not yet got up; whereupon Flewker desired the servant to go up to Radford, and tell him that the man at the County Tavern wanted more horsenails, and must have them immediately. While he was giving this message to the servant, in came Mr. Cox, the attorney, father to Cox of the firm of Cox and Fountain, the wine merchants, who heard the message so given by Flewker, and himself desired the servant to take up a message from him to Radford, that he must see him without delay, and that he must get up immediately, so that he might see him. The servant brought down word to Flewker that the horsenails should be sent. About two hours after that, Flewker met Mr. Radford, who told him that it was all right, and that the money had been sent. All these circumstances were communicated by Flewker in the course of that morning to Mr. Cox, of Nottingham, who was no relation to the Cox's of Derby, and by Mr. Cox to Mr. Moss, the chairman of Messrs. Bass and Heyworth's committee. He was not there for a moment to defend the conduct of Flewker. He was betraying the confidence of his party, no doubt of it; and he (Sir A. Cockburn) was not there to deny or to disguise his motives—motives of which it was impossible to approve—vindictiveness and cupidity; for he had stipulated for money in the event of his evidence being made use of. But the House perfectly well knew that it often happened that crime was arrested and offenders were brought to justice by means of information given from motives of which it was impossible to approve. The evidence of an informer, a spy, or an accomplice was justly viewed with suspicion and distrust; but no prudent man would hesitate to avail himself of such information, in order to prevent the perpetration of crime, nor, if he were by such means put upon the track of guilt, would he disbelieve the evidence when he took the offender flagrante delicto. Having received that information, Mr. Moss, after communicating with Messrs. Bass and Heyworth, and receiving their sanction to the course of conduct he was about to pursue, called in the assistance of the police; and a police-sergeant, attended by two or three of his men, dressed in plain clothes, having been furnished with all the particulars and with the necessary signal and watchword, proceeded to the County Tavern. They made their way to the room to which they had been directed, and they found the door guarded by a man who was a stranger to them. The man first put out his hand to prevent their going in, but, on making the signal and pronouncing the password, he opened the door and admitted them, not knowing that they were officers of police. They there found the man Morgan, whom they apprehended. They found upon him

265*l.* in gold, and 40*l.* in notes, and on the table before him was a book, in which were entered the names and numbers on the register of the voters, and against those names and numbers were figures indicating the sums received by the voters. They further found upon him a letter to which he must now call the attention of the House. It was in the following terms:—

“A good and safe man, with judgment and quickness, is wanted immediately at Derby. I suppose that you cannot leave your own place; if not, send some one whom you can trust in your place. Let him go to Derby on receiving this, and find the County Tavern, in the centre of the town. Send this card to Cox, Brothers, and Co., Leadworks, as coming from Chester. That will be enough.—Yours, “W. B.

The police also found upon him two cards similarly worded, with the address of “Mr. T. Morgan, Chester.” The man, being apprehended, was taken away in custody, to be brought before the magistrate on the following morning. He made no secret of the business on which he had been engaged. Apprehended thus, with the proofs of his guilty purpose around him, he made no disguise about the matter, but admitted freely that the book contained the names of voters who had received sums of money from him. “After all,” he said, “it was but a small affair;” and he spoke with considerable contempt of Derby, saying, “Derby is but a poor place, your voters are satisfied here with two or three pounds a-piece; in Shrewsbury a vote costs twenty times as much.” One thing, he thought, must be perfectly clear upon this statement—namely, that the man Morgan had been at the time engaged in corrupting voters at Derby by means of bribes. That was a point on which he thought there could not be on the mind of any reasonable man the slightest shadow of doubt. Then came this far more important and far more painful question, “How far, upon the evidence of that letter, the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary at War was to be considered as having been accessory to the work of corruption?” That letter had been sworn to be in the handwriting of the right hon. Gentleman. It was found in an envelope addressed to Mr. John Frail, clerk of the course at Shrewsbury, which had on it the impress of the seal of the Carlton Club, which he thought went some way towards showing that it was a genuine letter. In addition to that, the right hon. Gentleman, having spoken out upon this subject, had never for a single moment, as far as he was aware, denied the genuineness of the letter; and, therefore, for the purpose of the present discussion, he assumed it to be the genuine handwriting of the right hon. Gentleman. If so, how far did that letter implicate the right hon. Gentleman in the proceedings at Derby? One thing could not fail to strike every person upon the most casual observation, and that was that the man went to the place where he was found committing the bribery by the direction and at the instance of the person to whom the letter was addressed. The second thing that struck one was, that the letter contained a series of directions, and it would be found that Morgan, the briber, complied with all the directions given by the right hon. Gentleman, even to the most minute particular. The letter directed that a man should be sent from Shrewsbury to Derby immediately upon its receipt. The letter was dated Monday, and he found that on the Tuesday morning Morgan was on the platform of the railway station at Shrewsbury, and that he proceeded by the first train to Derby as fast as the railway could carry him. The next direction was, that he should find the County Tavern, in the centre of the town. Upon Morgan's arrival at Derby he proceeded to the County Tavern. There he established himself, and the County Tavern became the scene of action where the bribery was actually carried on. He was next directed to send his card to Cox, Brothers, and Co., Leadworks. Upon this point he (Sir A. Cockburn) had the statement of the landlord of the inn, which had been given with considerable reluctance, for the man was a strong partisan, and was by no means willing to give information if he could avoid it. Nevertheless, he stated that no sooner had Morgan established himself at the inn than he handed to the landlord a card to be conveyed to Messrs. Cox, at the leadworks. That card was given by the landlord to the hostler, by whom it was conveyed to Messrs. Cox. Lastly, the letter directed that the card should bear the address of Chester, and upon the card (which he held in his hand), which was the card that Mr. Radford had given to Flewker, and which in all probability had been sent from Messrs. Cox, at the leadworks, to Mr. Radford—on that card was the address of Chester, whereas Morgan, in point of fact, lived at Shrewsbury. The House would perceive, therefore, that every one of the directions contained in the letter had been most minutely followed by Morgan. There was another thing which they could not fail to observe, which was, that it was quite impossible that letter should have been written by the right hon. Gentleman without previous concert with parties at Derby. The right hon. Gentleman could hardly be expected to know anything of a second or third-rate house at Derby, like the County Tavern, or to know that it had facilities for carrying on such work as this; but Mr. Radford was a great frequenter of the County Tavern; he spent most of his evenings there, and was on terms of familiar intimacy with the landlord. Again, it was idle to suppose that the writer of that letter would direct the man to send his card to Cox, of the leadworks, who was nearly connected with the sitting Member for Derby, without some previous concerted arrangement that, on the card being sent there, certain things were to be done. He next turned to the letter with the view of seeing whether it threw any light upon the object for which that man was to be sent from Shrewsbury to Derby, and for which all that machinery was to be set in action; and the first thing that struck him, on looking at it with the view of ascertaining the animus of the writer was to inquire for what legitimate purpose was a stranger to be sent all the way from Shrewsbury to Derby, a distance of seventy miles? If there were any legitimate purpose for the presence of "a safe man, with judgment and quickness," at Derby, was no such man to be found among the agents and friends of the Conservative cause at Derby or the neighbouring towns? Why was a man to be despatched all the way from Shrewsbury? The experience of many places where systematic bribery had been brought to light, must have made the House pretty well acquainted with the fact, that when wholesale and systematic corruption was to be carried on in a borough, a stranger was always selected to do it. The presence of a stranger excited less suspicion, and, if they could only succeed afterwards in cutting off the trail, detection became in most cases unlikely, and in very many impossible. Now, was any artifice resorted to for the purpose of cutting off the trail in this case? Here arose the most painful question, which one could not avoid asking, "Why was a false address assumed on that occasion?" For any legitimate purpose, they did not want any false address whatever, and a false address given by a person not a stranger would not do. But here there was both a stranger employed, and a false address given by that stranger. Supposing, for a moment, for the sake of the argument, that the person who was required must be a stranger, he need, if the object were legitimate, give no false address; but, if it were desired after the work was done to cut off all possibility of following him up, then a false address would answer the purpose. So here, he could not help asking for what legitimate purpose was this man directed to assume a false address? They all knew, however, that nothing was more common than for guilt to seek to shroud itself in secrecy, disguise, and falsehood. These, indeed, were its ordinary concomitants and its most unerring indications, and, therefore, he said that if the right hon. Gentleman had been subjected to unjust suspicions, he had brought it entirely upon himself. Now, looking at all this combination of circumstances, he would take the liberty of putting a case. He had himself assisted in the administration of justice. He saw around him hon. and learned Friends who belonged to the legal profession. There must be many hon. Gentlemen in that House who, in their respective districts, assisted in the administration of the Criminal Law; and to all of those he ventured to put this question: Take the case of a man apprehended flagrante delicto in the perpetration of crime, and upon him is found a letter which directed him to go to a place where that crime was in course of being committed, which directed him what he was to do when he got there, which directed him to put himself into communication with persons who might fairly be supposed to have an interest in the work he was about to do, and which further directed him to assume a disguise; then, if on a criminal trial the question were asked whether the person writing that letter were accessory to the crime, what would it be the duty of the Judge to say? It would be his duty to say that such conduct, unanswered and unexplained, was cogent and weighty evidence for the jury of the complicity of the writer with the guilt of the principal. Observe, he said only, if "unanswered and unexplained." Heaven forbid that he should say that this case did not admit of an answer or an explanation! All he said was, that it was a case which demanded inquiry. His long experience had inspired him with a deep conviction of however bad appearances might be, that a case which, prima facie, appeared unanswerable, irresistible, and overwhelming, might yet, by the introduction of new facts, and by the admission of new light, be made to assume the complexion and character of innocence. He did not say that that was not the case here; but he did venture to say, and no man could gainsay it, that this was a case which required an answer, which called for an explanation, which demanded a sifting and searching inquiry, and that without such an inquiry neither the public mind out of doors nor that House could be satisfied. Here he should have left this case but that there were peculiar circumstances connected with it which would justify him in entering somewhat more into detail, and made it necessary for him to trespass on the attention of the House a little longer. The right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Beresford) had spoken out upon this subject, and had openly declared, at a meeting of his constituents, that all the facts which had thus been brought to light were the result of a base conspiracy, of artifice and fraud, and that the case against him had been sought to be supported by falsehood and perjury. He had heard also, in all quarters, and he believed it to be true, that the friends of the right hon. Gentleman had everywhere declared (whether with his authority or not he was not aware), that the letter found upon Morgan, albeit a genuine letter, was one which had reference, not to the election of 1852, but to some prior election; that it was written at a time when the right hon. Gentleman was not fettered with the responsibilities of office, and with which it would be unfair and ungenerous to seek to visit him now. If that hypothesis were true, he perfectly and cordially concurred in the inference to be drawn from it; if it were an old and stale transaction, it would be ungenerous and unworthy of the House to rake it up at this time. Having heard these things, when applied to on the part of the petitioners to bring the case before the House, he had felt it incumbent upon him to institute the best inquiry which the materials at his disposal enabled him to make, in order to satisfy his mind whether there was any foundation for saying that a conspiracy existed against the right hon. Gentleman, or that the letter in question had reference to some prior election. He had felt that to be incumbent upon him, not only from a sense of what was due to the right hon. Gentleman, but of what was due also to himself; because he said with most unfeigned sincerity that nothing would occasion him greater mortification or more lasting regret than to feel that he had been made, however innocently on his part, the instrument of a base and scandalous plot to bring an unfounded accusation against the right hon. Gentleman. He had found upon inquiry that the materials were not wanting to guide him in the investigation which he felt bound to make; for, naturally enough, the charge of conspiracy against those parties made by the right hon. Gentleman had put everybody in Derby upon their mettle. Mr. Flewker having been charged with suborning evidence, everybody was anxious to have additional light thrown upon the matter, and additional information was speedily at hand with the view of settling the question whether not that letter had reference to the last or to some prior election. He found the inquiry very much simplified by this. It appeared that the right hon. Gentleman had been in correspondence with Mr. Flewker on a former occasion, and he was very soon enabled to satisfy his mind that that letter could not by any possibility have reference to any election prior to 1848, for, in the first place, it appeared perfectly clear that the right hon. Gentleman had not in any way interfered in the election for Derby at the general election in 1847. Moreover, it was made perfectly clear to demonstration that Frail, who was called on to interfere by that letter, was a total stranger to the borough of Derby, as far as electioneering matters were concerned, until 1848. Messrs. Strutt and Gower having been returned at the general election of 1847, a petition was presented against that return on the meeting of Parliament, and the right hon. Gentleman appeared to have been applied to to give his assistance towards forwarding the object of that petition: and he found him writing to Mr. Flewker, November 21, 1847, in the following terms:—

“ Dear Sir—I received your letter in London yesterday, just as I was starting. I should think it a good thing indeed to unseat Mr. Strutt for Derby; but I fear that I have not the means of accepting your proposal, as I have not funds at my disposal, just after the expenditure attending a general election, to pay the costs of the petition. If you get up a case, and a subscription for the purpose, I can promise a subscription of 100*l.*; but I cannot do more. I will speak to Colville, if he is in town, when I get there on Tuesday,— Believe me, yours truly,

“ Feb. 17.

“ Dear Sir—I am very glad to hear so good an account as you give of the prospect of success in the Derby petition. I shall be glad to give you any assistance in my power when the case comes on.—Yours truly,

Now came an important letter. It seemed that the right hon. Gentleman, being unable to contribute more than 100*l.* towards the cost of the petition, thought he could render valuable assistance in another form, and that was by sending down Mr. Frail to assist in getting up the petition. He alluded to this to show that the letter found upon Morgan could not apply to any election prior to 1848, because until February, 1848, Frail was a stranger to Derby. The letter of February, 1848, was in the following terms:—

“ Dear Sir—I have an agent who is skilled in all election matters, and understands every manner of scheme with regard to petitions. He will be in Derby next Monday, and will bring an introduction from me. You may trust him most implicitly, and you will get some very useful hints probably from him respecting your petition.—
Yours truly,

Now, it was perfectly clear from this letter that it referred to a person who was a complete stranger at Derby. It adverted to the necessity of an introduction; it dealt with him as we deal with a stranger, for whose capacity and trustworthiness, in a matter of some moment, we felt ourselves called upon to vouch; and, accordingly, the letter did vouch for the individual in those respects. Now, who was that individual? The next letter showed. It was a letter of the same date as the last—the 25th of February—and was addressed to Mr. Flewker, to whom it was presented by Mr. Frail two days afterwards:—

“ Dear Sir—The bearer, Mr. Frail, is the person I wrote to you about.—Yours, truly,

He thought that these letters showed conclusively and beyond a doubt that up to the 25th of February, 1848, Frail was a total stranger in Derby, and had never previously intermeddled with the election affairs of that borough. The next letter was dated the 3rd of March, 1848. He begged the House to observe that he was now showing the relation which existed between Mr. Frail, of Shrewsbury, and Mr. Flewker, of Derby, and the leading agents and partisans of the Conservative party there. The letter was dated, as he had said, March 3, 1848, and was as follows:—

“ Dear Sir—I have endeavoured to see Mr. Colville, but I find he is in the country hunting, probably near Atherstone. I will speak to him whenever he comes up to town. I have seen Mr. Frail, who gives me a good account of the case that can be made out against the sitting Members. I have requested him to give you every assistance in his power, and attend to anything that the Derby party desire to be done. I shall be happy to assist you also when the Committee sits.”

What this meant he (Sir A. Cockburn) did not altogether know.

“ The great matter to be looked to is to collect funds and to keep the case quiet till it is brought before the Committee.—Yours, truly,

The next letter was from Mr. Frail himself, and was important, because it showed that he had now put himself upon a footing of intimacy with regard to the electioneering and political affairs of the borough of Derby. That letter was written from Carlisle. It appeared that an election was at that time going on in the ancient city of Carlisle. An election petition had been presented against the return of one of the hon. Members who had been returned at the general election of 1847. That petition was successful; and consequently another election became necessary in order to fill the vacant seat. Now, it appeared that Frail was sent down there, if not by the direction, at all events with the concurrence, of the right hon. Gentleman, for the purpose of lending his assistance in the election at Carlisle. He found him writing thus to Mr. Flewker:—

“ Carlisle, Saturday.

“ My dear Sir—I have only just received your letters this day. I am much engaged with the election; it will be over on Tuesday, and I hope to be in London on Wednesday. I have written to London for you; arrangements must be made for the lodgings of your witnesses, &c. This shall be attended to without delay. If you can get Andrews and Alexander do, if not, Byles.”

Messrs. Andrews and Alexander were two very distinguished Members of the Parliamentary bar, and the other was Mr. Sergeant Byles, one of the most distinguished barristers in Westminster Hall, but probably better known to hon. Gentlemen opposite as the author of a work entitled The Fallacies of Free Trade. He (Sir A. Cockburn) was very sorry for his learned and esteemed Friend. He considered him, indeed, to be a very ill-used man, to have been induced to step aside from his ordinary avocations and indulge in profound lucubrations which had now been left high and dry, with nobody to read the book he had produced, unless it were the hon. and gallant Member for Lincoln (Colonel Sibthorp), for whose consistency on this subject no man had a greater respect than he (Sir A. Cockburn) had; and he would suggest that his learned Friend should dedicate the second edition of his work to that hon. and gallant Member, if it should ever reach a second edition. But there was one most significant part of the letter to come. It was signed at the bottom “ John Frail,” but above that were the words, “ Yours, in great haste, very sincerely, William Nixon. —King’s Arms Hotel—My best wishes to Mr. Hibbert or Thompson, not Johnson.” This showed, he thought, very plainly, that Mr. Frail had gone under the name of Nixon at Carlisle, when he was attending to electioneering matters there; and there a postscript says, “ My best wishes to Mr. Hibbert or Thompson, not Johnson.” It was evident from the P.S. that this gentleman also had been undergoing a change in his patronymic, and that Mr. Flewker had written the disguise Johnson instead of Thompson, which Mr. Frail takes this opportunity of correcting. This would give hon. Members some insight into the way in which proceedings were conducted when a certain class of politicians were engaged in carrying on delicate matters connected with elections, or in getting up petitions against sitting Members. The next letter was of the same date as the last. It was from the right hon. Gentleman to Mr. Flewker. It evidently referred to Frail’s stopping at Carlisle for the purposes of the election there, and was in these words:—

“ Dear Sir—Mr. Frail has been out of town on very important business for four or five days, and that is the reason why you have not heard from him. I do not think that he has got your letter. I think he will be able to get to Derby on Tuesday night or Wednesday morning, but not before. I have sent to speak to a gentleman from Derby, and will give him any direction I can that may be serviceable. I regret that Frail is out of town.—Yours, truly,

Now, this correspondence appeared to establish the position for which he had used it, namely, to prove that the right hon. Gentleman having had nothing whatever to do with the election at Derby in 1847, and that Frail having been a total stranger there until 1848, it was quite impossible that the letter in question could have reference to the Derby election of 1847. But there was a subsequent election in 1848, and he was ready to admit, that looking to the position of the right hon. Gentleman, and looking to the footing on which Mr. Frail stood with regard to election matters, it was quite possible, nay probable, that the right hon. Gentleman might have been referred to furnish "a safe and discreet man" for that election, and might have had recourse to Frail as one whose emissaries and agents would be readily accepted in the borough as coming from a person in whom the party had confidence. Well, did the letter in question refer to that election? The petition of 1847 having, as he had said, succeeded in unseating one of the sitting Members, a new election took place for the purpose of filling the vacant seat. The writ was issued on Thursday, the 24th of August, and the election took place on Friday and Saturday, the 1st and 2nd of September. Now, did the letter apply to that election? The way to test that was to look at the letter, and see whether the circumstances to which it referred quadrated with the circumstances of the election in 1848, and not with the circumstances of the election in 1852, or whether they quadrated with the circumstances of the election in 1852, and not with the circumstances of the election in 1848. In the first place, it would be observed that the letter was addressed to Frail, who was asked immediately to send over a man to Derby, and this request was made upon the assumption that Frail was so much occupied at home that he would be unable to leave his "own place." The first question he had to ask was, what were the occupations of Frail? And, second, what could be the occupation requiring his presence at Shrewsbury which could be within the knowledge of a party who addressed him from London? Now, the fact was, that Frail was a man who was in no business at all. He was originally a hairdresser, but had retired from business many years ago. He was now attached to two pursuits, and two pursuits exclusively—horseracing and electioneering. He was a person who was very much on the turf. He did not mention this with the view of casting any disrespect on Mr. Frail, but merely as a matter of fact. The House would observe that he was addressed as "the clerk of the course at Shrewsbury." Now, was anything going on in September, 1848, at Shrewsbury, or its vicinity, in the shape of horseracing, or other turf engagements, which would confine Frail to his "own place?" Nothing of the kind. The Shrewsbury race took place in the spring and in November. There were, therefore, no races at Shrewsbury at that time. Well, was there any electioneering going on? None whatever. Both the seats at Shrewsbury were full, and there was no election going on, either there or in the neighbourhood, which could render the presence of Frail necessary in Shrewsbury. But the best proof of all that there was nothing to detain him at Shrewsbury was the fact that he did go to Derby at that time. It so happened that that was the time of the Derby races, and Frail, it seemed, made his appearance there in a jockey costume. He was seen there in that dress. He called upon Flewker, and stated that he had taken an interest in the unseating of the sitting Members, and that he was desirous that the Conservative candidate should be successful; and he wished to know if he could be of any use; but he was informed by Flewker that his services were not wanted, as there was no money passing. Whether this was owing to the fact that his (Sir A. Cockburn's) hon. and learned Friend the Member for Falmouth (Mr. Freshfield), being then one of the Conservative candidates, had a strong aversion, as he (Sir A. Cockburn) was sure he would have a strong aversion, to all kinds and degrees of corruption, or whether it was owing to the fact that there were two Conservative candidates in the field when only one of them had the slightest chance of success, he knew not; but at any rate Mr. Frail was informed that on this occasion there was no money stirring, and he withdrew, no doubt to his own great disgust. But now he would turn to the election of 1852; and he would ask, was there anything in 1852 to keep Mr. Frail at home? Unquestionably there was. There was a contested election at Shrewsbury at the same time as at Derby; and, not only was there a contested election, but an election under peculiar circumstances, which required the presence of an active man like Mr. Frail, who had been the life and soul of the elections there for a series of years, in a more than ordinary degree. The contest, it appeared, sprang up at the last moment. The election was to take place on Tuesday and Wednesday, while the election at Derby was to take place on the Wednesday and Thursday. The contest at Shrewsbury, he believed, had sprung up on the previous Friday, so that all was bustle and turmoil there. Frail was, therefore, necessarily confined to his own place by the election proceedings then going on. The right hon. Gentleman was quite right, then, in supposing that Frail was on that occasion unable to "leave his own place." But that was not all. There was another circumstance which appeared very significant. The writer of the letter directed that a man should be sent from Shrewsbury to Derby "immediately" on its receipt. Now, this letter was written on Monday, and on Tuesday morning Morgan was seen to start for Derby. How did this agree with the circumstances of the election in 1848? The election in 1848, he begged the House to observe, did not take place on a Wednesday and Thursday, but on a Friday and Saturday; so that there was not the same necessity for an immediate and hurried departure as if it had been earlier in the week. And, accordingly, instead of going immediately to Derby, Frail did not make his appearance there until Thursday, the day of the races. It thus appeared that all the circumstances of the election in 1852 quadrated with the exigencies of the letter, whereas with the circumstances of the election in 1848 they did not at all quadrate. Besides, it was plain that if the letter was written with reference to the election in 1848, it could not possibly be made to apply to the election in 1852, except by means of some great, villanous, and abominable conspiracy. He asked the House, then, whether they could discover the remotest trace of a conspiracy or plot in the matter, or whether all the proofs he had adduced did not point in the opposite direction? In the first place, he would ask, if there was a conspiracy, who were the conspirators? No doubt he should be told that Flewker was a person capable both of hatching and concocting a plot of this kind, and of carrying it into execution. He (Sir A. Cockburn) was not there to defend or palliate in any degree the conduct of Flewker; but let every man have his due. It appeared to him that there was a great difference in point of turpitude and atrocity between a man who, having become possessed of a guilty secret, reveals it—however dishonourable his conduct in that respect may be—and the conduct of a man who should have the wickedness and inconceivable audacity to frame and concoct a scheme of fraud and villany for the purpose of making the innocent appear to be guilty, and entailing upon them the consequences thereof. But he (Sir A. Cockburn) would assume that Flewker was a man capable in point of immorality and boldness in conceiving such a plot. It would be remembered, however, that one man did not make a conspiracy; because, although one man might conceive a scheme of this kind, it required the co-operation of other men to carry it into effect. Besides, he begged to ask, even if they gave Flewker the credit of being able and willing to conceive such a scheme, what could be his motives for seeking to injure the right hon. Gentleman? The right hon. Gentleman had made him no promise. He told him fairly that he could contribute no more than 100*l.* towards his subscription; and, having paid that, Flewker had no further claim upon him, and had never pretended that he had the slightest shadow of a claim against him. But he would assume, for the moment, that in his desire to do injury to the party, Flewker forgot that he had no ground of dislike to the right hon. Gentleman personally, but that, in consequence of the high position of the right hon. Gentleman as a Minister of the Crown, he was willing to include him in such a charge. The House, on the other hand, however, should consider the position in which Flewker had placed himself. He did not rest his statements on his own testimony; he vouched for a number of persons in support of them; he vouched for a number of the partisans, agents, and friends of the Conservative candidate; he vouched in particular for Frail and Morgan. Could it be supposed that Flewker would shut his eyes to the fact that detection, exposure, disgrace, and punishment would be the inevitable consequences of such a plot? He begged the House to consider this, too:—Here was a man whose irritation had arisen from the circumstance that he had lost 700*l.* Could they believe that he would intrust a stranger like Morgan with a sum of 400*l.*, with which he might start immediately, and whom he could never call to account for it without the perfect certainty of the exposure which must follow? But he should assume that Flewker was capable of conceiving the villany, that he was willing to execute it, and that he was dead to all prudential considerations in its pursuit. Still, as he had already said, one man alone could not have carried the scheme into execution. He must have had confederates. Who were they? He was afraid that if the idea of a conspiracy was entertained, his hon. Friend the sitting Member (Mr. Bass), and his late colleague (Mr. Heyworth) must be included in it, as well as Mr. Moss, the chairman of their committee, a gentleman who had been for the second time chosen to fill the honourable office of chief magistrate of the borough. All of these must in that case be considered conspirators, because they had all availed themselves of the information obtained from Mr. Flewker, and acted upon it. But he should not stop to vindicate the character of those gentlemen from that aspersion. His hon. Friend's (Mr. Bass's) character spoke for itself. But, even making them a present of the supposition—so far as concerned those gentlemen—that was not all, because, in order to establish a conspiracy, it would be necessary to include the whole body, or at least a large number of the agents and partisans of the Conservative candidate. And here he would beg to ask a simple but pertinent question. If it was a conspiracy, how came the letter in question into the hands of Morgan? The letter was addressed to Mr. Frail, and yet it found its way into the hands of Morgan. On what rational hypothesis could this be accounted for, unless upon the natural supposition that it had been given by Frail to Morgan, in order to go to Derby and do the required work? He knew it had been said that the letter was given by Frail to Flewker, and that it had been placed by Flewker in the hands of Morgan in order to establish the present case. In his (Sir A. Cockburn's) opinion, nothing could be more improbable; and, to set the matter entirely at rest, he craved the attention of the House to the following circumstances. He thought he could make it clear to the mind of every one that the letter must have been delivered to Morgan at Shrewsbury, and not at Derby. On the back of the letter he found in pencil a few words in a handwriting the same as the entries in Morgan's book, and which there was no doubt was Morgan's handwriting. These words were "Stafford, Lichfield, Burton-on-Trent, Derby." Now, these were places at which a man travelling from Shrewsbury to Derby would have to change carriages. There was no direct communication between Shrewsbury and Derby, and a person travelling between the two places must avail himself of several railways. A stranger going for the first time, therefore, from Shrewsbury to Derby would naturally be expected to ask for information as to the mode in which he could best travel, and particularly as to the places at which he would have to change carriages; and that, having obtained that information, he would write it on the back of the document which he intended to take with him to Derby. Accordingly, he (Sir A. Cockburn) found that Stafford was the first place where a person travelling from Shrewsbury to Derby would have to change carriages; Lichfield, the second; Burton-on-Trent, the third; and then came Derby. Had the letter been delivered to Morgan after he had arrived at Derby, he would not, in the first place, have needed to ask any information with respect to the change of carriages; and, in the second place, if he had, the names of the stations would have been placed exactly in the reverse order in which they were found in the document, not from Shrewsbury to Derby, but from Derby to Shrewsbury. He thought that this fact—in his opinion no small one—was a very significant one, as showing satisfactorily to every impartial mind that the letter must have been delivered to Morgan at Shrewsbury, and not at Derby. If, then, the letter was delivered by Frail to Morgan, and if the allegation of a conspiracy was still to be maintained, what was the consequence? It was impossible to conceive a conspiracy such as had been suggested except with the concurrence of Frail. Now, Frail was a man of whose electioneering morality, no man, perhaps, could entertain a worse opinion than he (Sir A. Cockburn) did. He believed him to be a man who was familiar with every scheme, artifice, and device which could be practised for working out corruption at elections. But, at the same time, nothing could be so abhorrent to his mind as for a single moment to distrust the perfect fidelity of Frail to the party for whom he had so long acted. No man knew better whether Frail was to be trusted than the right hon. Gentleman. From the election of 1847, throughout all the elections that had since taken place, and the petitions consequent upon those elections, Frail was the confidential agent of the right hon. Gentleman in the exercise of those delicate and mysterious functions which were necessary, he (Sir A. Cockburn) supposed, in the superintending and managing of the election interests of a party. And the right hon. Gentleman had declared that Frail was a person in whom the most implicit confidence might be placed. The right hon. Gentleman not only knew that Frail had been engaged in all the elections that had taken place in Shrewsbury for some ten or fifteen years past, but he knew he had been employed in the same way in various other parts of the country. He knew, therefore, that Frail was a person whose fidelity and zeal to his party had never been excelled. He (Sir A. Cockburn) might appeal to many hon. Members to confirm the statement. He was very sorry that the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer was not present, and still more sorry for the cause of his absence, for he intended to have called him into court, and asked him to vouch for the perfect trustworthiness and zeal of Mr. Frail. He (Sir A. Cockburn) did not believe that, as regarded trustworthiness, fidelity, and zeal for his party, Mr. Frail's character would be in any danger of suffering. It might be asked why Frail had given the letter to Morgan at all? Why, the contest for Shrewsbury was one which required all the activity and energy of Mr. Frail, and he, having received the letter on the Monday evening, or early on the Tuesday morning, and having to send some one to Derby immediately, was it not probable that, being so hurried, instead of writing to himself, he said to him, "Take that; you have only to show that letter to the agents at Derby, and they will perfectly understand who you are, what you come for, and what you are to do?" He had done with Mr. Frail, and he now came to Mr. Morgan. Could it be suggested that Morgan was in this conspiracy? Who was Morgan? Why, he was informed that Morgan was Mr. Frail's confidential man in all Frail's electioneering transactions. It appeared that Mr. Frail managed the registration not only for the borough of Shrewsbury, but also for a portion of the county, and that he employed Morgan, who was a valuer, to serve the requisite notices. Morgan was also a man who might be called as a witness in the registration court, when it was expedient to raise or to lower the value of property above or below 10*l*. Morgan was a man who was perfectly well known at Shrewsbury to be devoted to Frail. Was it likely that this man, if he had been selected by Flewker, would have lent himself to his betrayal? Even supposing

they could believe this of Frail and of Morgan, they had other difficulties to encounter, because, no sooner did Morgan arrive at Derby, than he was taken up by the agents and friends of Mr. Horsfall. According to the statement of the landlord of the County Tavern, he sent his card to Messrs. Cox, who could not desire to betray the relative and candidate whom they had induced to come forward on that occasion. If the letter had been written with reference to a former election, it must still have been written after previous concert with Messrs. Cox. If the concerted arrangement was not in 1852, but in 1848, would not the suspicions of those gentlemen have been roused when they received that card? But what did they do? They handed over the card to Mr. Radford to act upon it; and here the importance of the connexion between the candidate and Messrs. Cox became manifest. If that card was part of the machinery of a conspiracy, they would have had their suspicions aroused, and would have frustrated the scheme at its very commencement. He next turned to Mr. Radford. He was quite sure it would not be denied that Mr. Radford was one of the most stanch and zealous partisans of the Conservative party in Derby, and the landlord stated that the moment Mr. Radford was made aware that Morgan had arrived at Derby, he (Mr. Radford) at once proceeded to the County Tavern, and had an interview with him. He (Sir A. Cockburn) thought it could hardly be supposed that Radford was in the conspiracy. They then found that Mr. Hibbert and his men went over from Nottingham, and a stranger was found guarding the door when the police entered and arrested Morgan. Who was this stranger? One of the men who came over with Mr. Hibbert from Nottingham by the desire of Messrs. Huish and Radford, the undisputed agents of the candidate. So that they had Mr. Frail, Mr. Morgan, Messrs. Cox, Mr. Radford, and this stranger, all implicated in the transaction, and independent of any matter resting on the testimony of Mr. Flewker—because he (Sir A. Cockburn) did not trust the evidence of Mr. Flewker at all, except so far as it was corroborated and confirmed by facts and occurrences, in which the parties might be confronted with Mr. Flewker, to his discomfiture and shame, if in their evidence they proved them to be untrue. He would now apply a test which, to his mind, must be quite conclusive. He was quite sure there was not an hon. Member on either side of the House who would not agree with him that the test he was about to propose would be most efficient. Now, if there had been a conspiracy—if all those circumstances which had been brought to light were fictitious and fabricated, the result of an organised system of fraud and villany—what did they suppose would have been the conduct of the responsible agents of the candidate, Mr. Horsfall, at the time Morgan was arrested, and when these transactions were exposed? Did they suppose that Mr. Horsfall's agents would have come forward to protect and defend this man? If this man, unauthorised and uninvited, had introduced himself, and assumed the garb and disguise of a party for the purpose of treacherously betraying them—if they were conscious of their own innocence and his infamous plan—would they not at once have denounced him as an impostor and conspirator with whom they had nothing to do—one whom they repudiated and held up to public odium and execration; or did hon. Gentlemen suppose that they would have come forward to throw the shield of their protection over him, and to defend him against the consequences of his crime? Now, what was the case? Morgan was arrested on the Thursday; he was taken to prison, and no one had access to or communication with him, nor did he communicate with any one until he was brought up the next day before the magistrates. Then a very important personage made his appearance in the court, Mr. Forshaw, a solicitor of Liverpool, who had accompanied Mr. Horsfall from Liverpool, and who acted as his confidential agent and adviser, and exercising general superintendence during the election. That gentleman was present in the hall when Morgan was brought up for examination, and there was also present another attorney of the name of Sale, who, as he (Sir A. Cockburn) was informed, had acted as a subordinate agent in the course of the election. Morgan was without any legal agent or adviser. Mr. Forshaw, who, as he had said, was in the hall, called Mr. Sale aside. They had a private conversation for a few minutes, and then Mr. Sale rushed from Mr. Forshaw up to the table and announced that he was the professional adviser of Morgan. When the magistrates intimated their intention of remanding Morgan, Mr. Sale said, "I hope, gentlemen, you will take bail. We are provided with bail to any amount." Now, did this tally with the possible suspicion of any conspiracy or plot which might have for its object the betrayal of the Conservative party? Well, the magistrates remanded Morgan for a week, and before he was again brought up, succours had arrived from a new quarter. No sooner were the facts he (Sir A. Cockburn) had mentioned made public, than the greatest consternation, naturally enough, arose in the minds of Mr. Frail and his Conservative friends at Shrewsbury. Their man was taken; he was in the hands of the enemy, and was about to be consigned to the clutches of the law. Accordingly two attorneys—one was not enough—were immediately despatched from Shrewsbury, one of whom was upon an intimate footing with Mr. Frail, and the other was clerk of the peace for Shrewsbury, to use their best efforts to defend Morgan, and to get him out of the difficulty; and when, notwithstanding the exertions of these gentlemen, the magistrates committed Morgan, but intimated their intention to take bail, two Shrewsbury innkeepers were ready to offer bail. These innkeepers, he was told, were both staunch friends of the Conservative party, and at the house of one of them the freemen were wont to congregate at elections, when a little delicate work was very speedily done. Now, he would put it to any reasonable man whether, upon such a state of facts, he could for a single moment entertain any belief in the existence of a conspiracy? If there had been any conspiracy, was it to be supposed that the agents of the Conservative candidate for Derby would have come forward to defend this man Morgan; or was it credible that the people of Shrewsbury, who were devoted partisans and adherents of that political party, would have given their aid to Morgan if they had known him to be an impostor, a conspirator, and a villain? And yet that was the only hypothesis upon which the facts which had been brought to light would not lead to the conclusion which was most naturally to be deduced from them. He (Sir A. Cockburn) had now gone through the details of this case, and he had done so for a twofold purpose: firstly, to justify himself, in order that it might be seen that he had not rashly or inconsiderately brought the case before the House; and, secondly, to put the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Beresford) in possession of the whole case, both with regard to facts and argument, which could be brought forward against him. Unquestionably, if he (Sir A. Cockburn) had been conducting this case as an advocate at Nisi Prius, he would have rested upon the prima facie case, waiting for the answer of the party charged, and reserving his reply, or evidence of additional facts which might be adduced; but he did not think in such a case as this that that would be a handsome or liberal proceeding. He thought it was much better to bring all the facts at once to the knowledge of the right hon. Gentleman—to mention the names of all the parties implicated in these transactions, that the fullest and amplest opportunity might be afforded for a refutation of the statements. Now what, under these circumstances, was the course which the House ought to pursue? He thought it was impossible to contend that an inquiry ought not to be instituted; and he was happy to say, that in that respect he was given to understand the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Beresford) concurred with him. He was happy, also, to find that his hon. Friend the Member for South Devonshire (Sir J. Y. Buller) was of the same opinion. He was bound to do the right hon. Gentleman the justice of saying that, from the very commencement of these proceedings, he had demanded a full inquiry into the circumstances; and that, in the speech which the right hon. Gentleman addressed to his constituents at Braintree, on the 2nd of July last, he said this charge was the result of a conspiracy, and that nothing would deter him from insisting upon a full investigation. Indeed, the right hon. Gentleman had said, that unless some steps were taken by the parties who made the charges against him, he would himself, in his place in Parliament, move for an inquiry. Now, that was manly and straightforward conduct. He (Sir A. Cockburn) was aware it had been said that an inquiry would be premature, inasmuch as there was a judicial inquiry pending on the conduct of Morgan, and also an Election petition. These circumstances did not, however, in his mind, outweigh the necessity for a real inquiry. As to the judicial inquiry pending on the conduct of Morgan, it was a circumstance of every-day occurrence that, two parties being implicated in the same transaction, the principal was apprehended and tried at one place, and the accessory at another. Again, as regarded the Election petition, so far from the inquiry prejudicing the decision on that petition, it would rather be an advantage that the defendants should not be taken by surprise, but be in possession of the evidence they would have to meet. He entertained this opinion strongly, and he spoke feelingly, for really a man might almost doubt the reality of his own existence when he found with what charges he was, under such circumstances, assailed. He did not, therefore, think that any inconvenience would accrue to the person placed in the position of a defendant in the matter of the Election petition, if the inquiry which he now proposed should be instituted. He considered that if this were the case of a private individual, it might well be left to the ordinary tribunals, but when the person charged was a right hon. Gentleman, a Member of the Government, a Member of the Privy Council, and a Member, also, of that House, the case appeared to him to assume a very serious aspect, and one which it was neither beyond the province nor beneath the dignity of the House to investigate. He could not but think, therefore, that an inquiry ought to be instituted, and he hoped the House would be of the same opinion. As to the form in which that inquiry should be carried on, he was entirely in the hands of the House. He would suggest the appointment of a Select Committee for the purpose, but the mode of its constitution and selection he would leave entirely with the House. He believed they would be able to find hon. Gentlemen of impartial judgment who would conduct such an inquiry, and who would ascertain whether there had been an infraction of the law on the part of Gentlemen whose position—where the House was visiting poor voters with severe punishment—rendered it impossible that their misconduct could be overlooked.

SIR JOHN YARDE BULLER: When the hon. and learned Gentleman first brought forward this matter, he thought it was necessary inquiry should take place; and having listened to the statement which he had now made, he was fully convinced the House ought to agree to the proposition of the hon. and learned Gentleman to inquire into this case. He was quite satisfied no other course would satisfactorily clear up the charges which had been made, and therefore it became his duty to second the Motion of the hon. and learned Gentleman. As he made no opposition to the Motion on the part of his right hon. Friend (Mr. Beresford), and he knew that his right hon. Friend was most anxious the inquiry should take place, he could not anticipate any opposition from any portion of the House. But he was anxious that, with the full statement—and, he was bound to say, the fair statement—of the hon. and learned Gentleman, the case should go before the Committee unprejudiced and unprejudged. He meant unprejudiced by any exciting debate in that House. He should avoid anything of the kind himself. He should not make any comment on the statement of the hon. and learned Gentleman. He was perfectly content the case should go before the Committee on that statement, and he agreed with the hon. and learned Gentleman, that, be the Committee large or small, if well selected, there could be no doubt that they would calmly, and with the greatest care, sift the whole question, and help the House to come to a just decision. He should say no more on that occasion than that he begged to second the Motion of the hon. and learned Gentleman.

“That a Select Committee be appointed to take into consideration the matter of the Petition of Inhabitant Householders of the Borough of Derby [presented 22nd November], and to report thereupon to the House.”

MR. STUART WORTLEY said, it was impossible to deny the extreme importance of the question now brought before the House, and as all appeared unanimous to have the matter investigated by a Committee, it would ill become him to offer any opposition to the Motion for inquiry moved by his hon. and learned Friend, and seconded by the hon. Baronet opposite. At the same time he was most anxious, from the importance of the question, to look at it, not merely as it affected the right hon. Gentleman accused, but as it affected the privileges of that House and the ends of justice, not to allow this proceeding to be taken without entering his protest against this being drawn into a precedent. The House would remember this petition was presented at the commencement of the Session, at a time when an election petition was pending which must necessarily come before Parliament. He believed for the last half century it had been the endeavour of that House and of every great statesman to remove from the jurisdiction of the whole united body of the House all matters relating to elections. With that purpose Mr. Grenville's Act was passed, and to improve it Sir Robert Peel introduced the existing Act of Parliament, removing from the general consideration of the House, where party feeling too much prevailed, all matters relating to elections, to the more impartial tribunal which a Select Committee under the Act was presumed to afford. This was a petition which, among other statements, contained an allegation that a general system of bribery was carried out at the late Derby election. That must be a question before the Committee, and if that system was proved to have existed, the election must be void. There certainly were some precedents on this subject, but none, that he was aware of, exactly similar to the present. A Committee on which he had the honour of serving had to inquire into the interference of a noble Peer in the election of Stamford, and in 1835 or 1836 there was a Committee to inquire into the conduct of Mr. O'Connell and Mr. Raphael with reference to the Carlow Election. In those instances, there was no election petition pending. In 1819, to refer to an older case, a Committee was appointed to inquire into the conduct of Mr. Gwyn, who was charged with having abused his power as Lord Lieutenant of the county of Limerick, in the election for that county, but no election petition was pending in that case. There was, however, a still older case, more nearly resembling the present. It occurred in 1806, when a Gentleman who had petitioned against the return of Mr. Sheridan accused him, by petition to the House, of tampering with witnesses. On that occasion a Committee was appointed, but there were a great many who objected to it, and certainly, looking back to the proceedings of that inquiry at the bar, it was not encouraging of the course they were now pursuing. The late Lord Grey, then Lord Howick, and a Minister of the Crown, if he mistook not, said—

“Since the passing of the Grenville Bill the House had abstained from hearing at the bar evidence which might defeat the ends of justice before a Committee, and he trusted the House, in inquiring into the question of tampering with the witnesses, would shut out questions affecting the merits of the election.”

The subsequent proceedings showed how difficult it was to prevent the entering on the whole matter of the petition. Another most distinguished person, the brother of the illustrious author of the Grenville Act, Mr. Thomas Grenville, said in the same debate—

“A precedent might be established which might be attended with much inconvenience and much mischief hereafter. It was impossible to keep the two objects distinct, and no doubt, under the Grenville Act, the Committee would be competent to do justice in this case by making a special report. The House ought not to interfere with a jurisdiction so nearly identified with that which, by a solemn act, it had taken out of its own hands and delegated to a Committee."

In that case it was possible to distinguish between tampering with the witnesses and the allegations of the petition; but here it was impossible, because the gravamen of the charge, the most serious allegation of this petition, was, "that at the said election an organised system of bribery was resorted to, in defiance of the laws of the land, and to the great scandal of your petitioners." That was the case of his hon. and learned Friend—that the organisation existed at the prompting of the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Beresford). If, then, this Committee should find the right hon. Gentleman guilty of this great offence, it would establish the fact of bribery at the election, and make the election void. Was that not prejudging the very question on the election petition; and ought not that very question to be referred to an Election Committee? His hon. and learned Friend (Sir A. Cockburn) said, the defendant to the election petition had the advantage of the whole case being disclosed in the charge against the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary at War. He (Mr. Wortley) said the House ought not to give any advantage to either party coming before it. But another thing well worth consideration was this—that if they established the precedent, they might have petitions of this nature got up for the mere purpose of gaining information, to be used afterwards on the trial of the election petitions, and that information extracted from witnesses not upon oath, and at the expense of the country. He had now done his duty in bringing the subject before the House, and he trusted, in consideration of the privileges of the House and of the ends of justice, they would reflect and pause before they at once agreed to the appointment of the Committee now asked for.

MR. WALPOLE said, he would assuredly have opposed the Motion had he thought that the privileges of that House would be interfered with, or the rights of individual Members in the least degree infringed upon, by acceding to the appointment of the Committee, or had he thought that any constitutional right would be violated by the concession of that Committee. His right hon. and learned Friend who had just sat down ought to recollect that the power of that House to inquire into bribery and corruption at elections was independent of Statute Law; and that, notwithstanding Statute Law, they were invested with authority to make such inquiry as they should think fit for the purpose of putting a stop to all corrupt practices alleged to have been committed: and further, he should bear in mind that it was the duty of the House to entertain any charges which might be brought against any of its Members, and particularly against one who was a member of the Government. He did not give any opinion of these charges, but when they were brought in such a manner as to make it incumbent on the House to investigate them, the right hon. and learned Gentleman would, he thought, agree with him in holding, that certainly there would be no violation whatever of any constitutional privilege, either as regarded individual Members, or as regarded the House itself, in acceding to the Motion. If a sufficient case were made out for referring the matter to a Select Committee, he did not consider that any inconvenience would arise from such a course. It was impossible, after the statement of his hon. and learned Friend the Member for Southampton (Sir A. Cockburn), to deny that, supposing no inconvenience were to arise from the concession of a Committee, a case for inquiry had been prima facie made out; and, as his right hon. Friend the Secretary at War, by the voice of his hon. Friend behind him (Sir J. Y. Buller), had courted an investigation like that which was asked for, it was due to his right hon. Friend to concede an inquiry) which under these circumstances he had a right to claim, with the view of setting himself right with the House. Further than that, he (Mr. Walpole) would not go. He would not prejudge the case in one way or another; but, with respect to the manner in which the proposed investigation might operate on the Election Petition, it should be remembered that, while, as regarded the sitting Member, there would be some inconvenience, yet the inquiry before the Select Committee ought not to bind the Election Committee in regard to the claims preferred before it. No doubt it was in some respects a choice of evils, but the lesser seemed on the whole to be that to which they were now asked to submit; for the inconvenience which might happen to the sitting Member could not be so great as that which would result from refusing this inquiry to his right hon. Friend the Secretary at War, since he, in point of fact, would be no party to any Election petition, and the inquiry before the Election Committee would not be under his direction or control, nor would his right hon. Friend have any mode of interfering to defend himself. He would say no more at present; for, as the matter stood, the discussion of it was much to be deprecated, as the House ought to keep its mind perfectly open and unbiased till the result of the inquiry should be reported. The only suggestion he (Mr. Walpole) should offer with reference to the appointment of the Committee was, that the nomination of Members to serve thereon should be left to the choice of the Committee of Selection.

LORD JOHN RUSSELL said, he was glad to find the right hon. Gentleman agreed in the appointment of this Committee, and that he did not submit the case on the argument of the right hon. and learned Gentleman (Mr. S. Wortley), who opposed the appointment of the Committee. It appeared to him (Lord John Russell) that the right hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. Walpole) had taken a more constitutional view of this matter than the right hon. and learned Gentleman who preceded him. If any specific case of bribery could be alleged against a person holding the high office of Privy Councillor, and it was only to be inquired into by an Election Committee, he thought the Grenville Act would be a great evil, as barring the House from the performance of one of the greatest functions it could perform, and which ought not to be set aside. With respect to the appointment of the Committee, any suggestion of the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Walpole) ought to be attended to. It was only due to the right hon. Secretary at War, that if there was to be inquiry it should immediately begin, and be conducted to its close as soon as possible.

MR. HORSFALL said, he quite agreed with the hon. and learned Gentleman (Sir A. Cockburn) that the sitting Member could not be injured by any clear statement of fact in that House, and he did not complain of any statement of fact, but he thought he had a right to complain of some statements which the hon. and learned Gentleman had made, and which were not facts. He acquitted the hon. and learned Gentleman of intentional misrepresentation; but when the hon. and learned Gentleman relied on one statement which related to him (Mr. Horsfall) as an important link, connecting the sitting Member for Derby with the transaction, and on another statement as making the impossibility of a conspiracy conclusive, he thought it only right he should endeavour to point out that the hon. and learned Gentleman's chain had a broken link in it, and that the conclusion he had drawn was by no means satisfactory. The hon. and learned Gentleman had relied on the fact that he (Mr. Horsfall) was staying with his excellent and worthy friend Mr. Henry Cox, as showing that he (the sitting Member) was a party to the transaction alluded to in the petition, because Mr. Henry Cox was one of the firm of Cox, Brothers, and Co. He begged to set the hon. and learned Gentleman right on that statement. Mr. Henry Cox was not a partner in the firm at all. The hon. and learned Gentleman adduced it as most conclusive against the possibility of conspiracy, that Mr. Forshaw, his (Mr. Horsfall's) solicitor, attended before the magistrates upon the examination of Morgan. Mr. Forshaw attended, not to defend Morgan, but simply at his (Mr. Horsfall's) request, to see that nothing was said or done which was prejudicial to him (Mr. Horsfall). Having said thus much, he did not mean to enter into the circumstances of a case which would so speedily come before a Committee; but this he must say, that highly as he valued a seat in that House, and still more highly as he valued that honour in connexion with the borough of Derby, he should consider it dearly bought if he could participate directly or indirectly in such proceedings as those which had been alluded to.

SIR CHARLES WOOD said, that as there seemed to be no objection to the appointment of a Committee, he would merely offer a suggestion as to the mode in which that Committee should be constituted. It had been said that this duty ought to devolve on the Committee of Selection; but he thought that it would be more properly discharged by those who were appointed under the Speaker's warrant at the General Committee of Elections. The Committee of Selection was quite a different body.

MR. WALPOLE said, he begged to explain that he meant to have said the General Committee of Elections.

SIR CHARLES WOOD said, he was glad to find that the right hon. Gentleman was of that opinion, as there was the greatest necessity for the selection of impartial persons to form the Committee, and the best course would therefore be that they should be named by the General Committee of Elections. Probably it would be advisable, also, that the course should be taken in this case which was adopted at the Carlow Election Committee, namely, that two Members, the one representing the petitioners, and the other representing the right

hon. Gentleman (Mr. Beresford), should serve on that Committee, but without voting, in order that the accusations on the one side, and the defence on the other, might be fairly and properly brought before the Committee. He should suggest, therefore, that the Committee should consist of five Members, that it should be appointed by the General Committee of Elections, and that two Members of the House should sit on it as assessors, but without the power of voting.

The ATTORNEY GENERAL said, he quite agreed with the right hon. Gentleman who had just sat down that it was desirable that the Committee should be appointed by the General Committee of Elections, and also that the number of the Members composing the Committee should be five. But he differed very much with him in the suggestion which he had made, following the precedent of the Carlow Election Committee, in 1836, that one Member should be chosen by his hon. and learned Friend (Sir A. Cockburn) on the one hand, and one by the right hon. Secretary at War on the other, for the purpose of acting as assessors to the Committee. He was quite sure that if Members were so selected, they would be precisely what the old nominees were, and that they would be advocates, and not assessors. [Sir C. Wood: They are not to have votes.] That was precisely the ground of his objection. He wished they had votes, and then they would feel something of the responsibility of Judges. He must say that he did not think it at all a desirable thing that Members should act as advocates in a case where a very grave and serious charge had been brought against a right hon. Member of that House.

SIR ALEXANDER COCKBURN said, he must say, with every possible respect for his hon. and learned Friend the Attorney General, that if this inquiry was to be left to five Gentlemen, uninformed as they must be on the whole matter until they met in Committee, it would be better that the inquiry should not be commenced at all. His hon. and learned Friend said, that the representative Members would be advocates of the parties; why, they were intended to be advocates. Unless his hon. and learned Friend meant to say that the administration of justice was impeded by advocates, and that cross-examination had no efficacy, he did not see why this valuable instrument for the discovery of truth should be shut out. He thought that these two Members should have no voice in the deliberations of the Committee, but that they should be entitled to attend and put questions, unless it was intended that counsel should be heard before the Committee. This was an accusation met by a counter-accusation of a most outrageous and scandalous conspiracy. It was, therefore, necessary that the matter should be investigated with the greatest degree of vigour.

MR. STUART WORTLEY said, he would not take a division on the question, but he hoped that this peculiar case would not be drawn into a precedent.

SIR JOHN YARDE BULLER said, that his right hon. Friend (Mr. Beresford), who had withdrawn from the House, had left it to him (Sir J. Buller) to act for him in his absence, and, speaking for himself, he would say that he would rather hear counsel than a nominee Member.

The ATTORNEY GENERAL said, he had not the slightest objection to the appearance of counsel before the Committee, but he felt a very great objection to Members of the House appearing in that capacity.

LORD JOHN RUSSELL said, he should be glad to know what opinions the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for the Home Department held on this point.

MR. WALPOLE said, he had no objection at all to the hearing of counsel by the Committee; on the contrary, he should rather prefer it, and he agreed with his hon. and learned Friend the Attorney General in thinking it very undesirable that Members of the House should act as representatives of the parties before Committees.

Motion agreed to.

Instruction to the Gentlemen named on the General Committee of Elections, to select a Committee of five Members, to whom the said Petition be referred, and who shall have power to send for persons, papers, and records, and that the parties have leave to appear by themselves, their Counsel, or Agents.

COURTS OF COMMON LAW (IRELAND) BILL.

Order for Second Reading read.

MR. WHITESIDE moved that this Bill be now read a Second Time.

MR. J. D. FITZGERALD begged to express his readiness to assist his hon. and learned Friend the Solicitor General for Ireland in making this Bill as beneficial as possible; but when he (Mr. Fitzgerald) informed the House that the Bill consisted of 276 sections, of which 144 were taken from the Common Law Procedure Act of last Session, and which not only consolidated but made many very serious amendments and additions to the law of Ireland, and that he had only received a copy of it that morning, he thought his hon. and learned Friend would not consider him unreasonable in requiring a little more time before he was fully prepared to assent to the whole of its provisions. He would read the preamble, which would give the House a tolerably clear idea of the very extensive nature of the alterations it was proposed to make by this Bill. It recited

“Whereas it is expedient to simplify and amend the course of Procedure as to the Process, Practice, Pleadings, and Evidence in the Superior Courts of Common Law in Ireland, so as to make the same less dilatory and expensive, and to prevent substantial justice from being defeated by reason of the variety of forms of action, and the technicalities and prolixity of Pleadings, and the unnecessary length of Records, and to consolidate the provisions of several Statutes and Rules of Court relating to such proceedings, and also to enable the said Superior Courts of Common Law to give effect to certain legal rights and just defences without the expense and delay of a resort to a Court of Equity.”

A Commission of Inquiry into the procedure of the common law in Ireland was appointed during the Viceroyalty of Earl de Grey, and the Commission made a Report in which various improvements were suggested. These suggestions were carried into effect by two Acts of Parliament; and in 1850 another Act passed, called “The Practice and Process Act,” under which, and a code of rules framed under it by the Judges, the common law in Ireland was now administered; it did, therefore, appear to him strange that, so soon as the year 1852, another Act should be introduced which would make considerable alterations in the Act of 1850. The Bill now before the House made some new provisions in the law of Ireland, particularly with reference to commercial transactions. Now, it was well known that the commercial transactions of this country and of Ireland were much mixed up together, and he thought it unwise to legislate upon such subjects for one country and not for the other. Among other things, “it made choses of action” assignable, which by the Common Law they were not; but these would only be assignable in Ireland, and not in England. This he considered very objectionable, and such an alteration ought not to be made unless it were extended to England; for instance, policies of insurance would be thus made assignable in Ireland, and not in England, where nine-tenths of the policies effected in Ireland were entered into by English Assurance Companies. There was one serious omission in the Bill. The law in Ireland upon the subject of security by judgment was in a most unsatisfactory state. It had been altered year after year till no lawyer could venture to give an opinion upon any question relating to the law of judgment in that country. There were six conflicting Acts in Ireland upon the subject, and yet, although his hon. and learned Friend in his Bill had dealt somewhat largely with security by judgment, he had stopped short of treating the matter as a whole, so as to remove all difficulty for the future respecting it. Again, his hon. and learned Friend proposed to repeal several Acts, and it was stated in the repealing section that those Acts would be found enumerated in the Schedule; but he looked for the Schedule; it was not to be found in the Bill, so that he could not discover what were the Acts intended to be repealed. In these and in other respects the Bill admitted of considerable amendment, and he should be happy to give his assistance to effect that object; but, in order to be able to do so, he should require, that if the Bill were now read a second time, it should not go into Committee till after the recess, and that he should be permitted, on the third reading, to oppose any part of the Bill that he thought objectionable on principle. But the principal defect he found in the Bill was, that while it professed to be a consolidation and an amendment of the law, it was not in its provisions half so extensive as it ought to be. His hon. and learned Friend had proceeded to deal with one great principle that had recently been made the subject of much agitation, involving the question whether the distinction of Courts of Law and Courts of Equity should be suffered to exist. Now, he (Mr. Fitzgerald) did not at present profess to state what his own opinion was in regard to that question, and probably, too, his hon. and learned Friend might entertain some doubts upon it. But he (Mr. Fitzgerald) found in the Bill that the subject had been directly dealt with, and that the distinction between Law and Equity in one particular or two had been entirely swept away. Why, if the principle were adopted at all, should his hon. and learned Friend stop short and apply it only to a small evil? If this part of the measure be not well and duly considered, the consequence would be that the Bill, when passed into an Act, would meet with the same fate as other Acts passed heretofore had done, and that, perhaps, in the Session of 1854 his hon. and learned Friend would again come forward and propose some further Act to amend the law of the Session of 1852. As a lawyer, he confessed he did not know in what position they stood, the alterations having been so many within the last few years. It could not be denied, however, that Ireland had long preceded England in reform of the law. They had there County Courts and other popular improvements half a century before they were adopted in this country; and the reform of the Superior Courts of Common Law and Equity had been steadily progressing for the last twenty years. He was still anxious to see further improvements introduced there, and therefore should be willing to assist his hon. and learned Friend in extending this measure. His hon. and learned Friend was once a Protectionist in law, and had now become a Free-trader in law. To that he (Mr. Fitzgerald) did not object; neither did he ask him to insert in the preamble that this was "a wise, just, and beneficial measure;" but what he did ask him was, not to object to allow him (Mr. Fitzgerald) an opportunity to assist him in carrying out the Bill by agreeing to postpone the Committee till after the Christmas recess.

MR. LOWE said, that having given a great deal of time and trouble on the subject of law reform, he felt bound to say that this Bill did the hon. and learned Gentleman the Solicitor General for Ireland a great deal of credit. In his eloquent and luminous speech he had laid down some excellent and sound principles; and altogether he considered the present measure to be one far in advance of that introduced last Session for the amendment of the law in this country. The hon. and learned Gentleman abolished all those absurd technicalities and monstrous falsehoods which had so long been the opprobrium of the law, and introduced a noble and just principle—that of making parties verify their pleadings, so that courts of justice should no longer decide as they now did, on merely technical and mendacious grounds, instead of on what was the real and true state of the case between the parties. The Bill also introduced another very valuable principle—namely, the assignment of debts and of choses in action. In these and in many other respects he considered the measure to be one very much in advance of that of last Session, and that it was a step very honourable to the legal ability and liberal views of the hon. and learned Gentleman. But, just in proportion as this Bill did credit to the hon. and learned Solicitor General for Ireland, so just in proportion was it a reflection on the measure of legislation of last Session which was passed for reforming the law of procedure in this country. The two measures for the reform of the law—that for England in the last Session, and that for Ireland this Session—were substantially identical; it was therefore not creditable to the House of Commons, nor to the state of the science of jurisprudence in this country, that on two subjects so completely identical there should emanate from the House measures so very different in their foundation; because, although he had heard it said that Ireland was in some respects ahead of this country, in law reform, still, the law of the two countries being in principle identical, that which was good and true for one country, must be good and true for the other country. But what was the fact? There had been a conference of legal persons of high legal standing to consider the propriety of bringing the law of the three kingdoms into a state of harmony, by doing away with difficulties and anomalies, so as to enable persons to carry on their transactions by one and the same rule and process. But what did the Bill now before the House effect? It actually tended to create further differences in the law; and, indeed, its very improvement over the measure of last Session, in that sense, would create greater difficulties than existed at present. The subject, therefore, was one which demanded considerable inquiry; and, though he did not mean to object to the second reading of the Bill, yet he thought it his duty to suggest a few matters for the consideration of the hon. and learned Gentleman. The main and principal point on which the hon. and learned Gentleman dwelt when he addressed the House with so much eloquence and ability on introducing his measure, was the absurdity of retaining those technical forms of action which existed in the courts, and which he so justly described as the remnants of an obsolete feudal system; and the hon. and learned Gentleman said that it was his intention to abolish those technical forms accordingly. But he (Mr. Lowe) regretted to say that that intention was not by this Bill entirely carried out. For, though it was stated in the preamble that it was expedient "to prevent substantial justice from being defeated by reason of the variety of forms of action, and the technicalities and prolixity of pleadings," yet, when he came to look at the section itself with respect to the forms of action, it ran in these terms: "The technical terms of action heretofore used shall not be necessary"—it did not say, "shall be abolished"—but it left them in a middle state, so that they might or might not be retained. Now, he contended that, if technical forms were good, they ought to remain, and if they were bad, they ought to be abolished. But, if hon. Members would go on a little further in the Bill, they would see that not only were these technical forms of action not abolished, but that they really remained as a vital and integral part of the law of procedure. For by the 6th section it was provided, that—

"The right to recover any debt or damages or personal chattel, in respect of any matter of contract or of tort, or taking or detention, which might have been heretofore the subject of any action of debt, covenant, assumpsit, account, trespass, trespass on the case, trover, replevin, or detinue, shall and may be enforced in an action to be called a 'personal action;' and all actions of 'ejectment' shall henceforth be commenced and prosecuted in the manner hereinafter provided."

And then, by the 7th Clause, it was provided that—

"The Court shall have and exercise, in and about any matter brought before it, in any such personal action or action of ejectment, under the provisions of this Act, the same jurisdiction, power, authority, and discretion, to all intents and purposes, as it could have exercised in an action for the same purpose instituted in the manner hereinbefore used."

Now, what did that mean? It meant this, that if a question arose as to the jurisdiction of the Court of Common Law in Ireland, or as to what this Act applied to, the only answer the Act itself gave was this, that the Courts of Common Law in Ireland had jurisdiction over, and that the Act applied to, matters which were now sued for in those particular technical forms of action which were specified in the Bill. So that the Bill, instead of relieving us from those technical forms, continued them, and the Irish lawyer would be just as much obliged to acquaint himself with all those forms of action of debt, account, assumpsit, covenant, detinue, trespass, trespass on the case, trover, or replevin, not only for the purpose of knowing what action he might bring, but in order to ascertain the jurisdiction of a Court of Common Law as opposed to a Court of Equity. So far, therefore, from the hon. and learned Gentleman having abolished those forms of action, the effect of this measure was to make them the foundation of his general form of action, and it was only by reference to them that it could be known what was the jurisdiction of the Common Law Courts at all. He (Mr. Lowe) agreed with the hon. and learned Gentleman that it was absolutely necessary that these forms should be swept away if they were to make any advance in the improvement of Common Law pleading; but, framed as the Bill was at present, those actions were made to constitute the very basis of the Common Law Courts themselves. The hon. and learned Gentleman had established by reasoning that the distinction between Common Law and Equity itself must be swept away. Very well; if that be so, let us adopt the principle; but don't attempt to sweep that distinction away by pretending to abolish those forms which constitute that very distinction, and yet by the same Act retain the forms, and thus uphold the foundation of the two descriptions of courts. If they once got rid of those technical forms, they would get rid of the distinction between Common Law and Equity. Therefore, if any man could make up his mind to go as far as this Bill went, he ought to go a great deal further. This was not merely theory on his part, for the hon. and learned Gentleman the Solicitor General for Ireland would recollect the introduction of the Bill for altering the Common Law in this country. The opinion of the Common Law Commission was, that these forms of action should be abolished, and a Bill was prepared for that purpose. But, when it was so prepared, it was perceived that not merely would they be getting rid of those technical forms of action inter se, but they would be getting rid of the difference between Common Law and Equity altogether. On perceiving this, the Committee who prepared the Bill considered that they would be unnecessarily destroying the landmarks between Common Law and Equity; they therefore withdrew the first Bill and introduced a second, and thereby retained the technical forms of action as before. Now, that was consistent. Those Gentlemen were not prepared to throw down the distinction between Common Law and Equity; they therefore fell back upon the common forms of action. But the hon. and learned Gentleman had gone further than that—he had abolished the forms of action; but he must not abolish those forms in one section, and bring them back again in another. He (Mr. Lowe) called the attention of the hon. and learned Gentleman more particularly to this matter, because he had made some laudable efforts to correct the law by giving the Courts of Common Law power to give relief in cases of lost bills and instruments, and also by allowing equitable defences to actions of ejectment. He had also given the Common Law Courts the power of setting aside inequitable legal defences, such as those founded on outstanding legal estates. He (Mr. Lowe) thought it could hardly be denied, that if that principle were good for anything, it was good for a great deal more than that. If the hon. and learned Gentleman set the distinction of Law and Equity aside in these matters, was it not by surprise or by mistake that he had not done so in matters of the highest importance? Either it was right to retain these forms of action, and to perpetuate his distinction of jurisdiction, or it was not. If not, then why do so in some few cases? But, if right to do so in respect to these, would it not be far better to do so in respect to all? Was it not monstrous that one set of courts should only recognise rights in the mortgagor, and another set of courts only in the mortgagee? That one should see no rights except in a trustee, and the other no rights except in the cestuique trust? That one should maintain, and the other should set aside transactions, on the very same facts? Surely, if the principle of giving to the Courts of Law equitable jurisdiction in some cases were good for anything, it was good for much more. He felt sure that the question could not rest here; and he ventured to hope that his hon. and learned Friend would be induced to see whether matters could not be carried further, and whether that great principle which had been advocated by Lord Mansfield, by Bentham, and by all the great lawyers who had given much attention to law reform, could not be accomplished, and the false and mischievous distinction between Law and Equity be for ever exploded. With regard to the alteration proposed in the form of procedure, he objected to the plan of making an abstract of the pleadings, as was proposed in this Bill, because, when parties had gone to the expense of pleading they had incurred enough cost, and the next best thing was to try the case, instead of which it was provided that an abstract of the pleadings should be made by the attorneys on both sides, if they could agree, and, if they could not agree, application was to be made to the Judge. This appeared to him to be objectionable, on the ground of expense. He perceived also a great omission in this Bill, with respect to the kind of judgment that might be pronounced in an action under its operation. In Equity a suitor, if successful, obtained such a decree as he asked for, or as the court thought just; but at Common Law the Court could only give a strict technical judgment. Now as the technical judgment followed the technical division of actions, now that the forms of action were abolished, he wished to know how the Court was to be directed in its judgment. He entreated the hon. and learned Gentleman to consider the few observations he had taken the liberty of making, and to endeavour to put the matters he had referred to on a more satisfactory footing.

SIR ALEXANDER COCKBURN said, he was very glad the hon. and learned Solicitor General for Ireland had brought in this measure, and he should regret much if the Bill should not be read a second time. At the same time he fully agreed with the hon. and learned Member (Mr. Fitzgerald), that it would be a great pity to prematurely hurry the Bill through Committee. He quite concurred in what had been just stated by the hon. and learned Member for Kidderminster (Mr. Lowe), namely, that the Bill now before the House was a great advance upon the English Common Law Procedure Bill of last Session, and thought he could point out the reason for this. The Common Law Commission recommended the abolition of the forms of action; but this important Amendment was abandoned, because certain judicial authorities were alarmed at the recommendation of the Commission going to such great length. We sometimes cut away the mast in order to save the ship, and, on that principle, it was found necessary to give up the proposed alteration. He very much regretted this, and now that the Government were prepared to go so far in the reform of the Irish Law, he trusted they would apply the same principle to the English Common Law. He willingly admitted that this Bill was an advance in other respects upon the Bill adopted in accordance with the Report of the Commission of which he had the honour of being a member. They had thought it necessary to deal with the incidents of an action in its various stages; but the Commission were not prepared to stop there, and their recommendations would form the subject of a Report which would shortly be laid before the House, and in which would be considered several most important matters, which formed no part of the Bill of the hon. and learned Gentleman. They would probably propose that Courts of Law should give the effect of a Bill of Discovery by the examination of parties to a suit; and that the Common Law Courts should have power of discovery without any expense, not according to the form of procedure in the Courts of Equity, but by a simple process of oral discovery, bringing up the parties and giving the Judge the power of immediately striking out the pleadings. So with regard to the power of persons who had only an equitable right maintaining a legal action; and alterations were also proposed in many other important respects. They proposed to introduce various Amendments, doing away with technical forms of action which had become obsolete and ought to be abolished. With regard to the jury system, it was worthy of consideration whether the plan adopted in the County Courts, which had worked so well, should not become a guide for the practice of the Superior Courts—namely, that of allowing parties, by consent, to deal with a question, either with or without a jury, as they liked. If parties consented to try their cause before a Judge in whom they both had confidence, they should not be compelled to have recourse to the more expensive and less satisfactory process of a jury. He believed that one of the reasons why County Courts worked so admirably was, that if any new matter turned up in the course of a case, the Judge, sitting from day to day in the discharge of his duties, was enabled to say, “Come before me again to-morrow;” whereas with a jury the case must be gone through from beginning to end without adjournment, and the only remedy was to obtain, at immense expense, a new trial. A variety of subjects of this kind were under consideration, and would receive the best attention of the Commission, whose anxious desire was to make the procedure in the Courts of Common Law as complete and satisfactory as it could be made. He quite agreed with what had been said in favour of doing away with the distinction between the jurisdiction of the Courts of Law and Equity, the reason for the existence of which was, that the Legislature had in all ages abused the lawyers, instead of amending the Law, and that the Law, consequently, grew so stubborn and inflexible, that Equity crept in as a clumsy substitute, and a mode of doing ultimate justice. The first thing, therefore, was to make

Law and Equity one—to abolish all distinctions between Law and Equity, and, as the consequence, all distinctions in their jurisdiction. He hoped they were all agreed on the great question of law reform, and alike anxious to discharge their duty as regarded it to the public. As a member of the profession, he might say he believed that from one end of Westminster Hall to the other, the necessity for legal reform was admitted—an admission which, indeed, was, on the part of the profession, only an enlarged view of their own interest. They might depend upon it that the cumbrous rules and methods which it was proposed to abolish, only prevented parties, who otherwise would go into Court from asserting their rights, and, he was certain, did absolute injury to the profession as well as to the public.

MR. CROWDER said, he was exceedingly happy to give his cordial vote in favour of the second reading of this Bill, and he begged to congratulate the hon. and learned Gentleman the Solicitor General for Ireland upon the able manner in which he had brought it forward. The Bill in many respects was undoubtedly an improvement on that passed during the last Session for the Amendment of Common Law Procedure in England. His (Mr. Crowder's) only difficulty was to understand how the Law Officers of the Crown thought fit to pass the measure of last Session without the introduction of those very Amendments to which the attention of the House was now being directed, because they had not been discovered since the passing of that Act, for they had been suggested by members of the legal profession, and had even been discussed in that House. He fully concurred at the time in every one of those suggested improvements; but, nevertheless, no notice was taken of them on the second reading of the English Bill; and when the measure passed through Committee, the consequence was that they had a measure applied to the Common Law Courts of this country, which was decidedly inferior to that introduced on the present occasion to regulate the Common Law Procedure in Ireland. With respect to the abolition of the forms of action, he fully approved of that Amendment. It was stated that the Common Law Commission in their Report recommended the abolition of those forms, but that part of their recommendations was, nevertheless, not carried out, owing, as it appeared, to the expressed opinions of certain high judicial personages. He apprehended, however, that it was the duty of that House not to be biased by any notices of that sort, provided they were fully persuaded that such improvements ought to take place. For himself he was fully persuaded that all forms of action should be abolished. He did not think it necessary to go into the matter as fully as the hon. and learned Member for Kidderminster (Mr. Lowe) had done; but he would say with regard to another of those improvements—the pleadings—he thought that also a matter of very great importance in the conduct of lawsuits. How stood the case with respect to that? Why, in the Common Law Procedure Act, passed last Session, there was the declaration, the plea, the rejoinder, the surrejoinder, &c.; but in the present measure he found that was not to be a declaration but a plaint, which he thought a great improvement. Why was not that improvement introduced into the English Act? He thought the House had a right to complain, when they saw the legal reforms of Ireland so much in advance of this country. He complained that not one of those improvements—for he thought they were all valuable improvements—had been introduced into the English Act. There was another point on which he wished to say one word. He remembered himself calling the attention of the hon. and learned Attorney General, when the English Bill was in Committee, to the clause relating to the payment of money into Court. That was limited to certain causes of action; but in the present Bill he found that was allowed in all causes—assaults, false imprisonment, libel, slander, malicious prosecutions, &c. The hon. and learned Solicitor General would probably recollect that he (Mr. Crowder) had pointed out that improvement for the English Bill, for he had expressed his approval of it at the time, but yet it had not been introduced into the Bill. He (Mr. Crowder) also approved of that clause of the present Bill which would enable assignees in “choses” of action to bring the action into Court, for he thought the law as it stood in that respect was a very idle distinction. He had made those observations in a friendly spirit towards the Law Officers of the Crown, both of England and Ireland; but he could not help repeating that it did appear to him very extraordinary that those very valuable improvements had not been introduced into the Common Law Procedure Bill for England; and it seemed to him still more remarkable that the Law Officers for Ireland, who had assisted in framing the English Bill, had not introduced those improvements into it. He still hoped, however, with his hon. and learned Friend the Member for Southampton (Sir A. Cockburn), that they would yet have those improvements in the English Law, and that the Law Officers of the Crown would introduce every species of reform consistent with the improved administration of the law, of which the present measure was such a favourable commencement.

The ATTORNEY GENERAL said, he was desirous of receiving in a friendly spirit the observations of the hon. and learned Gentleman (Mr. Crowder), and quite agreed with him that his hon. and learned Friend the Solicitor General for Ireland deserved the gratitude of the House, not only for this measure itself, but for the very able and clear manner in which he had introduced it. But the hon. and learned Gentleman (Mr. Crowder), in making some very serious reflections upon the Law Officers of the Crown in England, had forgotten the circumstances under which they had charge of the Bill of last Session, which was said to be so deficient in its amendment of the Common Law Procedure in England, and the utter impossibility of making those additions which were proposed at the time. The hon. and learned Gentleman apparently had forgotten the impatience with which the Opposition side of the House had listened to any attempt to introduce any new measures, attributing to the Ministry that they were endeavouring to prolong the Session unnecessarily, and to disappoint the expectations formed of an early dissolution. This Common Law Procedure Bill came down from the Lords at a very late period of the Session. His hon. and learned Friend suggested various alterations in it, but whether he (the Attorney General) agreed with them or not was perfectly immaterial; there appeared to be a great chance of losing the Bill altogether, and they were therefore obliged to hurry it through the House. He was thus not a free agent in the matter; he had no liberty of choice. It was important to pass the Bill even in an imperfect state, and he had trusted to future occasions to introduce improvements, to which it was impossible to attend at the time they were made. His hon. and learned Friend said the Bill for Ireland was in advance of that for England, and seemed to feel a certain shame that it should be so. He must consider this, that in Ireland they had the opportunity of looking from the limits to which we had arrived, and must remember that even a dwarf, when on a giant's shoulders, saw farther than the giant. The Irish lawyers had had the benefit of English experience. His hon. and learned Friend the Solicitor General for Ireland had, he confessed introduced great improvements beyond those they possessed in the English law; but the House must not believe for one moment that he (the Attorney General) was not quite prepared at the proper time to adopt any improvements that could be made in the Common Law Procedure Act. With regard to the forthcoming Report of the Commission, it would be necessary to consider very carefully the amendments suggested, and not to rush at once upon all those reforms which were recommended by those ardent reformers who were among its members. The discussion upon which they were at present engaged was a very desultory, although he hoped not an unprofitable one. The suggestions made as to the working of this Bill were not now well timed, because the House was not discussing the details; they were only considering the principle of the measure, and those hon. Gentlemen who agreed to the second reading would have ample opportunities in Committee of suggesting the valuable improvements which they had heard to-night. He trusted the House would forgive him if he had been drawn away from the question really before them. Let the Bill go to a second reading, and when it went into Committee hon. Gentlemen could then suggest any alterations or improvements they thought proper. He was sure they would all come to the consideration of the question in the same spirit—a desire to make it as perfect and good a Bill as possible.

MR. COLLIER said, it was not his intention to go into the details of the measure before the House; he would only make a few observations upon its principle. He quite agreed with the hon. and learned Member for Liskeard (Mr. Crowder), that the present measure was a very great improvement on the Bill of last Session. He thought the hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General somewhat misunderstood the observations of his hon. and learned Friend the Member for Liskeard. He (Mr. Collier) did not understand that hon. and learned Member to cast any reflections on Her Majesty's Law Officers, but only complained that a similar measure, introduced for England, had fallen so very far short of that for Ireland. It seemed to him one great advantage of the measure then before the House was, that the form of pleadings, which we had tried a long time in our Courts of Common Law, had been found wanting, and had, in the present Bill, been thrown aside and a new system adopted. He also approved highly of the clauses of the Bill relating to County Courts, which had been eminently successful, and had afforded great satisfaction in this country. He also thought the clauses relating to equitable jurisdiction a great improvement; and he concurred in the remark of his hon. and learned Friend the Member for Kidderminster (Mr. Lowe), that those who had gone thus far in Law Reform must consider whether they would not have to go much farther. With respect to the fusion of Law and Equity, which some thought so desirable, he concurred with those who said that there should be no rational distinction between them—that Equity was merely an excrescence on our system, arising from the imperfections in our Law. But it was another question as regarded jurisdiction, or whether the two could not be amalgamated in one common tribunal. He could quite understand that it might be necessary to have different Courts for a division of labour; but an anomaly which he apprehended was most objectionable was this—to see two different tribunals adjudicating on one matter on different principles. The only satisfactory law reform was that which would provide that the jurisdiction of a Court should be an entire and perfect jurisdiction. As an example, he would put a case, suggested by the hon. and learned Member for Southampton (Sir A. Cockburn). Why was it that a Court of Common Law could award damages for the non-performance of a contract, but could not enforce the payment of those damages? Then, again, with regard to injunctions. He remembered a case, tried before the present Lord Chief Justice—it was the case of the convent at Clapham, where the priests kept ringing the bells to the great disturbance and annoyance of the neighbourhood. An action was brought against the priests, and damages were recovered; but it seemed a strange anomaly that though the Lord Chief Justice could give damages, he could not stop the bells, but they might go on ringing the bells for ever, subject only to as many actions as might be brought against them. Now, for the reasons he had given, it appeared to him that this Bill was framed in a very comprehensive spirit, and he would meet with the same fate as other Acts passed heretofore had done, and that, perhaps, in the Session of 1854 his hon. and learned Friend would again come forward and propose some further Act to amend the law of the Session of 1852. As a lawyer, he confessed he did not know in what position they stood, the alterations having been so many within the last few years. It could not be denied, however, that Ireland had long preceded England in reform of the law. They had there County Courts and other popular improvements half a century before they were adopted in this country; and the reform of the Superior Courts of Common Law and Equity had been steadily progressing for the last twenty years. He was still anxious to see further improvements introduced there, and therefore should be willing to assist his hon. and learned Friend in extending this measure. His hon. and learned Friend was once a Protectionist in law, and had now become a Free-trader in law. To that he (Mr. Fitzgerald) did not object; neither did he ask him to insert in the preamble that this was "a wise, just, and beneficial measure;" but what he did ask him was, not to object to allow him (Mr. Fitzgerald) an opportunity to assist him in carrying out the Bill by agreeing to postpone the Committee till after the Christmas recess.

MR. LOWE said, that having given a great deal of time and trouble on the subject of law reform, he felt bound to say that this Bill did the hon. and learned Gentleman the Solicitor General for Ireland a great deal of credit. In his eloquent and luminous speech he had laid down some excellent and sound principles; and altogether he considered the present measure to be one far in advance of that introduced last Session for the amendment of the law in this country. The hon. and learned Gentleman abolished all those absurd technicalities and monstrous falsehoods which had so long been the opprobrium of the law, and introduced a noble and just principle—that of making parties verify their pleadings, so that courts of justice should no longer decide as they now did, on merely technical and mendacious grounds, instead of on what was the real and true state of the case between the parties. The Bill also introduced another very valuable principle—namely, the assignment of debts and of choses in action. In these and in many other respects he considered the measure to be one very much in advance of that of last Session, and that it was a step very honourable to the legal ability and liberal views of the hon. and learned Gentleman. But, just in proportion as this Bill did credit to the hon. and learned Solicitor General for Ireland, so just in proportion was it a reflection on the measure of legislation of last Session which was passed for reforming the law of procedure in this country. The two measures for the reform of the law—that for England in the last Session, and that for Ireland this Session—were substantially identical; it was therefore not creditable to the House of Commons, nor to the state of the science of jurisprudence in this country, that on two subjects so completely identical there should emanate from the House measures so very different in their foundation; because, although he had heard it said that Ireland was in some respects ahead of this country, in law reform, still, the law of the two countries being in principle identical, that which was good and true for one country, must be good and true for the other country. But what was the fact? There had been a conference of legal persons of high legal standing to consider the propriety of bringing the law of the three kingdoms into a state of harmony, by doing away with difficulties and anomalies, so as to enable persons to carry on their transactions by one and the same rule and process. But what did the Bill now before the House effect? It actually tended to create further differences in the law; and, indeed, its very improvement over the measure of last Session, in that sense, would create greater difficulties than existed at present. The subject, therefore, was one which demanded considerable inquiry; and, though he did not mean to object to the second reading of the Bill, yet he thought it his duty to suggest a few matters for the consideration of the hon. and learned Gentleman. The main and principal point on which the hon. and learned Gentleman dwelt when he addressed the House with so much eloquence and ability on introducing his measure, was the absurdity of retaining those technical forms of action which existed in the courts, and which he so justly described as the remnants of an obsolete feudal system; and the hon. and learned Gentleman said that it was his intention to abolish those technical forms accordingly. But he (Mr. Lowe) regretted to say that that intention was not by this Bill entirely carried out. For, though it was stated in the preamble that it was expedient "to prevent substantial justice from being defeated by reason of the variety of forms of action, and the technicalities and prolixity of pleadings," yet, when he came to look at the section itself with respect to the forms of action, it ran in these terms: "The technical terms of action heretofore used shall not be necessary"—it did not say, "shall be abolished"—but it left them in a middle state, so that they might or might not be retained. Now, he contended that, if technical forms were good, they ought to remain, and if they were bad, they ought to be abolished. But, if hon. Members would go on a little further in the Bill, they would see that not only were these technical forms of action not abolished, but that they really remained as a vital and integral part of the law of procedure. For by the 6th section it was provided, that—

"The right to recover any debt or damages or personal chattel, in respect of any matter of contract or of tort, or taking or detention, which might have been heretofore the subject of any action of debt, covenant, assumpsit, account, trespass, trespass on the case, trover, replevin, or detinue, shall and may be enforced in an action to be called a 'personal action;' and all actions of 'ejectment' shall henceforth be commenced and prosecuted in the manner hereinafter provided."

And then, by the 7th Clause, it was provided that—

"The Court shall have and exercise, in and about any matter brought before it, in any such personal action or action of ejectment, under the provisions of this Act, the same jurisdiction, power, authority, and discretion, to all intents and purposes, as it could have exercised in an action for the same purpose instituted in the manner hereinbefore used."

Now, what did that mean? It meant this, that if a question arose as to the jurisdiction of the Court of Common Law in Ireland, or as to what this Act applied to, the only answer the Act itself gave was this, that the Courts of Common Law in Ireland had jurisdiction over, and that the Act applied to, matters which were now sued for in those particular technical forms of action which were specified in the Bill. So that the Bill, instead of relieving us from those technical forms, continued them, and the Irish lawyer would be just as much obliged to acquaint himself with all those forms of action of debt, account, assumpsit, covenant, detinue, trespass, trespass on the case, trover, or replevin, not only for the purpose of knowing what action he might bring, but in order to ascertain the jurisdiction of a Court of Common Law as opposed to a Court of Equity. So far, therefore, from the hon. and learned Gentleman having abolished those forms of action, the effect of this measure was to make them the foundation of his general form of action, and it was only by reference to them that it could be known what was the jurisdiction of the Common Law Courts at all. He (Mr. Lowe) agreed with the hon. and learned Gentleman that it was absolutely necessary that these forms should be swept away if they were to make any advance in the improvement of Common Law pleading; but, framed as the Bill was at present, those actions were made to constitute the very basis of the Common Law Courts themselves. The hon. and learned Gentleman had established by reasoning that the distinction between Common Law and Equity itself must be swept away. Very well; if that be so, let us adopt the principle; but don't attempt to sweep that distinction away by pretending to abolish those forms which constitute that very distinction, and yet by the same Act retain the forms, and thus uphold the foundation of the two descriptions of courts. If they once got rid of those technical forms, they would get rid of the distinction between Common Law and Equity. Therefore, if any man could make up his mind to go as far as this Bill went, he ought to go a great deal further. This was not merely theory on his part, for the hon. and learned Gentleman the Solicitor General for Ireland would recollect the introduction of the Bill for altering the Common Law in this country. The opinion of the Common Law Commission was, that these forms of action should be abolished, and a Bill was prepared for that purpose. But, when it was so prepared, it was perceived that not merely would they be getting rid of those technical forms of action inter se, but they would be getting rid of the difference between Common Law and Equity altogether. On perceiving this, the Committee who prepared the Bill considered that they would be unnecessarily destroying the landmarks between Common Law and Equity; they therefore withdrew the first Bill and introduced a second, and thereby retained the technical forms of action as before. Now, that was consistent. Those Gentlemen were not prepared to throw down the distinction between Common Law and Equity; they therefore fell back upon the common forms of action. But the hon. and learned Gentleman had gone further than that—he had abolished the forms of action; but he must not abolish those forms in one section, and bring them back again in another. He (Mr. Lowe) called the attention of the hon. and learned Gentleman more particularly to this matter, because he had made some laudable efforts to correct the law by giving the Courts of Common Law power to give relief in cases of lost bills and instruments, and also by allowing equitable defences to actions of ejectment. He had also given the Common Law Courts the power of setting aside inequitable legal defences, such as those founded on outstanding legal estates. He (Mr. Lowe) thought it could hardly be denied, that if that principle were good for anything, it was good for a great deal more than that. If the hon. and learned Gentleman set the distinction of Law and Equity aside in these matters, was it not by surprise or by mistake that he had not done so in matters of the highest importance? Either it was right to retain these forms of action, and to perpetuate his distinction of jurisdiction, or it was not. If not, then why do so in some few cases? But, if right to do so in respect to these, would it not be far better to do so in respect to all? Was it not monstrous that one set of courts should only recognise rights in the mortgagor, and another set of courts only in the mortgagee? That one should see no rights except in a trustee, and the other no rights except in the cestuique trust? That one should maintain, and the other should set aside transactions, on the very same facts? Surely, if the principle of giving to the Courts of Law equitable jurisdiction in some cases were good for anything, it was good for much more. He felt sure that the question could not rest here; and he ventured to hope that his hon. and learned Friend would be induced to see whether matters could not be carried further, and whether that great principle which had been advocated by Lord Mansfield, by Bentham, and by all the great lawyers who had given much attention to law reform, could not be accomplished, and the false and mischievous distinction between Law and Equity be for ever exploded. With regard to the alteration proposed in the form of procedure, he objected to the plan of making an abstract of the pleadings, as was proposed in this Bill, because, when parties had gone to the expense of pleading they had incurred enough cost, and the next best thing was to try the case, instead of which it was provided that an abstract of the pleadings should be made by the attorneys on both sides, if they could agree, and, if they could not agree, application was to be made to the Judge. This appeared to him to be objectionable, on the ground of expense. He perceived also a great omission in this Bill, with respect to the kind of judgment that might be pronounced in an action under its operation. In Equity a suitor, if successful, obtained such a decree as he asked for, or as the court thought just; but at Common Law the Court could only give a strict technical judgment. Now as the technical judgment followed the technical division of actions, now that the forms of action were abolished, he wished to know how the Court was to be directed in its judgment. He entreated the hon. and learned Gentleman to consider the few observations he had taken the liberty of making, and to endeavour to put the matters he had referred to on a more satisfactory footing.

SIR ALEXANDER COCKBURN said, he was very glad the hon. and learned Solicitor General for Ireland had brought in this measure, and he should regret much if the Bill should not be read a second time. At the same time he fully agreed with the hon. and learned Member (Mr. Fitzgerald), that it would be a great pity to prematurely hurry the Bill through Committee. He quite concurred in what had been just stated by the hon. and learned Member for Kidderminster (Mr. Lowe), namely, that the Bill now before the House was a great advance upon the English Common Law Procedure Bill of last Session, and thought he could point out the reason for this. The Common Law Commission recommended the abolition of the forms of action; but this important Amendment was abandoned, because certain judicial authorities were alarmed at the recommendation of the Commission going to such great length. We sometimes cut away the mast in order to save the ship, and, on that principle, it was found necessary to give up the proposed alteration. He very much regretted this, and now that the Government were prepared to go so far in the reform of the Irish Law, he trusted they would apply the same principle to the English Common Law. He willingly admitted that this Bill was an advance in other respects upon the Bill adopted in accordance with the Report of the Commission of which he had the honour of being a member. They had thought it necessary to deal with the incidents of an action in its various stages; but the Commission were not prepared to stop there, and their recommendations would form the subject of a Report which would shortly be laid before the House, and in which would be considered several most important matters, which formed no part of the Bill of the hon. and learned Gentleman. They would probably propose that Courts of Law should give the effect of a Bill of Discovery by the examination of parties to a suit; and that the Common Law Courts should have power of discovery without any expense, not according to the form of procedure in the Courts of Equity, but by a simple process of oral discovery, bringing up the parties and giving the Judge the power of immediately striking out the pleadings. So with regard to the power of persons who had only an equitable right maintaining a legal action; and alterations were also proposed in many other important respects. They proposed to introduce various Amendments, doing away with technical forms of action which had become obsolete and ought to be abolished. With regard to the jury system, it was worthy of consideration whether the plan adopted in the County Courts, which had worked so well, should not become a guide for the practice of the Superior Courts—namely, that of allowing parties, by consent, to deal with a question, either with or without a jury, as they liked. If parties consented to try their cause before a Judge in whom they both had confidence, they should not be compelled to have recourse to the more expensive and less satisfactory process of a jury. He believed that one of the reasons why County Courts worked so admirably was, that if any new matter turned up in the course of a case, the Judge, sitting from day to day in the discharge of his duties, was enabled to say, “Come before me again to-morrow;” whereas with a jury the case must be gone through from beginning to end without adjournment, and the only remedy was to obtain, at immense expense, a new trial. A variety of subjects of this kind were under consideration, and would receive the best attention of the Commission, whose anxious desire was to make the procedure in the Courts of Common Law as complete and satisfactory as it could be made. He quite agreed with what had been said in favour of doing away with the distinction between the jurisdiction of the Courts of Law and Equity, the reason for the existence of which was, that the Legislature had in all ages abused the lawyers, instead of amending the Law, and that the Law, consequently, grew so stubborn and inflexible, that Equity crept in as a clumsy substitute, and a mode of doing ultimate justice. The first thing, therefore, was to make

Law and Equity one—to abolish all distinctions between Law and Equity, and, as the consequence, all distinctions in their jurisdiction. He hoped they were all agreed on the great question of law reform, and alike anxious to discharge their duty as regarded it to the public. As a member of the profession, he might say he believed that from one end of Westminster Hall to the other, the necessity for legal reform was admitted—an admission which, indeed, was, on the part of the profession, only an enlarged view of their own interest. They might depend upon it that the cumbrous rules and methods which it was proposed to abolish, only prevented parties, who otherwise would go into Court from asserting their rights, and, he was certain, did absolute injury to the profession as well as to the public.

MR. CROWDER said, he was exceedingly happy to give his cordial vote in favour of the second reading of this Bill, and he begged to congratulate the hon. and learned Gentleman the Solicitor General for Ireland upon the able manner in which he had brought it forward. The Bill in many respects was undoubtedly an improvement on that passed during the last Session for the Amendment of Common Law Procedure in England. His (Mr. Crowder's) only difficulty was to understand how the Law Officers of the Crown thought fit to pass the measure of last Session without the introduction of those very Amendments to which the attention of the House was now being directed, because they had not been discovered since the passing of that Act, for they had been suggested by members of the legal profession, and had even been discussed in that House. He fully concurred at the time in every one of those suggested improvements; but, nevertheless, no notice was taken of them on the second reading of the English Bill; and when the measure passed through Committee, the consequence was that they had a measure applied to the Common Law Courts of this country, which was decidedly inferior to that introduced on the present occasion to regulate the Common Law Procedure in Ireland. With respect to the abolition of the forms of action, he fully approved of that Amendment. It was stated that the Common Law Commission in their Report recommended the abolition of those forms, but that part of their recommendations was, nevertheless, not carried out, owing, as it appeared, to the expressed opinions of certain high judicial personages. He appre-

to give some further notice—say from Thursday to that day week. But if on Thursday he will take the course which I think desirable, then it will not be necessary to summon noble Lords who are now absent, and who will find it inconvenient to attend on Monday.

The MARQUESS of CLANRICARDE : On Thursday, then, I will give the notice.

CLERGY RESERVES IN CANADA.

LORD WODEHOUSE asked the noble Earl the Under Secretary for the Colonies, whether there would be any objection to lay on the table of the House certain correspondence relating to the Clergy Reserves in Canada ?

The EARL of DESART said, the correspondence was not yet ripe for discussion: but he confessed he had not clearly heard what the noble Lord asked, owing to the conversation going on in the House on the termination of the previous question. The correspondence that had taken place on the subject was very scanty, but such as it was, there was no objection to its production. He could assure the noble Lord that Her Majesty's Government were deeply impressed with the importance of this subject. It was now fully under the consideration of his right, hon. Friend at the head of the Colonial Office, and he trusted that ere long some final settlement would be arrived at, which would be consonant with the just rights of all parties concerned.

OATHS IN CHANCERY BILL.

The LORD CHANCELLOR said, he rose simply to move the Second Reading of a Bill which he had had the honour to introduce to the House on a previous occasion. The purpose of it was to give a different name to Masters Extraordinary in Chancery, and to enable all solicitors within ten miles of London to act in the same way as Masters Extraordinary formerly acted. There was one provision in the Bill for the purpose of saving expense in taking evidence under deeds and wills. He wished to take that opportunity to correct a misapprehension which had gone abroad, that it was the intention of the Act to take away from the Masters Extraordinary the benefits which they previously had. No such intention appeared in the Bill; the object of it merely was to give them a name consonant with their occupation.

Bill read 2^a, and committed.

CORK CITY ELECTION.

The EARL of DONOUGHMORE presented a petition from inhabitants and owners of property within the Parliamentary boundary of the city of Cork, complaining of the manner in which the officers charged with the preservation of the peace in that city discharged their duty at the last election, and praying for relief. He had intended to accompany the presentation of the petition with some remarks of his own, but as there was a petition in reference to this election under consideration in the other House of Parliament, he should refrain from doing so. He might, however, observe that for two days, during the election, the city of Cork was in the possession of a lawless mob.

The EARL of BANDON said, he merely rose for the purpose of supporting the petition presented by the noble Earl, and to state that he could bear testimony to the disgraceful conduct represented in the petition.

LORD MONTEAGLE said, he observed that the petitioners prayed, amongst other things, that the House would devise some mode of protecting life and property during elections in Ireland. Without, however, questioning the allegations contained in the petition, he submitted that it would be disadvantageous in every way, if their Lordships' House were to raise discussions with respect to matters of that description, as they might thereby prejudice the impartial consideration of the election petition before the tribunals appointed to try their merits.

The EARL of DERBY : I do not think my noble Friend behind me is open to any censure on the part of the House, or of my noble Friend who has just sat down, for having in the performance of his duty, presented a petition, couched in most respectful terms, to this House, asking for the intervention of Parliament for the removal of that which, if it did exist at the last election, was undoubtedly a great evil; and stating facts connected with the locality from which the petition proceeded which were within the knowledge of the petitioners themselves, and on which they founded their prayer for some remedial measures. On the other hand, I concur with my noble Friend that a lengthened discussion, or an attempt to form a judgment with regard to the merits of a particular case, ought not to precede an inquiry, still less an attempt of the Legislature to pronounce an opinion upon a question of this kind, when an inquiry will, in all probability, take place before the proper legal and constitutional tribunal in another place. I entirely concur with my noble Friend that such a course would be both unwise and impolitic. If I correctly understand my noble Friend behind me, he does not propose to institute any inquiry at the present moment. This case of Cork as detailed by the petitioners, I fear, is by no means a single one; and I am afraid that in the course of the approaching Session of Parliament very many petitions of a similar character will be presented by different parties in Ireland, and will undergo investigation, on oath, before those tribunals which are appointed for the especial purpose of inquiry into disputed elections. I think that before those Committees it is very possible that not only local but much general information of very considerable interest and importance may be produced; and I am far from saying that if the result should be that not only in one case but in several—from any quarter or by any body of men—the free exercise of the right of election has been tampered or interfered with in Ireland—I am far from saying that the result of such a mass of evidence from different quarters may not justify and render necessary the intervention of the Legislature for the purpose of preventing such an infringement of the law, and such an interference with the liberty of the subject. But, for the present, while I cannot concur with the noble Lord opposite (Lord Monteagle) that my noble Friend behind me is open to any censure for having presented the petition, I entirely agree in the propriety of our neither, in this nor any other similar case, prejudging questions which must be submitted to competent tribunals in the other House of Parliament.

Petition read, and ordered to lie on the table.

UNIVERSITY TESTS IN SCOTLAND.

The DUKE of ARGYLL said, he wished to put a question to the noble Earl at the head of the Government, of very pressing importance, with reference to academic tests in Scotland. It was not his intention to raise any discussion on the subject, as the facts were sufficiently known to the noble Earl, and would probably before long come in detail under the consideration of their Lordships. All who were acquainted with the subject must be impressed with a sense of the incongruity of those tests with the existing circumstances and state of society in Scotland. He was, however, fully sensible of the difficulties to be dealt with in determining how they should be altered, and whether any other tests should be substituted. He trusted that if any change or modification of the law took place, it would come from the hands of the Government. He had reason to believe that the attention of the Government of the late Sir Robert Peel had been called to the important subject, and that if they had continued much longer in office, they would have laid a measure before Parliament with a view to the amendment of the law. The present law officers of the Crown in Scotland were gentlemen of the highest abilities and attainments, and as competent as any of their predecessors to deal with the question. He thought it of importance that if any measure was proposed, it should proceed from those who could not be supposed to be hostile to the Established Church. It was on that ground he urged the Government to take the subject into their serious consideration. He hoped the noble Earl would not be deterred from entering upon it by finding it was not in his power to devise any measure which would meet the opinions and views of all parties. From his own knowledge of the state of parties, and of the ecclesiastical divisions in Scotland, he was convinced that if the noble Earl refrained from introducing a measure until he could frame one which should be acceptable to all parties, he had better abandon the attempt at once, as altogether hopeless. He had no wish to speak with the slightest disrespect of the opinions and feelings of those who belonged to the Established Church in Scotland, of which he was a member. It was but natural that the ecclesiastical courts which were placed in the peculiar situation of trustees of the Church, should take a somewhat limited and technical view of the question, and stand on her legal and constitutional rights, however at variance with the altered circumstances of society. Though, as he before said, he was anxious that a measure should originate with those who, in a general point of view, were known to be favourable to the interests of the Established Church, he did not desire that an attempt should be made to conciliate all opinions, or even that the measure should receive the approbation and approval of the ecclesiastical courts. Having made these observations, he would ask, whether the Government intended, during the present Session, to propose any alteration or modification of the religious tests at present imposed on professors previous to occupying chairs in the Universities of Scotland?

The EARL of DERBY: I will give a plain answer to the noble Duke. Looking at the existing state of the law and the existing practice of the law, and looking, moreover, at the altered circumstances of Scotland in regard to ecclesiastical establishments, I certainly do not consider the present state of things as one calculated to give satisfaction; but at the same time the noble Duke has himself admitted the extreme difficulty of dealing with the question, which is one calculated to excite peculiarly strong religious feeling, and one, moreover, the noble Duke will bear in mind, in which this country is involved—one of the fundamental articles of the Treaty of Union with Scotland having been introduced for the protection of the rights of the Presbyterian Church of Scotland, when that country was incorporated with England, with an united Legislature in which the Scottish representatives must necessarily be a minority. The question of the possibility of altering the existing law is under anxious consideration of the Government, assisted by the present eminent chief law officer of the Crown in Scotland. I must say that while, in the first place, I admit that the present state of the law is so unsatisfactory that it might be possible for the Government to introduce amendments, yet it must not be forgotten that it is necessary, in dealing with such a question, to have peculiar reference to the religious feelings of a large portion of Scotchmen who still adhere to the Established Church, and to take especial care that, in introducing any amendment into the law, we do not give a colour to the allegation that we are using the power of the majority in a way hostile to the Presbyterian Church of the country, and for the purpose of removing restrictions and tests on which that Church sets great value, because they necessarily connect the Universities with the doctrine and discipline of the Presbyterian Church. Now, in employing those words doctrine and discipline, I confess that, in using my own judgment on the subject, and without hoping in the least to do that which has been adverted to by the noble Duke—conciliating the views of all parties—I certainly would have been very desirous to have seen a distinction drawn between two distinct portions of the tests—namely, those which apply to doctrine and those which apply to discipline. I believe the intention of the tests to be to secure the religious character of the University, and also its adherence to the Presbyterian doctrines of Scotland against the Episcopalians, the Roman Catholics, or any other body of men. The point of discipline is one altogether of minor importance. It always happens that in proportion as religious bodies approach each other more nearly in point of doctrine, the more earnestly they differ about questions of discipline and points of minor importance; and I apprehend that practically these tests are not brought to bear against Episcopalians, but are enforced against members of the Presbyterian Church who profess the doctrines, yet dissent from the discipline. I am, however, ready to admit, that if an alteration could be made, which, without altering the religious and Presbyterian character of the Universities, could in any way tend to reconcile the great bodies into which the Church of Scotland is at this moment split, and give those Universities the advantage of the talents and attainments of professors belonging to the different denominations, such a measure would be well entitled to the consideration of the Government. But, as I said before, looking at the difficulties which surround the question, I cannot undertake to promise that it will be in the power of the Government to bring forward any specific measure for the amendment of the law with regard to those tests.

The DUKE of ARGYLL trusted that the opinions which had been expressed by the noble Earl would have a good effect in Scotland. It should be recollected that after a professor had been admitted by taking those tests, the ecclesiastical courts of the Established Church had no power over him, and the declaration that he was subject to their discipline was a mere form. Though it had the effect of excluding most eminent men from the chairs of the Universities, it did no good. There were some men who wished for the abolition of all religious tests, but in that opinion he was not prepared to concur. He agreed with the noble Earl, that, touching as this matter did on a question that was settled by the Act of Union between England and Scotland, it was but right they should act with the greatest caution; but he could not see how a measure such as the noble Earl had alluded to, being a minimum change, could injuriously affect the interests of the Established Church, while it would materially conduce to education in Scotland, and admit to the chairs of the Universities many men who were most able to discharge the important duties connected with them.

House adjourned to Thursday next.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Tuesday, November 30, 1852.

THE CASE OF MR. STEAD.

VISCOUNT GODERICH said, he wished to put a question to the noble Lord the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs relative to the recent expulsion of Mr. Francis Stead from Prussia, by the police authorities of Berlin. It appeared that, in the month of August last, Mr. Stead visited Berlin, and, after residing there for two days, was arrested by the police, by whom he was detained in custody for a whole day, at the expiration of which period he was set at liberty, with an intimation that he must leave Berlin in the course of six hours, and that, if he returned, he would be committed to prison for one month. He (Viscount Goderich) should be glad to know whether the Prussian Government had offered any apology or explanation of such extraordinary conduct?

LORD STANLEY said, that the noble Lord had stated with accuracy the circumstances which had accompanied the arrest of Mr. Stead. Immediately after that event, Mr. Stead had very properly laid a statement of his case before Lord Bloomfield, our Ambassador at Berlin, who represented the matter to the Prussian authorities, and at the same time communicated with the Foreign Office. Lord Bloomfield at first received nothing more than the usual formal reply, that inquiry should be instituted and explanation given. After the lapse of a little time, an explanation was offered by the Prussian Government, to the effect that the Prussian police had obtained information from England that a person of the name of Stead was about to leave this country, and that he was implicated in a conspiracy to assassinate the King of Prussia. They were under the impression that Mr. Francis Stead was the person so described, and it was that suspicion that had led to his arrest and expulsion. The Prussian Government had expressed their regret at the circumstance, but he was bound to say that their explanation appeared so unsatisfactory, that another case having occurred about the same time, where a British subject was treated with almost equal harshness, Her Majesty's Government felt it to be their duty to remonstrate strongly upon the subject of their proceedings with the Prussian Government. It was due to Mr. Stead to say that nothing which had occurred in connexion with his arrest was in the slightest degree calculated to affect his character injuriously.

MINISTERS' MONEY (IRELAND).

MR. FAGAN rose to submit to the House the Motion which stood opposite his name in the notice paper. Having on three former occasions in the last Parliament submitted a similar Motion, it was not his intention to trespass at any great length on the indulgence of the House. But as he had the honour of addressing many hon. Members who had entered Parliament for the first time, and who knew but little of the subject under discussion, he felt it was due to them, and to the cause of which he was the humble advocate, as shortly and as succinctly as he was able, to place before the House the leading features of the question at issue. And, first, he would premise that he had no intention of interfering with the Church Establishment—that he was not coming forward in opposition to the wishes or the interests of the Protestant ministers who receive the tax called Ministers' Money—on the contrary, as he would show, that his Motion had their approval and concurrence, and that he was proposing nothing at variance with the objects, the purposes, or the preamble of the Church Temporalities Act. This vexatious, and he would call it odious, impost, amounted to the very paltry sum of 15,000*l.* a year levied off the occupiers of houses in eight corporate towns in Ireland for the support and maintenance—to use the language of the Act of Parliament—of the Protestants in these towns. These towns were Dublin, Cork, Waterford, Limerick, Kilkenny, Drogheda, Clonmell, and Kinsale. Now it was a curious circumstance that these towns may be fairly called Roman Catholic towns, the Roman Catholic population in them being in the ratio of from 6 to 1, to 4 to 1. The important towns of Ulster where the Protestant population preponderates—Belfast, Londonderry, Armagh, Enniskillen, and Carrickfergus, are exempt from this impost. But it is not only that these Roman Catholic towns are alone subject to this tax; it so happens that in these towns it is most unjustly and disproportionately levied from the poor Roman Catholic inhabitants. To explain this to the House it is necessary to state that the valuation for Ministers' Money is altogether distinct and different from the poor-law valuation. In the first place, no house can be valued at more than 60*l.* for Ministers' Money, though its actual valuation under the poor-law may be 100*l.* or 200*l.* Now the House will readily perceive that as such houses are occupied by the wealthier inhabitants, who are generally Protestants, there is, by this provision of the law an unjust favouritism shown them. But that is not all. The valuations for Ministers' Money in the old parts of these corporate towns are of a very remote date—in some cases over one hundred years—as the law is that there can be no valuation of a house while a stone of the original tenement stands—even though it might be converted into cellars, warehouses, or counting houses, which are not subject to the tax. Now, at the time when this original valuation took place, the houses in these quarters were occupied by the wealthy inhabitants, and were three or four times more valuable than they are now in their present state of dilapidation and deterioration, and consequently these houses are subject to three times the tax they would be if there were a new valuation. Now these houses are almost exclusively occupied by poor Roman Catholics. There is an admirable illustration of these two statements of what the law is, to be found in page 21 of the Minutes of Evidence before the Select Committee on Ministers' Money, where in a schedule furnished by one of the witnesses from the city of Cork, it is shown that while one great establishment valued under the poor-law at 2,000*l.* pays but the maximum of 3*l.* Irish, another person residing in a house in the old quarter of the city, valued now under the poor-law at 26*l.* pays also the maximum rate—his house being formerly valued at the full value of 60*l.* There is another strong illustration of this inequality in the city of Cork. In the parish of St. Mary Shandon, principally inhabited by poor Roman Catholics, the Ministers' Money in 1846 came to 300*l.*, and in the parish of the Holy Trinity, inhabited by a wealthy and principally Protestant population, the tax was then stated at 840*l.*, while the present valuation of the one does not exceed 6,000*l.* and that of the other is over 30,000*l.* But this is not the whole of the injustice. These poor people are subject to vexatious distrains of their miserable furniture, if they are not prepared with the tax for the support of a minister of a religion with which they had no communion—for the support of a minister, be it remembered, who believes it to be his duty to revile and calumniate from the pulpit the religion of the people who thus support him. He would harrow up the feelings of hon. Members were he to detail the miseries which the collectors of this tax have inflicted on the poor Roman Catholic occupiers of these houses. But his object was not to irritate; he would therefore forbear. To do the Protestant ministers who receive this impost justice, they are all anxious to have it abolished. This was the wish of several Protestant clergymen who were examined before the Select Committee, Dr. West of Dublin, the Rev. Mr. Elms of Limerick. It was the opinion also of Dr. Higgin, then Dean of Limerick, and he had himself communications from the present Dean, Dr. Kirwan, one of the most accomplished and exemplary dignitaries of the Established Church. And if he recollected rightly, there was one clergyman examined before the Select Committee who stated that he ceased to collect the tax at all, it was so truly odious to the people and to his own feelings. But it is said that all this injustice—this inequality may be got rid of by transferring the tax from the occupiers to the landlords—and by valuing all according to the poor-law valuation. Now in reply to this, he would say that this would not get rid of the odious nature of the tax—of the rancorous religious feeling which it engenders. It is in evidence before the Select Committee that the landlords of house property in Dublin and in other towns are principally Roman Catholics, and therefore this transference would not, like the tithe rent-charge, be placing the payment on Protestant landlords. Mr. Crean, a most intelligent witness before the Committee, and Dr. Higgin, Protestant Bishop of Limerick, strongly corroborated this view. He felt satisfied that if the grievous nature of this tax was in 1833 submitted to the present Earl of Derby, then Mr. Stanley, when he introduced to the consideration of Parliament his Church Temporalities Bill, that noble

Lord would have included it in his Bill, for the arguments he used against Church Cess applied with treble force to Ministers' Money; in fact, the arguments he used raised a strong presumption that he did intend to include this assessment in the provisions of the 73rd section of the Church Temporalities Act. This clause is very important in reference to the question now under consideration. It runs thus:—

“And be it enacted, that all parishes and places where, by virtue of any law, statute, or custom, provision may heretofore have been made by vestry or assessment, for the maintenance of any curate, lecturer, clerk, or other minister, or assistant, in the celebration of divine service, such provision by vestry or other assessment shall, from and after the passing of this Act, wholly cease and determine, and it shall and may be lawful for said Commissioners under said Act, by and out of the proceeds of said annual tax, and other funds aforesaid, by this Act vested in them, to provide for all such purposes.”

Now, if it be remembered that the words “Protestant minister” are used in the Act of Parliament as designating the person who was to receive Ministers' Money, it was not wonderful that the unlearned should imagine that this clause comprehended this obnoxious tax, and undoubtedly if the word “minister” had preceded the word curate in the clause, the enactment would have been complete. Now, though he had been hitherto unsuccessful in bringing this question before Parliament, he felt somewhat confident of success now for three distinct reasons. He was confident, in the first place, because of the recommendation of the Select Committee, made after a most anxious inquiry, and made in conformity to the views he had always entertained. This recommendation is embraced in the following passage of the report:—

“In this state of things, your Committee think it incumbent upon them to state that an augmentation of the funds of the Ecclesiastical Commissioners may be rendered available as a substitute for Ministers' Money, and recommend that, with that view, an amendment of the Church Temporalities Act may be made. Your Committee are aware that the adoption of this measure will involve the interposition of a new trust, and the postponement or relinquishment of some of the ulterior objects contemplated by the Church Temporalities Act; but any objection founded on the displacement of the original objects of the Church Temporalities Act will be more than counterbalanced by the great advantages which, in a social, moral, and religious view, will arise from the removal of an obstacle to those feelings of amity and good will, which it will be essentially conducive to the general interest of the country to encourage between the working Protestant Clergy and the great body of the community, amongst whom, in the cities and towns of Ireland, their duties are usefully and honourably performed.”

Now, he did not go to the extent of the report. He did not require the Commissioners to “postpone” or “relinquish” the ulterior objects contemplated by the Church Temporalities Act. He was in a position to show that the amount of Ministers' Money may be included in the permanent expenditure of the Ecclesiastical Commissioners, without requiring them to lessen their present expenditure for Church purposes. This he would come to by-and-by. He was confident, in the second place, of success, because of the solemn pledges given in the face of Parliament to him, by the noble Lord (Lord John Russell) when Prime Minister of England—and to Mr. Reynolds last year by the Secretary of State (Mr. Walpole), that they would bring in a measure to abolish this tax in conformity with the recommendation of the Committee. Now he could assure the noble Lord and the right hon. Gentleman, that the result in Ireland of these pledges was, that the clergy found extreme difficulty in collecting their incomes, and he was informed that in Kilkenny the people absolutely refused to pay at all. This reminded him of the celebrated expression used on one important occasion by the present Earl of Derby. He announced in his speech in Parliament “the extinction of tithes,” and the consequence of that declaration was, no tithes could be afterwards collected, and the massacre at Gurtroe was the consequence. Now, he assured the noble Lord and the right hon. Gentleman that their declarations had produced in the minds of the people a very similar feeling, and it was dangerous and unwise to disappoint them. Lastly, and above all, he felt confident of success, because of the very great increase in the revenues of the Ecclesiastical Commissioners since the year 1848, when the Select Committee made the report they did—and which removes all difficulty and takes away all excuse from the Government or the House. This brought him to the consideration of the most important branch of the subject, namely, the question of a substitute. The three great sources of permanent revenue in the hands of the Ecclesiastical Commissioners are—the see estates, suspended dignities and benefices, and the tax on bishoprics and benefices. Now, the income derived from these three sources in 1847 and 1852, are as follows :—

See Estates	£32,638	£50,259
Suspended Dignities and Benefices ...	11,531	15,749
Tax on Benefices and Bishoprics ...	7,541	11,785

being an increase of 26,000*l.*, and the entire permanent revenue was estimated by the Ecclesiastical Commissioners to be 71,574. The actual receipts up to August, 1852, were 90,677*l.*, or 19,000*l.* surplus; and this was likely to be largely increased. On the other hand, the expenditure had decreased from 67,677*l.* in 1847, to 54,214*l.* in 1852. And this was to be expected, because of course year after year the expenditure for rebuilding and for repairs must of necessity diminish. But it may be asked, what became of the money? The answer is simple—over 28,000*l.* last year was invested in the funds, and 10,000*l.* paid for annual instalment to Government for the loan of 100,000*l.* sterling at the commencement of their Act. He had then fully demonstrated that there now existed ample funds to induce the House to assent to the recommendation of the Select Committee. But he would not rest there. He was in a position to show that, if his proposition was adopted, the revenues of the Commissioners would be vastly increased from a source which now yields but a very trifling comparative amount. Under the provisions of the Church Temporalities Act, the tenants of bishops' leases being a tenure of twenty-one years—are enabled, if they agree to the terms now imposed under that Act—to convert by purchase their tenure into perpetuities, and the amount of this purchase-money goes into the funds of the Ecclesiastical Commissioners. Now the entire value of these perpetuities was valued by Mr. Finlayson, the great calculator, at 1,200,080*l.*—of this sum nearly 700,000*l.* has not yet come into the hands of the Commissioners. Now it is evidently the interest of the Commissioners to induce the tenants of see estates to purchase these perpetuities, and their refusing to do so is of service to no person. Supposing, for instance, that the tenants under the Archbishop of Dublin declined to convert their leases into perpetuities. In that case the Commissioners would derive no benefit from the Archbishop's estates; but if these perpetuities were purchased, the whole amount of the purchase-money would come into the coffers of the Commissioners without diminishing one penny the Archbishop's income, or taking anything from the tenant without giving him a full equivalent. Now, it appears, that under the advice of an Attorney General for Ireland, the mode of computing the value of these perpetuities is altered so seriously to the disadvantage of the tenants that the annual receipts from perpetuities have diminished from 30,000*l.* and 40,000*l.* down to 3,820*l.* sterling, received in 1851, and 3,800*l.* received in 1852. In former years the purchase-money was ascertained by taking what was called the diocesan value, and calculating that at twenty years' purchase, and from this amount deducting the present value of the tenant's interest, and then allowing 4 per cent bonus. At present it is the real bonâ fide market value which a solvent tenant would pay for it from year to year, which is estimated at twenty years' purchase. This market value is considerably higher than the diocesan value. Now, when it is borne in mind that fifteen years' purchase is the highest rate given in the Encumbered Estates Court, for property subject to a high head rent, it will be at once seen how impossible it is to expect the tenants will make these purchases without much greater encouragement. He would propose, then, without altering the present mode of calculation, to allow a bonus of 10 per cent instead of 4. This would bring the rate of purchase down to seventeen years, which, considering the heavy head rent reserved, was quite enough for the perpetuity. If this were done, he was quite confident the funds of the Commissioners would enormously increase. Again, at the commencement of their Act, the Commissioners were allowed to make income of the annual receipts of the perpetuity purchase-money; and it was only in 1844 that Lord Heytesbury directed them to fund these receipts. Now, seeing what a large and almost exhaustless fund was this perpetuity purchase-money, he proposed until the permanent revenue of the Commissioners further increased, to allow the Commissioners, if they thought necessary, to appropriate a part of the receipts of the perpetuity money to be the substitute for Ministers' Money. Again, it appears that the tenants of the Ecclesiastical Commissioners are not bound to pay their renewal fines every year, and they need not renew until the very last year of their tenancy, and then the Commissioners cannot refuse renewing for them on receiving the renewal fine. This new construction of the law diminishes very considerably the income of the Commissioners. To remedy this, an Amendment of the Church Temporalities Act was proposed by the Commissioners. This Amendment, which is printed in the Appendix of the Report, he proposed to embody in his Bill, and thus in another important way increase the income of the Commissioners. Again, the under-tenants of bishops' lands holding under toties quoties leases were allowed to purchase the perpetuity of their holdings. But there was such difficulty in ascertaining the value of their interests that no purchases could be effected. To enable this to be effectually done, the Commissioners also drew up a set of clauses, which are also printed in the Appendix. These clauses, if they became law, would again very considerably increase their revenue, and, therefore, he proposed to introduce them in his Bill, if he were allowed to bring it in. Lastly, he proposed that the Government should relinquish any further claim on the funds of the Commissioners for the outstanding debt. Of the 100,000*l.* which was lent to them at the commencement of the Commission, 20,000*l.* principal is still due, though the principal and interest already paid come to 120,000*l.* This money was borrowed to meet the demands for Church purposes at a time when no revenue existed, the Legislature having abandoned all claims for the arrears due of Church cess. Having given up these arrears, the money lent to replace them might reasonably be charged on the Consolidated Fund; and certainly it would not now be too much to expect that the balance due should be wiped off, if it tended to the final settlement of this vexed question. One million sterling was paid the clergy in lieu of the arrears due to them of tithes. 20,000*l.* would not, therefore, be a great sacrifice for a great nation to make towards the tranquillity and contentment of even a small portion of the Catholic people of Ireland. He had placed before the House the proposition which he made for the abolition of Ministers' Money. He assured the House that he was actuated by no sectarian or party feeling in making this Motion. He did so with the sanction and concurrence of many respected clergy of the Established Church. Its success would give great satisfaction in Ireland. He entreated the House to grant the prayers of the petitioners for relief in the matter, and it would tend much to secure the confidence and gratitude of the Irish people.

MR. LAWLESS seconded the Motion.

Motion made, and Question put—

“That this House will, upon Thursday next, resolve itself into a Committee, to take into consideration the Law relating to the Rate or Tax called Ministers' Money, in Ireland, with the view to repeal so much thereof as relates to the said Rate or Tax; and further to take into consideration the Act 3 and 4 Will. 4, c. 37, called the ‘Church Temporalities Act,’ for the purpose of amending the same, so as to provide thereby a substitute out of the Revenues of the Ecclesiastical Commissioners as a provision for the Protestant Ministers in certain corporate towns in Ireland, in lieu of the annual sums now received by them under and by virtue of the Act 17 and 18 Charles 2, c. 7.”

MR. WALPOLE said, that the hon. Gentleman the Member for the city of Cork (Mr. Fagan) had brought forward his Motion in a spirit of great moderation and good temper, and that he had done everything which he could to avert a religious discussion. It would be his endeavour to follow the excellent example which the hon. Member had set, while explaining the views which he (Mr. Walpole) took upon this subject, and the course which the Government intended to pursue. He believed that there were inconveniences attending this impost, and objections to it which ought to be removed. The objections pointed out by the hon. Gentleman as to the mode of valuation were very considerable, and he believed that some alleviation of the hardships they produced was expedient and necessary. The House was probably aware that a house rented at 60*l.* a year was valued at 60*l.*, although it might be worth treble that money, and that in many parts of Ireland the same assessment remained in force, although the houses had fallen into decay. But there was another objection stronger than these, and that was that the clergymen themselves objected to receive their money from their poorer Roman Catholic fellow-subjects. Perhaps the House would permit him to draw attention to the Report upon the subject drawn up by that able and eloquent statesman whom they had lost, Richard Lalor Sheil. After stating several objections, the Report goes on to say—

“But the paramount objection to ministers' money is of a political and religious kind. The direct payment of an ecclesiastical tax from Roman Catholic occupiers to Protestant incumbents, as a remuneration for services in which the former do not participate, is as obnoxious as church cess, and since its abolition, and the commutation of tithes, is the only remaining impost which is immediately levied upon the Roman Catholic occupier, who is not also owner of the premises in respect of which the charge is made. This tax is rendered more obnoxious by the course pursued in reference to other ecclesiastical demands, and is regarded as the remnant of a system of which the continuance has been practically condemned. It is not an exaggeration to say that popular odium attaches to this tax, nor is it to those by whom it is paid that this antipathy is confined. This source of livelihood is an object of aversion to the clergy, by whom it is most painfully collected from the reluctant and the poor. Several clergymen have been examined in the course of this inquiry, all of whom concur in the expression of a strong desire on their own part, and on the part of the clergy, that some substitute for ministers' money may be provided. From a feeling of compassion, which does them great honour, and from an anxiety to avoid a collision with those towards whom they are placed in the relation of pecuniary creditors, and not of religious pastors, the Protestant incumbents have made large sacrifices of their incomes. Evidence was given that the Rev. Mr. Roe, formerly a rector in the city of Kilkenny, had for nine years relinquished a claim from which his principal support was derived. It is obvious that some measure should be adopted to rescue the clergy, by whom important duties are performed in the towns already mentioned, from the deprivations to which they are exposed. Ministers' money operates as a tax upon the lenity of those who have hardly any other income for their maintenance. Strongly impressed with the conviction that a mode of payment attended with so much hardship to the clergy themselves should be discontinued, our attention has been directed to various expedients which have been presented in lieu of this tax. It has been suggested that a commutation of ministers' money, grounded on the same principle as the commutation of tithes, should be adopted; but the number of Roman Catholic proprietors of houses is so great, and after the remedy by distress had been abolished, the difficulty that must attend the collection of the commuted tax, and the litigation in which the clergy would, in all likelihood, be involved in suing for small sums, of which the payment would be resisted from the motives which are now in operation, induce the belief that this project ought not to be entertained. Neither do the Committee conceive that the mischief for which it is essential to find a cure would be alleviated by any process of redemption which could be devised. If voluntary it would be inoperative; and if compulsion was to be resorted to, an aggravation of evil would ensue. A charge upon the Consolidated Fund would be repudiated by the people of England. Convinced that by none of these means a satisfactory abolition of this tax could be brought about, your Committee directed their attention to the fund administered through the Ecclesiastical Commissioners, by the application of which the purposes formerly effected by church cess have been so usefully accomplished."

He would not object to a Committee of the House to take into consideration the subject, although he should have felt it his duty to object to an abstract Resolution which had for its object the abolition of the tax. For the House should recollect it was not an impost upon persons, but upon property; and the House could not admit that property was to be relieved from the burdens of an impost, merely because there was an inconvenience attending its collection. If the House abolished the tax simpliciter, they would leave the clergymen in those towns in which the tax at present was levied totally without any means of discharging their duties. Upon this point the evidence of the Rev. Mr. O'Sullivan was conclusive. He said that the Protestant clergymen were generally opposed to Ministers' Money, and he thought that they would prefer receiving their stipends in any other mode. He would quote from the Report the answers to Questions 1863 to 1869:—

"Have you had an opportunity of forming an opinion regarding the effect of ministers' money in Cork?—Certainly; as an officiating clergyman among the people, it necessarily has come under my notice. You consider the tax to be very obnoxious?—Particularly so. Have you had an opportunity of speaking to members of the Established Church, as well as to members of your own persuasion on the subject?—To a great many, lay and clergy. Are the Protestants, generally speaking, opposed to ministers' money?—The Protestants of Cork, principally; I think they prefer any other mode of payment for the clergy. Does the collection of ministers' money lead to discord and rancorous feeling as between the clergy and the inhabitants of Cork?—I would hardly call it a rancorous feeling; there is a feeling of dissatisfaction, and a feeling that it is an injustice; but except in cases here and there, where collectors may have been oppressive, there is no feeling of rancour. The inhabitants of Cork, I presume, would think that the clergy of the Established Church, who have duties to perform, should not be deprived of their livelihood?—On the contrary, I think that the general impression among the respectable classes of Roman Catholics in Cork, and indeed generally, is, that any arrangement which would take from the present incumbents their full amount of subsistence, becoming their rank as clergymen and gentlemen, would be unjust. And you say that it is the wish of the Roman Catholic inhabitants that the clergy of the Established Church in Cork should be paid fully for the duties they perform?—No doubt; and as I know that my examination must be a short one, I hope I do not intrude on the Committee in saying that from experience for the last several years, as secretary to the relief committee of Cork, there has been such a cordial feeling between the clergy of both Churches, they have acted so well and so zealously together, that I do believe that if this cause of irritation were removed in cities a very beneficial change would be produced upon the face and surface of society."

When the Church Temporalities Act was passed, a clause was brought in expressly to keep alive Ministers' Money. The hon. Gentleman said that the funds of the Ecclesiastical Commission were now sufficient to justify the appropriation of a portion of them, to get rid of an impost which was a cause of disagreement between Roman Catholics and Protestants in Ireland. The hon. Gentleman should first prove that those funds were sufficient; because by the Church Temporalities Act trusts were imposed upon those funds which must be discharged—1st, to provide what was necessary for the celebration of service in the church; 2nd, for the payment of sextons and clerks; 3rd, for the repair of the churches; 4th, for the maintenance of the churchyards; 5th, for building new churches; and, 6th, for augmenting the smaller livings. It was clear that all the preceding trusts down to the last must be satisfied before funds could be appropriated to the object proposed. But he was told, in point of fact, that the funds in the hands of the Commissioners were not sufficient for any such purpose, and he should object that those funds should be taken away from the great purposes for which they were placed in their hands until those purposes were satisfied. The House should not altogether forget that a great portion of those funds came, in fact, from a rate or charge now placed by virtue of that Act upon the benefices of all clergymen in the Church of Ireland, that charge varying from $2\frac{1}{2}$ per cent to 15 per cent per annum upon the value of the benefices. That portion of the fund, therefore, was derived from the clergy themselves, and to do away with this impost, and to place it in the hands of the Ecclesiastical Commissioners, would amount to first depriving the clergy of a great portion of their incomes, and taxing them afterwards. He assured the hon. Gentleman that he had taken great pains to settle this question. He had had much conversation with the Lord Lieutenant, with the noble Lord the Secretary for Ireland, and with the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General for Ireland, upon the subject. The result of all those communications was, that he thought the matter could be settled, and the last conversation which he had had with the Lord Lieutenant upon the subject, when in England the other day, was in fact arranging the greater portion of the measure which he thought it would be the duty of the Government to bring forward after the recess. There were details in the measure, however, which required information before he could finally give his assent to it. That was the state of the case as far as the Government was concerned. Under those circumstances, thinking that something ought to be done with reference to the question, but that it should be done with great deliberation, he should certainly not attempt to negative the Motion of the hon. Gentleman; and if he would accept what he (Mr. Walpole) now proposed—namely, that by way of an Amendment he should move the previous question, he would undertake after the recess to bring the matter forward.

MR. MURPHY said, it was quite apparent that this was a subject which was not mixed up with any spirit of sectarianism, but was one with reference to which those who differed in religion might agree in point of charity, and which it was as essential for Protestants as for Catholics should be speedily settled. But he asked what further pledge had they now for its settlement than they had had from a series of Governments? It was now some eleven years since he had first presented this question to the consideration of the House, and he was then met by the Government with words as conciliatory in spirit as those which the right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary had just made use of. The answer had always been that they concurred in the propriety of abolishing this impost, and that they believed it to be a vexatious one, engendering heartburnings; but, while they made specious promises from time to time, nothing had been done. In his opinion they ought to have a more definite promise, and they ought to be informed as to the nature of the measure proposed to be introduced. Another very great objection to this impost was the mode in which it was levied. Houses which formerly let at high rents, were now occupied by poor families, at 2s. or 3s. a week. The rating was still kept up to the maximum; and it often happened the last remnant of household goods was torn from these wretched people to satisfy this unjust demand, whilst many rich Protestants, who were more in arrear, were never distrained upon at all. If the right hon. Gentleman's objection to the proposition were founded merely on the fact that this was a charge imposed upon property, and not upon persons, let him look at the Report of the Select Committee upon the Edinburgh Annuity Tax, which was a precisely analogous case, and he would there see it recommended that the funds should be taken from the Church, and remitted from the property of Edinburgh. If that were a wise proposition with regard to a rich city like Edinburgh, surely in justice it should be applied to Ireland, where many houses which had once been valuable belonged to most impoverished owners, upon whom this tax pressed with peculiar severity. He pressed it upon his hon. Friend (Mr. Fagan), that he should not be contented with this sort of yea-and-nay promise on the part of the Government, and that he should rest satisfied with nothing short of a declaration that the Law Officers of the Crown had prepared a Bill, or were about to draw one; that such a Bill should be laid upon the table after the recess; and that it should sweep away the anomaly of an impoverished Roman Catholic population paying for a ministration which they did not receive. They had abolished Tithes and Cess, and, if they did not adopt this principle, his belief was that it would prove to be but the narrow end of the wedge, which, as the refusal in the East Redford case had occasioned the Reform Bill, might have the effect of materially interfering with the entire establishment of the Church in Ireland.

MR. NAPIER said, when his right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Home Department stated last Session, that it was the intention of Her Majesty's Government to take this question into consideration, that was no idle promise for the purpose of postponing it, but with the bona fide object of having it considered. He might say that since that time Her Majesty's Government had very fully considered the question, and he had himself given great attention to it; indeed, if his time had not been so much occupied, he should have been prepared with a Bill on the subject. During the time the late Government was in office, though he had no wish to thrust himself forward, he had been always willing to give his assistance to any measures for the good of Ireland. With regard to the late Government, also, he believed that their honest desire was to have settled this question; but he knew that the matter which stood in their way was, that on examining the funds of the Ecclesiastical Commissioners, it was found that this could not be placed upon those funds without postponing or displacing trusts which he was confident, when they were considered, the House would not consent to see postponed or displaced for the purposes connected with this particular measure. It was then to be considered, in the failure on any substitution of the mode of raising the amount, whether the inconveniences of the present system might not be met. With regard to the rating of houses which had fallen in value, to which the hon. and learned Gentleman, who had just sat down had alluded, he freely admitted that it was most desirable to exempt houses of small value entirely from this charge. But while he concurred in that view, he did not think it fair or equitable to seek to put this tax upon the poor clergy, many of whom were in humble circumstances, for there were many beneficed clergymen in Ireland whose average income did not amount to much more than from 120*l.* to 170*l.* a year. It was important to consider that in its origin this impost was a charge on property, and not on persons, and that at the time when the Act was passed, in the reign of Charles II., the inhabitants of these towns were mostly Protestants. Circumstances had changed, and he thought it was desirable the humble population should be to a certain extent exempted. As to the amount when exemption should commence, that was a matter of detail, but the great object was to make the whole valuation equitable. In conclusion, he might say, he would pledge himself to bring in a Bill on the subject, to endeavour to settle the question on equitable principles, and to do justice among all classes.

MR. HUME said, that ever since he had been a Member of that House, Ministers' Money had been a subject of annual discontent and discussion, and he could not understand how any Government should not see it to be their interest to have the question settled as speedily as possible, especially when the Church Establishment was possessed of such ample funds, and when the sum in dispute amounted only to some 15,000*l.* a year. There was also the Edinburgh Annuity Tax, which stood in the same category, and which involved the sum of 17,000*l.* a year; and this, too, was a grievance which the Government should endeavour to remove. The right hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General for Ireland had stated that he would, after the recess, bring in a Bill on the subject of Ministers' Money; but he had not told them what was likely to be nature of the measure. Would it remove the stigma which the present system cast upon the Roman Catholic in forcing him, while professing one religion, to pay for another? For that was the grievance which ought to be remedied. And how could they remedy it more advantageously than—if there were funds in the hands of the Ecclesiastical Commissioners, as his hon. Friend (Mr. Fagan) said there were—by applying those funds to the payment of Ministers' Money, even if the Church should be called upon to make a small sacrifice thereby?—for surely the interests of religion and the peace of Ireland were of much more importance than 15,000*l.* a year. He trusted, therefore, that the Government would endeavour, without delay, to settle this vexed question of Ministers' Money in Ireland, as well as that of the Annuity Tax in Scotland, for he believed there were ample funds for both within the respective Churches of those countries.

VISCOUNT BERNARD said, that hon. Members should recollect that this was a preliminary Session of Parliament, the avowed object of which was to settle an important commercial question, and that they ought not to bring forward questions of this kind on the present occasion, but allow the Government time to bring forward the measures they had in contemplation. The right hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General for Ireland had told them that he had directed his attention to the subject now under discussion, and that he had the details of a Bill in the course of preparation. This ought to be sufficient to satisfy the House for the present. The House should also bear in mind what had already been stated, that when this tax was originally imposed, it was imposed on the property of Protestants, and that all who had purchased the property since had purchased it subject to the tax; and it should likewise be kept in view that supposing the mode of collecting the tax were changed, and they were to place it on the basis of the Poor Rate, two-thirds of it would still fall upon Protestants, as the great bulk of the property in the cities subjected to the tax belonged to them. The hon. Member for Montrose (Mr. Hume)—following the hon. Member for the city of Cork (Mr. Fagan)—had proposed to take the Ministers' Money out of the revenues of the Established Church of Ireland. Now, in the Report of the Ecclesiastical Commissioners for Ireland, which was issued only the other day, he found it stated that, although some improvement had recently taken place in the state of their funds, the Commissioners could not promise to —“provide for the many pressing wants of the Church under the head of rebuilding, enlarging, painting, enclosing of churchyards, and other necessary works connected with the existing fabrica, even though they should be assisted largely by private subscriptions, until their income shall have been further augmented under the operation of the Church Temporalities Acts, inasmuch as it appeared from the architect's report, furnished at the commencement of this year, that a sum of 258,000*l.* was required for those purposes.”

He could bear personal testimony to the fact that in the county in which he resided there were a number of churches in a most dilapidated state, and that the Commissioners told the inhabitants that they had no funds to repair them. He knew of other cases of incumbents who had refrained from applying to the Ecclesiastical Commissioners, from the knowledge that from the numerous claims upon that body their application would be ineffectual. The members of the Church, at the same time, were under the necessity of subscribing to societies for supplying additional curates—thus plainly showing that, if the funds of the Ecclesiastical Commissioners were as much enlarged as some hon. Members imagined them to be, they would all be required to support the Established Church.

MR. MAGUIRE threw himself on the indulgence of the House for a few minutes, as he was a new Member, and as this was the first occasion he had attempted to address them. He assured them that he would not have risen on this occasion had it not been that the question before the House was one which was considered exceedingly important in some of the principal localities of Ireland. The immediate object for which he rose was to urge upon the hon. Member for Cork (Mr. Fagan) to persevere in his Motion; and he did so in no spirit of hostility to the Government, for he had no hostility towards them on this question; but because the Government had given the Members representing Ireland no assurance that this subject should be taken into especial consideration, and because the Attorney General for Ireland had given the House no idea of the principle on which he intended to found his promised Bill. Had the Government given them any assurance that they would provide a satisfactory substitute for the existing mode of levying Ministers' Money, he would have advised his hon. Friend at once to withdraw his Motion, and accept the terms of Government. The right hon. Gentleman had spoken of the importance of avoiding religious controversy; but he should remember that nothing was more calculated to engender and keep alive religious rancour than such a grievance as this of Ministers' Money. He hoped, therefore, the House would bear with him while he stated some few reasons why he felt himself bound by a sense of duty to endeavour to bring this matter to a final and satisfactory adjustment. He, for one, did not object to this tax because it pressed on one description of occupiers or persons more than another. He objected to it entirely on the ground of principle. For the last fifty years the House had, with one sad exception, legislated in the spirit of the principle that no men should suffer restriction—that no one should be mulcted of his property, or deprived of his liberty, because of the religious principles he maintained. Now, in this spirit he asked the House to look upon the present Motion. Here was a tax levied upon the occupiers of houses in eight of the principal cities and corporate towns in Ireland for the support of clergymen of the Established Church; and it was a fact susceptible of easy proof that a majority of those occupiers were Roman Catholics. There were, besides, a large number of them Protestant Dissenters, including a considerable proportion of members of the Society of Friends. Now, from these persons money was extorted by the power and obligation of the law to maintain clergymen in whose faith they did not believe, whose ministry they did not solicit, and with whose persons, in many cases, they were unacquainted. Was this fair, or was it not? Surely this must be regarded as a violation of the civil and religious liberty which both sides of the House affected to respect. There was not a Gentleman in that House, or in the United Kingdom, who did not reverence the many virtues and active benevolence of the Society of Friends, and their admirable exertions for the destitute poor in Ireland at a time when their benevolence was most needed; and yet many of the members of that respectable body in Ireland were prosecuted from year to year, had their consciences outraged, and their property confiscated, in the most shameful and degrading manner, and all for the payment of this odious tax. The right hon. Gentleman had represented this as a tax upon property, and endeavoured to show what he (Mr. Maguire) did not believe was historically correct—that at the time of the first imposition of the tax a majority of the ratepayers were Protestants. He begged to refer the right hon.

Mr. Maguire

Gentleman to the evidence of the Rev. J. Elmes, where he would find it stated as the opinion of that rev. gentleman, whose authority, he believed, would weigh with the Government, that at the time the tax was created, in the 17th & 18th Charles II., most of the inhabitants and most of the occupiers of the houses in Limerick were altogether Roman Catholics. But supposing that it was right to continue the tax from generation to generation upon those houses which were originally made subject to it, how could hon. Members justify the imposition of the tax upon property which had since then been built by Roman Catholics? He knew a district in Cork, for instance, where about a dozen Roman Catholic proprietors had, within the last twenty years, built upwards of a hundred houses. Now, would it be fair to make these Catholics to pay the tax, whether as owners or occupiers? He admitted that places of worship should be kept in a proper condition; but the noble Lord the Member for Bandon (Viscount Bernard) had represented a state of things which rather existed in his own imagination than was susceptible of proof. But he could give the noble Lord some facts with respect to Protestant churches. He (Mr. Maguire) knew several Protestant churches in the county of Cork without congregations. There were four parishes in the diocese of Cloyne in which the congregation consisted of only three persons, and that congregation was migratory, lending their assistance sometimes to one parish and sometimes to another; such was the state of human, though not of spiritual, destitution, in the district. The proportion of Catholics to Protestants in the city of Cork was about six to one; in the city of Limerick it was, he believed, seven to one; in Kilkenny it was yet larger; and in the city of Waterford it was larger still. What, he asked, could be more galling and irritating to him as a Catholic than to be called upon to pay ministers whose faith he did not believe, however he might respect them personally? He thought he might justly regard such an impost as a badge of conquest and a brand of civil and religious inferiority. It must be remembered, also, that there were conscientious men in the various localities of Ireland who were prevented from voting at municipal elections because they would not pay this tax, preferring to have their goods distrained. It was not impossible that a measure might emanate from the other side of the House for amending and extending the franchise; yet, by maintaining this tax, they were continuing a system which prevented men who had the right to do so from managing their local affairs and exercising those powers which were given them by the law. In order to show the effect of continuing such a fretting sore, he might refer to a case which was mentioned by Mr. O'Flynn, one of the witnesses examined before the Committee. It was that of a respectable man who had formerly been an extensive merchant and farmer, but who had been reduced in circumstances. The collector called upon him for 1*l.* 7*s.*, three years' arrears of Ministers' Money. The wife said they were unable to pay, but the collector seized all their furniture and sold it immediately. The collector admitted that the little property which he seized had been left by the sheriff as an act of charity; yet what was left this miserable couple by the charity of the sheriff's officer was torn away from them by the representative of the ministers of religion! He put it to the most ardent supporters of the Established Church what must be the effect of such odious scenes upon a lively and susceptible population? What must be thought of those who were found levying black mail in the name of religion? He had the honour of knowing the Dean of Waterford, the distinguished Protestant Bishop of Limerick, and many other clergymen of the Established Church, who benefited by this tax against their own wish. The Rev. Dr. West, of Dublin, stated also that the clergy of Dublin were anxious to avoid having to fight for their incomes; and the Rev. Mr. Elmes designated the tax not merely as obnoxious, but as exceedingly obnoxious. He might here say a word or two about the mode of seizure and of sale. One of the collectors was asked by the Chairman of the Committee whether he gave notice of the sales, and he replied, "No; I give no notice when or where the things are to be sold; the Ministers' Money Act does not require such notice." Wherever it was sold, however, and no matter what sum was realised, the owner of the property had no means of knowing what became of it. A few days before he (Mr. Maguire) left Cork, two sacks of flour were seized from a Quaker in Patrick-street by a flour-dealing collector. The Quaker was unable to gain any intelligence of the whereabouts of his property, but some persons were malicious enough to say that the collector was seen dispensing, with his orthodox hands, the ravished flour of the Quaker. It appeared from the evidence given before the Committee, that in cases where houses had fallen into ruin, and had been unoccupied for periods of eleven, eight, and seven years, when they were rebuilt by the owners, the whole arrears of Ministers' Money were extorted from the occupiers. Let them put this tax into any form they liked, it would still be odious and offensive. His own religious opinions were as strong as those of any man; but at the same time, being anxious for the welfare of the country, and that every man in his country should live in amity and kindness with his neighbour, he must declare that he could conceive nothing more degrading to religion than that clergymen and ministers of religion should be placed in the odious and invidious position in which they were placed by the maintenance of this tax. A short time since he went, as a member of a deputation, to several of the southern towns of Ireland, with a view of interesting persons in the National Exhibition, which had been so signally successful, and many of those from whom the deputation received the greatest assistance were Protestant clergymen. Now, if there ever was a time when it was necessary that good feeling should exist between men of all religious persuasions in Ireland, this was that time. An industrial movement was now going on in Ireland; it was becoming more and more developed every day; and he believed it might be the means of laying the foundations of local prosperity in many parts of that country. Protestants, Catholics, and Quakers united in promoting and patronising this movement, and he asked those who wished to establish good feeling between Protestants and Catholics, and to advance the interests of their country, to assist in doing away with every cause of rancour and dissension. If, however, he were told that he was to be taxed and mulcted, because he was a Roman Catholic, he could not entertain in his heart those sentiments which Christian men ought to cherish. He asked the House in the name of religion, which was dishonoured by this tax, and in the name of justice, which was outraged by its imposition upon Catholics, Presbyterians, and Quakers, not merely to sanction some temporary change of the burden from one shoulder to the other, but to get rid of it altogether, and to give up the building of a few Protestant churches, rather than have the principles of the Pro-

SIR JOHN SHELLEY said, he had come down to the House intending to give his support to the Motion; and what he had heard during the discussion confirmed him in the opinion that it was necessary this subject should be thoroughly investigated. He thought, however, after the assurances which had been given on the part of Her Majesty's Government, that they would bring in a measure on the subject early after the recess, that the hon. Gentleman who brought forward this Motion would rather damage than advance his cause by pressing the Motion under the circumstances.

CAPTAIN JONES said, that the statement of the noble Member for Bandon (Viscount Barnard), that it was absolutely necessary that additional funds should be appropriated to the rebuilding and repair of churches in Ireland, was fully borne out by the Reports of the Ecclesiastical Commissioners. He would be extremely glad if it were possible to provide for the payment of the Ministers' Money in some other way, but he must protest against the charge being thrown entirely upon the Ecclesiastical Commissioners. It was, indeed, clear from the Reports that the funds in the hands of the Commissioners were utterly inadequate for the purpose.

MR. FORTESCUE said, that he considered the objects for which this obnoxious, unfair, and mischievous tax was levied, ought to be provided for from the funds of the Established Church in Ireland. He thought the revenues of those sinecure livings which disgraced that Establishment might, with great benefit, be applied to this purpose. He hoped the Government would not be too scrupulous in applying the funds of the Established Church to those objects.

MR. MONSELL said, he would suggest to his hon. Friend the Member for the city of Cork (Mr. Fagan), that he should not press his Motion after the promise made by the Government to introduce a Bill on the subject. It appeared to be admitted on both sides of the House that the tax was most obnoxious, and its recipients objected to it just as much as those who were called upon to pay it. If his hon. Friend forbore from pressing his Motion now, the House would judge, when the Government brought forward their measure, whether it met the case satisfactorily or not; and he thought his hon. Friend would be in a better position if he showed an inclination fairly to consider the proposal of the Government.

MR. FAGAN said, he felt himself bound by a sense of duty to divide the House. If the Government had held out any hope that this obnoxious tax would be abolished, he would not call for a division, but from the sketch placed before the House of the nature of the right hon. and learned Attorney General's Bill, he was quite satisfied there was no intention whatever of abolishing this impost, but simply of transferring it from the occupiers of the houses to the landlords. He therefore felt it due to his constituents, who would not be satisfied with such an arrangement, to press his Motion.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Wednesday, December 1, 1852.

Order for Committee read; Motion made, and Question proposed, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair."

MR. BUCK said, that, as the representative of a very large agricultural district (Devonshire), he felt that, if the Bill were passed in its present shape, it would be impossible for his constituency to exercise the franchise without much inconvenience. It must be evident to every one who was acquainted with the county constituencies that the greatest possible difficulty would arise from the provisions of the Bill; and he now interposed for the purpose of appealing to the noble Lord (Lord R. Grosvenor), and requesting him to postpone its further consideration until after the recess, that hon. Members might have an opportunity of communicating with their constituents, and ascertaining what were their sentiments upon the subject. If, however, the noble Lord would not accede to that suggestion, he trusted he would adopt another course, which he could assure him would meet the concurrence of several Gentlemen on that (the Ministerial) side of the House, and consent to submit the Bill to the consideration of a Select Committee. It was by no means his wish to defeat the Bill; all he desired was that it should be made as satisfactory to the country as it was possible to make it.

MR. MILES said, that, before the noble Lord answered the appeal of his (Mr. Miles's) hon. Friend (Mr. Buck), he trusted he would take into his consideration a point which he (Mr. Miles) thought was a necessary preliminary to the discussion of to-day. It was desirable that the noble Lord should state distinctly to the House what were his intentions in proposing this Bill. In the last Parliament the noble Lord began by confining his measure to the simple proposition that the Poll for Counties should last but one day. Subsequently, however, he added one or two apparently trivial things to the Bill, the effect of which was to prevent its passing that Session. And now he had complicated a simple proposition by adding two others to it—namely, that the period to elapse between the nomination and the Poll should be only one day, and between the Poll and declaration one day more. To him (Mr. Miles) these propositions would be an almost insuperable barrier to the passing of the measure. He thought it right, therefore, that the House should perfectly understand what was the actual shape which the noble Lord intended the Bill should assume.

LORD ROBERT GROSVENOR, in reply to the question of the hon. Member for North Devonshire (Mr. Buck), said, that if the Bill were then for the first time introduced, there might have been some reason in that hon. Gentleman's request; but the House would recollect that not only was that not the case, but the Bill was brought in last Session with the sanction of the Government to its principle—that since that time an election had taken place—and that he had in the late Parliament given notice that he should again bring forward the measure. It could not be contended, therefore, that the constituencies had not had the most ample opportunity of considering it: the hon. Gentleman would excuse him if he declined to comply with his request. The hon. Member for East Somersetshire (Mr. Miles) had desired him (Lord R. Grosvenor) to state what he really meant to accomplish by his Bill. In the first place, then, the Amendment of which he had given notice for limiting to one day the period between the nomination and the Poll having been received with so little favour by the House, it was his intention, as he had stated on a previous occasion, to withdraw it; so that, as far as he himself was concerned, he proposed now simply to limit the duration of the poll to one day instead of two, and to provide that the official declaration should be made the day following the close of the poll instead of the day but one after.

SIR GEORGE PECHELL said, he concurred in the opinion expressed by the noble Lord who had charge of the Bill, that the country had had abundant opportunity to make itself acquainted with the provisions of the measure, and that there was therefore no legitimate excuse for further postponement. He did not believe that any evil result would follow from confining the polling to one day, as in boroughs. In the borough of Shoreham, which was of considerable extent, he believed there existed no difficulty in taking the poll in one day.

MR. PACKE said, he must complain of the haste with which it was endeavoured to pass this Bill through the House, and he thought more time should be allowed for considering its provisions. The principal ground upon which he was opposed to the Bill was, that it would certainly operate as a measure of disfranchisement in the case of a large portion of the county electors, and these of the most important class. The state of the weather during the last fortnight ought to have convinced the House of the great difficulty which would have been experienced in many counties by the electors attempting to come to the poll at all. For these, among other reasons, he should oppose the further progress of the Bill, and move, as an Amendment, that it should be committed on that day six months.

Amendment proposed, to leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words, "this House will, upon this day six months, resolve itself into the said Committee," instead thereof.

MR. DRUMMOND said, he should support the Bill. The whole of the objections which had been urged on that (the Ministerial) side of the House might be obviated by inserting a provision for the establishment of more polling places, and for taking the votes at the houses of the electors in the same manner as was now done at elections of guardians of the poor.

LORD ALEXANDER LENNOX said, that as the hon. and gallant Member for Brighton (Sir G. Pechell) had quoted the borough which he (Lord A. Lennox) had the honour to represent, as an instance that no inconvenience could arise from having only two polling places, and confining the polling to one day, that district being thirty miles long and ten wide, he begged to inform him that the inconvenience was so great, and the complaints so general, that it was his intention to move a clause to the Bill to place the borough of Shoreham upon the same footing as counties.
